As I have said, where there is a qualifying period, it would typically be about three months—perhaps, in some cases, six months—which is substantially less than the qualifying period for state sickness benefit. To receive state sickness benefit, in broad terms—I will not go into all the complications of the national insurance rules—it is necessary to pay contributions for two years, whereas large numbers of those in occupational sick pay schemes qualify for benefit from day one, and the great majority within three or six months.

Ms. Short: Will the Secretary of State help all of us by giving his best estimate of the proportion of the working population who are covered? I do not want him to give the House these false figures relating to employers who cover some of their workers. What proportion of the British work force are covered by an occupational sickness scheme?

Mr. Newton: I have given the hon. Lady the best information that I can give, drawn from the survey that we conducted. If my right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People can add to that, he will certainly seek to do so later in the debate. What is unarguable is that a substantial proportion of the British work force are covered by occupational sick pay schemes.

There is one other point that I should make. I am not quite sure whether the hon. Member for Ladywood is going to raise the question of those who are earning less than £46 a week, and are therefore below the lower earnings limit at present. If she is including those people in her reference to the proportion of the British work force, hers is a pretty poor point. Admittedly, they do not qualify for statutory sick pay, but in many cases they have deliberately chosen not to enter the national insurance system, and therefore would not qualify for state sickness benefit either. In effect, they have made a choice to stay out of the area of coverage for short-term sickness.

I would be interested to know whether the hon. Lady's implicit attempts to argue that point include those people who are in the work force, but have quite deliberately chosen to keep their earnings below £46 a week in order to stay clear of the national insurance system. We know that a lot of people do that, but that is a decision for them. I am not willing to accept that they should be included in the hon. Lady's statistics to somehow undermine the validity of what I am saying about the growth in coverage of occupational sick pay schemes.

Ms. Short: I am happy to answer the Secretary of State. It is my view that we should extend the coverage for sickness and so on to part-time workers, as well as full-time workers. However, I think he knows that that is not the point that I am making. He keeps quoting the misleading statistic that 90 per cent. of the British work force work for employers who offer some occupational sickness scheme. That could include a tiny number in management positions in a very big work force: the right hon. Gentleman knows that. I am referring to the people within the national insurance scheme, which is being whittled away. I am not referring to those who work very short hours; that is a separate issue. Will he give the House his best estimate of the proportion of the work force who are covered? I doubt that it is half, and I do not want him to mislead the House and say that the figure is 90 per cent.

[Ms. Short]

Mr. Newton: I do not think that I could be accused of having misled the House; I have no intention of doing that. It is clear that the proportion is very substantial. If my right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People or I can give the hon. Lady any further help on that point later in the debate, we will.

It is a striking fact that so large a proportion of the work force—more than 90 per cent.—work for employers who have occupational sick pay schemes. It is incontrovertible that the spread of those schemes—which formerly excluded rather more people than they do now—has been substantial, and that a sizeable proportion of those in employment are either covered by occupational sick pay schemes or work for employers who, as a matter of practice, will go on paying them—often full pay—for some period when they are sick.

Mr. Meacher: I repeat that this is the absolutely key, hinge point of the Bill. Does the right hon. Gentleman accept, and has his Department not briefed him—I am sure it has—that the IFF survey, to which he refers, involved a sample which was over-stratified in favour of large companies? Large companies are more likely to provide occupational sick pay, but there has been a reduction in their number and a huge increase in small companies with fewer than 20 or even 10 employees. It is precisely because they were under-represented in the survey and they do not offer occupational sick pay that the survey is so fallacious. Is the Secretary of State not therefore basing the whole Bill on a fallacy?

Mr. Newton: No, I am not. There are a number of interrelated points in the argument and we are arguing on one narrow front. The hon. Gentleman will remember from my uprating statement that we are undertaking a variety of steps here, all of which have some relationship to his point. Yes, there has been a large and welcome development of small firms. As I have often said, many of them will have employees who are paid less than £175 a week—or £185 a week, as it will be from next April—at which point they get into the full range of employers' contributions. Those firms are getting a proportionately larger reduction in their employers' contributions.

Equally, a significant number of employees of small firms will qualify not for the higher rate of statutory sick pay but for the lower rate. The lower rate was fully uprated in line with prices precisely because, as I said in my uprating statement, it was more likely to go to employees whose employers were not providing occupational cover.

The package as a whole includes the changes in the reimbursement arrangements, what has been done with the rates of SSP, including the full uprating of the lower rate, and the reduction in national insurance contributions, which is worth some £250 million to employers as a whole. While I am not in any way seeking to dismiss the hon. Gentleman's point about small employers, that very point has been carefully taken into account in the package of proposals with which this measure—the only one in the Bill which requires such legislation—is associated.

Employees who do not yet have any occupational sick pay cover tend to be people in low-paid or part-time employment. As I have said, it is precisely for that reason that the uprating proposals provided for a full uprating of the lower rate of SSP, which is what those groups are most likely to receive.

The summary to the sick pay report, which we have just been discussing—I stress that it was carried out by an independent research company—concludes:

"Looking to the future, the level of cover is likely to increase further, as employment continues to shift towards industries with more generous schemes (i.e. service and new manufacturing industries); traditional differentials between manual and non manual grades are further eroded; and as part of the continuing improvement in terms and conditions of employment".

It is on that record and prospect, derived in part from the report but by no means only from it, that we are seeking to build.

The proliferation of occupational sick pay schemes now means that, for the great majority of those in work, the rates of SSP bear little or no relation to the amount that they receive when sick. It is right that the Government should take account of that in the future development of the scheme and in considering the distribution of available resources within the social security budget as a whole.

Let me now outline the proposals for the restructuring of statutory sick pay which I announced to the House during my uprating statement on 24 October. As has become clear from our exchanges over the past few minutes, the proposals contain two elements. The first comprises the reimbursement arrangements for employers, which are the subject of the present Bill. The second relates to the changes in the rates and earnings thresholds for SSP.

I should make it clear that the latter will be covered in a separate SSP uprating order and will be debated in the House, with the main benefit uprating package, in due course. It would perhaps not be proper for me to anticipate that debate, although it is right—again, as our exchanges have clearly shown—to refer to those changes during this Second Reading debate, because they form part of the general restructuring of SSP.

As hon. Members know, there are two rates of statutory sick pay. At present, the lower rate goes to those employees whose average weekly earnings are between £46 and £125—£46 being the lower earnings level at which national insurance contributions become payable. As I explained to the hon. Member for Ladywood, I propose to increase that rate, in line with the full retail prices index amount of 10·9 per cent., from £39·25 to £43·50—an increase of £4·25 a week. That is in recognition of the fact that those in low-paid or part-time employment are less likely to have occupational sick pay cover when they fall sick.

At the same time, I propose that the dividing line between the two rates, which, as I have said, is set at £125, should be increased to cover the whole range of earnings bands within which employers pay the lower rate of contributions. At present, that covers employees earning less than £175 a week, with an increase to £185 from April 1991 under the proposals that I announced for the re-rating of national insurance contributions following the Chancellor's autumn statement on 8 November. I propose to leave the higher rate of SSP unchanged this year at £52·50. Subject to parliamentary approval, the changes will take effect from 6 April 1991 and I made it clear in my uprating statement that they will reduce public expenditure by about £100 million in 1991-92.

As I have said, this is not perhaps the proper parliamentary occasion on which to discuss those proposals in detail, but I must stress that the vast majority of employees will face no reduction in the total payment that they receive when sick. That is because of the way in which occupational sick pay under employers' schemes interacts with SSP.

It may help if I explain just how the reimbursement arrangements work. Each month, employers deduct from their regular remittances of national insurance contributions to the collector of taxes the gross amount of SSP that they have paid to their employees. If the total contributions due amount to less than the SSP paid, the employer can similarly adjust his payment of PAYE tax. Should the total of both national insurance contributions and tax be insufficient to allow full recovery, the employer can either wait until the next month's payment to recover the balance or apply to the Inland Revenue for a direct refund.

In addition, since April 1985—some time after the scheme came into operation—an employer has also been able to recover, by deduction from his remittances of national insurance contributions, an amount by way of compensation for the cost of the national insurance contributions payable on SSP itself. That amount is fixed each year and, at present, is 7 per cent. of the total SSP paid.

Having explained the reimbursement arrangements—I hope with reasonable clarity—let me outline the provisions in the Bill. All the substantive provisions are in clause 1. Clause 1(1) reduces the amount of SSP that employers can recover in the way that I have described from 100 per cent. to 80 per cent. Clause 2(2) enables that percentage to be varied by order. Clause 1(3) brings to an end the additional 7 per cent. compensatioin rate. The first of the two remaining subsections enables regulations to be made to cater for rounding to the nearest penny, and the second makes the consequential amendment to the Social Security Act 1975 relating the transfer of funds between the Consolidated Fund and the national insurance fund. Clauses 2 and 3 deal with consequential and supplementary matters and are in the standard format that appears in most Social Security Bills. I do not propose to deal with those clauses in detail, but I want to make two points.

The first point relates to subsection 3 of clause 2, which contains a power to make transitional regulations. Hon. Members may like to know that the intention is for those to provide that all payments of SSP made before 6 April 1991 will continue to be subject to 100 per cent. reimbursement plus the 7 per cent. compensation, even if not recovered from remittances to the Inland Revenue until after that date. Payments of SSP made on or after 6 April will be recoverable at the new 80 per cent. rate, and no additional compensation will apply.

The second point relates to subsection 2 of clause 3, about commencement. As I have just made clear, it is intended that the provisions will come into effect from 6 April 1991. If there are other points about the fairly elaborate detail of those two clauses that hon. Members wish to raise, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People will try to answer them when he replies.

As the explanatory and financial memorandum to the Bill explains, the change from 100 per cent. to 80 per cent. reimbursement will result in public expenditure savings of £181 million in 1991-92, rising to £190 million and £197 million in the following two years. In addition, the ending of the 7 per cent. compensation rate will increase income to the national insurance fund by £71 million in 1991-92, £75 million in 1992-93 and £78 million in 1993-94.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): To what extent will that be offset by the reduction in national insurance contributions, or is that the net figure?

Mr. Newton: My hon. Friend has raised a good point. That is the total of expenditure saving plus additional income as it were or reduced outgoings to the national insurance fund, which, as my hon. Friend will see from the figures, amounts to about £250 million.

Ms. Short: What?

Mr. Newton: If we add £181 million to £71 million, it amounts to £252 million.

Ms. Short: What if we add together the £197 million and the £78 million?

Mr. Newton: The hon. Lady is adding up the figures for the following years. I am happy if she does that, and if need be, we can set out the three-year figures. However, inevitably they will be subject to uncertainty, because many variables are involved. The figures given are the best efforts that could be made at the time. I believe that the easiest figure to concentrate on at the moment is the combined total of the saving in public expenditure, plus the increased revenue to the national insurance fund, which is of the order of £250 million. As has been noted, that takes no account of the reduction in national insurance contributions, which itself is about £250 million. I said in my uprating statement that it would be more than £200 million. When I gave the details on 8 November, the figure was larger than I had signalled in my uprating statement. In practice, the reduction announced on 8 November is about £250 million.

I do not mean to pretend that there is or can be a direct equivalence for every employer between their reduction in national insurance contributions and the additional amount that they might have to pay for statutory sick pay. However, it is clear from my figures that the offset is substantial when we consider employers as a whole in respect of the reimbursement side of the package.

Mr. Wallace: The Secretary of State has presented a package to the House including the measures in the Bill, the reduction in employers' insurance contributions and the freezing of the higher rate of SSP and the change in the threshold. With regard to the last factor, is there a further £100 million saving to the Treasury? As a package, is there a reduction in public expenditure of £100 million? If that is the Treasury's gain, whose loss is it?

Mr. Newton: I hope that it was clear in my uprating statement and in everything else that I have said that the figures I have given in response to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) and to the hon. Member for Ladywood relate to the public expenditure saving in the Bill together with increased national insurance revenue, which is not a saving in public expenditure in the Bill as against the reduction in national insurance contributions. None of that embraces the £100 million to which I referred a few minutes ago, arising from the fact that the higher rate of SSP is not being uprated and from the change in the thresholds. That is absolutely clear and I would not wish to risk misleading anyone about it.

[Mr. Newton]

As to who has gained, my uprating statement included significant increases in benefit for those in residential care and nursing homes, an improvement in income support for less well-off pensioners, and last Wednesday the House debated a Bill which will steer significant additional money over the next two or three years to the long-term sick and disabled. I do not run away from the fact that Social Security Ministers must face priorities in the way in which they spend and use money. This Bill is part of an assessment of where the weight of state resources should be directed to achieve the best value for the taxpayers' money.

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): Taking the package as a whole, and in view of today's figures, the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses believes that many firms will have to pay up to £11 a week more for up to 28 weeks. If that is the case, it is a matter of concern. Will the Secretary of State deal with that concern?

Mr. Newton: I will refer to examples later against the background of the fact that, while the maximum extension of SSP following changes made around 1985 is now 28 weeks, the average spell of sickness is probably about three weeks. We must take account of the likely expectation and experience and of the reduction in national insurance contributions. I will give some examples shortly which should ease my hon. Friend's anxieties and should also significantly ease the anxieties of the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses, which has not perhaps yet had the fullest opportunity to digest the reduction in national insurance contributions that I announced on 8 November.

Many of the early comments on the proposals have, not unnaturally, centred on the effect on employers. Before I refer to that, I want to refer briefly to the implication for employees and to emphasise that the changes in the Bill —I am not here talking about the other £100 million, for which there could be slightly different arguments—have no direct effect on employees. Their entitlement to particular payments remains entirely unchanged by the change in reimbursement and compensation arrangements for employers.

I am aware that it has been suggested in some quarters that it will in some way disadvantage disabled people by making employers less willing to take them on. Exactly the same was said when SSP in its present form was first introduced, and on the occasion of earlier changes, such as extending the period for which SSP is payable. I believe that those fears proved groundless in the past, and I see no reason to suppose that they are any better founded now. Indeed, we do not expect any change in the pattern of employment of people with disabilities as a result of these changes.

In general, people with disabilities do not have bad attendance records. Their records are likely to be as good as, if not better than, average. The 1984 general household survey showed that half of all people with disabilities in work took fewer than five days a year off work for sickness or treatment, and that, over a five-year period, half of them had not had a spell of sickness or treatment lasti a month. Consequently, there is no reason to suppose th employers' SSP liability for them would be any great than for the average employee.

My right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Securi and Disabled People shares my view that there are ma other factors of far greater importance in determining j opportunities for disabled people. Both the Department Social Security, and perhaps even more importantly t Department of Employment, have developed numero policies to seek to promote the employment of people wi disabilities. Those opportunities advanced in this Hou only four days ago when we debated the disability worki allowance proposals in the Bill that we discussed Wednesday, which we are hoping to bring into effect April 1992. That will certainly have more effect on t encouragement of disabled people to work and on scope for them to work than will the proposals that we discussing to day.

I come now to some of the points raised by my ho Friends about the position of employers under the Bill. is important to see its proposals in the context of reductions in national insurance contributions, to whic shall shortly refer, and which go a long way towa offsetting any additional costs arising from the reduc recovery arrangements.

Hon. Members who were here when SSP introduced in 1983—I confess that I was one of them think that I was the Under-Secretary serving on the —will recall that employers' organisations argued stron in favour of the sort of arrangements that we have no I would not want to disguise that fact. Their view entirely reasonable at the time, especially as the sche was new and an untried departure. After detai discussions, the Government agreed to provide for the per cent. recovery system.

It is equally and eminently reasonable for us to h taken a fresh look at the system, now that we have nea a decade of successful practical experience of the sche and in the light of other developments in and demands the social security system—that is what we are doing practice. In particular, we have examined the implicati of full reimbursement for employers with occupatio sick pay schemes.

Because SSP can be offset against occupational sick liability, and because employers can get back all the they pay, in some cases that reduces the amount of sick that employers would othewise pay anyway under t own schemes. So in some cases—I do not say in all— 100 per cent. recovery arrangements provide a posi financial advantage for employers. Now that SSP is bedded in, it is reasonable that we should examine extent of that and whether it is right to retain it in present form.

I know that some employers have argued that it is the employers' place to provide short-term sickness c for their employees. As I said earlier, and in my upra statement, I do not agree. That flies in the face of what been happening: a growing number of employers ac that it is their responsibility to be concerned short-term sickness among their employees.

I recognise that it is not always so easy for sm employers to provide the sort of cover that employe major companies provide, but many of them do so short-term, if not for long-term, sickness. Provisio occupational sick pay is now the norm, not the excep and as I told the hon. Member for Ladywood, when smaller employers do not operate formal schemes, they often make discretionary payments or continue full pay for short periods of sickness. We cannot quantify that as well as the hon. Member for Ladywood or I would like, but it does show that the hon. Lady was overstating what we might call the occupational sick pay gap.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): Will my right hon. Friend give particular consideration to the thousands of small firms that have been established under this Government's tenure of office? They will be especially affected by the legislation and they would like to think that the Minister will give them some consideration. They will be somewhat taken aback by these proposals.

Mr. Newton: I hope to do precisely that by giving some illustrative examples of what the position would be for a given number of employees earning the sort of sums that we might be discussing, taking account of the reduction in national insurance contributions that they would experience at the same time. I hope that that will be useful.

Somewhat different considerations apply in relation to the 7 per cent. additional compensation rate, which was introduced as part of the legislation which extended SSP from eight to 28 weeks. It was intended to compensate employers for the cost of the national insurance contributions that they pay on SSP. This part of the arrangements has been of only limited success. Despite wide publicity, as many as a quarter of employers do not claim it. Furthermore, in the interests of simplicity, it is available on all SSP paid, even when the total SSP is below the lower earnings limit, and so will not have attracted national insurance liability in the first place. I hope that I carry the hon. Member for Ladywood with me.

Now, the lower rate of statutory sick pay is £39·25 a week. The lower earnings limit is £46 a week. No national insurance liability arises on £39·25 a week, therefore, yet the current compensation arrangements compensate employers for a payment that they are not making. So this part of the arrangement is not very satisfactory; it has not been working well; and the justification for at least part of it is far from clear.

Ms. Short: My understanding is that part of the reason for the compensation was the administrative burden associated with reclaiming—especially for small firms. The Minister is talking as though he is recovering money, but are firms no longer to be compensated for the burden of administering statutory sick pay?

Mr. Newton: When the arrangements were first put in place and subsequently modified, a whole variety of arguments was advanced. Employers certainly mentioned the administrative problems that they might be caused, but most of them have discovered that the problem is much smaller than they had thought. Whatever the rationale behind the system at the time, this part of it has not worked very well and has no clear justification. It would certainly be difficult to see its justification in a case in which all the employees concerned were paid the lower rate of statutory sick pay, none of which attracted national insurance contributions. This is certainly not a tidy or defensible arrangement, and although I would not have tried to disturb it for its own sake, we thought it right to do so when drawing up the wider package of changes that I have just described.

Mr. Favell: Is the number of days off taken for sickness increasing or decreasing?

Mr. Newton: I cannot answer that off the cuff, but I shall ask my right hon. Friend and provide what information we have at the end of the debate.

It is important to put the hundreds of millions of pounds that we have been discussing in perspective. The amount involved in the reduction to 80 per cent. reimbursement from what is in effect, if not in legal terms, 107 per cent. now, is about £250 million in the coming financial year. That must be compared with total labour costs in the British economy of about £300 billion. We are talking about little more than 0·05 per cent. of total labour costs in the economy as a whole. We cannot dismiss it on that ground, but it is important to recognise that we are talking about a small sum in relation to the total cost of which it forms a part.

The implications for employers generally will be fairly small. The precise effects will obviously depend on the level of sickness experienced in a work force, but as I said, it should be remembered that, although SSP is payable for 28 weeks, the average spell of sickness lasts for only three weeks, and 90 per cent. of sickness is over within eight weeks. Crucially, whatever the gross effect of the Bill's changes, the net effect will be significantly smaller, perhaps in some case completely eliminated by the significant reduction in employers' national insurance contributions which will come into effect at the same time and are an important part of the context in which the Bill must be seen.

As a result of my annual review of the level of the national insurance fund and the prospective demands upon it, I found it possible to reduce the standard rates of national insurance payable by employers. I propose reducing the standard rate payable by employers from 10·45 to 10·4 per cent. More importantly, I propose to reduce the lower rates, which are currently 5, 7 and 9 per cent. in respect of employees earning up to £175 a week, to 4·6, 6·6 and 8·6 per cent. respectively.

Those changes will reduce employers' costs by about £250 million and, as I said in response to interventions, they are likely to be especially helpful to employers, often smaller employers, whose employees are among the less highly paid. For example, for an employee earning £70 a week, the employer's national insurance contribution will reduce by 28p a week. For an employee earning £120, the reduction will be 48p, and for an employee on £170, it will be 68p.

Those sums may seem small, and it seems sensible to give one or two illustrations of how the SSP and contribution changes interact. Let us look at a small employer with five employees each earning £170 a week. If one of them receives three weeks SSP in the year, which equates to the present average duration of sickness, the extra cost to the employer in SSP would be £82·41, assuming that he makes good the difference between the higher and lower rates of SSP with occupational sick pay. The employer would be making an annual saving on his national insurance contribution liability of £176·80, making him £94·39 better off.

I have taken a case in which only one employee had three weeks off, and that could be said to be an unduly favourable example. If the same employer had two members of his work force of five on three weeks' sickness in a year, he would still make a saving on additional SSP against reduced national insurance contributions of £11·98 a week. If an employer with 20 employees all earning £170 a week had four of them off sick for three weeks each, his average saving would be nearly £400—or, to be precise, £377·56

[Mr. Newton]

Ms. Short: If some firms gain, it inevitably means that others will lose.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Lady does not need to prompt me about matters that I intend to put to the House in the interests of a properly balanced debate.

The examples that I have given are reasonable illustrations of what will happen to smaller employers, but by definition they cannot represent the position of all employers. I agree that for some employers with rather higher-paid employees, and especially those immediately above the level that takes them into the standard rate of national insurance contributions—what will be the 10·4 per cent.—the position may not be quite like that which I have described. There is no way in which I can say that no employer will have some additional modest costs as a result of the proposals.

What I am seeking to do meets the main thrust of the arguments presented by my hon. Friends about smaller businesses and the National Federation of Self-Employed and Small Businesses. I am trying to show that it is entirely credible to suppose, in the light of the effect of national insurance contribution reductions, that some of the hasty comments by smaller employers are unlikely to be borne out in terms of additional burdens upon them. Some may find that they are better off. I note what the hon. Member for Ladywood said. I certainly do not want to give the impression that employers will always come out on top. My earlier macro-figures, the micro-figures that I gave within the last few minutes and what I said about the £250 million entitle me to say that, overall, any increase in employers' costs will be relatively modest.

Mr. Grylls: I am reluctant to intervene for the second time and run the risk of becoming a bore. Earlier I asked my right hon. Friend a question and he has omitted to answer it, no doubt accidentally. Has he consulted the Minister with responsibility for small businesses? If he had done that, he would have avoided criticism from the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses and other organisations. Has my right hon. Friend had such consultations, and if so, what did the Minister say? Has he considered a two-tier system reducing from 100 to 80 per cent. for large employers and down to 90 per cent. for smaller employers? My right hon. Friend will know of good examples of two-tier systems in legislation.

Mr. Newton: I shall take my hon. Friend's latter point first. I am always reluctant to rule out looking at anything, because, as my hon. Friend and the House know, I am willing to consider constructive suggestions. I hope that I have clearly shown that the way in which we have geared the reduction in national insurance contributions will be particularly advantageous to smaller employers. It would be difficult at the same time to go down the path of gearing the basic reimbursement arrangements so that they would also be especially favourable to small employers. Many of the advantages of a straightforward and simple operation of the scheme are in some ways enhanced by my proposa especially the one to get rid of the funny 7 per ce compensation arrangement. Those advantages would lost if we attempted to have different rates reimbursement for firms of different types and sizes.

I emphasise to my hon. Friend the Member for Surr North-West (Mr. Grylls) that I am not attempting evade his question about consultation. I hope that I ha not given that impression. He will be aware that proposals were developed during the public expenditu round that led to my uprating statement on 24 Octob They were examined in terms of the context, pattern a priorities of social security expenditure as a whole.

I make no apology for that, but it meant that, by very nature of the way in which the processes work, it v not possible to engage in advance in substan consultation. We shall be more than willing to listen a respond, as I have done in the debate, to representati on specific issues. In the debate and in future, I shall s to justify on their merits the general thrust of the propos and their basic structure and purpose.

We have made sure that all the relevant organisati have been put in the picture about our proposals. T have been sent copies of the Bill. If they want to m particular points to us, whether through my hon. Fri the Member for Surrey, North-West or in any other w I shall look at them. However, I do not wish to hold the hope that we shall move away from the basic thrus these proposals, which I believe are justified on the gro that I have given many times.

Mr. Battle: Does the Bill not include a power for Secretary of State to enact further reductions with having to come back to the Ho e for the matter to discussed? Is this not the last chance for us to discuss

Mr. Newton: The proposal is that there should b power to vary the rate, but not in a way that wo preclude parliamentary discussion.

Ms. Short: Not on a Government motion.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Lady is making the point the proposal in the Bill involves the negative rather t the affirmative procedure. The Opposition have n shown any reluctance to use the prayer as an instrum for parliamentary debate. It is unlikely that the Opposi would not wish a debate to take place. One can vote negative order, just as one can vote on an affirma order.

Ms. Short: Give us an affirmative order, then.

Mr. Newton: I do not know whether the hon. Lady have the chance to make a speech. She has made e point that she could make in interventions in mine. If ever gets the chance to make them in a connected for shall listen to them with proper interest. Fortunately, right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security Disabled People will be the Minister who will reply connected form.

Whether in a connected or in an unconnected for shall now move reasonable rapidly to bring my speec a conclusion. [HON. MEMBERS: "No."] Rare is it for House to demand to hear more of the Secretary of S for Social Security who has been going on more or les ever on a reasonably complicated and sometimes ar matter. I should feel guilty if I did not give the Member for Ladywood the chance to make her remarks in a connected form and for once to make them standing rather than sitting.

Ms. Short: I have not done badly.

Mr. Newton: No, the hon. Lady has not done badly. I congratulate her on her self-restraint. Let us see whether it continues for the rest of the debate.

I think that the House will be pleased, although I began to doubt that a moment ago, to know that I am nearing the end of my long speech, or what might be seen as a long series of answers to interventions. Before I reach the end, I must say something about statutory maternity pay, which is another relevant point, although it is not covered by the Bill.

In my uprating statement, I said as part of the background to these proposals, that it was no longer sensible for the development of statutory sick pay and of statutory maternity pay to go hand in hand. There is much less occupational cover for maternity leave than there is for sickness, and in that case, the level of reimbursement will remain at 100 per cent. for SMP, with compensation payable at an appropriate rate for the contributions payable on SP.

As I said in my statement, that separation has the advantage of enabling me to treat the SMP rate differently as well. I propose to increase the flate rate element of SMP by rather more than the full RPI increase—by £1 a week over the rate of inflation—so that it will go up by £5·05, from £39·25 to £44·50. I have made a parallel increase in the residual national insurance maternity allowance, which will be raised from £35·70 to £40·60.

Looking at what is provided as part of the even wider package—looking at SMP, which is not covered by the Bill, as well as SSP, some of the proposals on which are covered—there is overall the additional ingredient of a real increase in benefit for some 315,000 mothers-to-be, which has been widely welcomed. I have to acknowledge that that is only an incidental advantage of these proposals, although it is an important one.

The main point is the one that I made in the uprating statement and have reiterated today, making it as clear as I can. Against the background of the many demands on social security and the development of occupational cover for short-term sickness, the resources of the taxpayer should be more clearly concentrated on those least likely to have occupational provision or on other areas of social security for which employers cannot be expected to provide. That is the objective of the Bill, and I commend it to the House.

5.14 pm

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): We have just listened to an extremely long and agonised defence of the Bill. I think that I will carry the whole House with me when I say that that speech has not increased the Bill's credibility.

Perhaps the most charitable thing that can be said about this mean, nasty and unnecessary little Bill is that it is a hangover from the Thatcherite era. Like the author of that era, it is harsh on the low-paid, especially women. It bases its rationale on a selective and highly misleading interpretation of the evidence and it ignores facts where they are inconvenient. I have not heard such a dishonest and deceitful defence by a Secretary of State for a considerable time. The length of his speech was in inverse proportion to the credibility of the Bill.

The Bill pushes further still the prejudice of "public sector bad, private sector good", even when the employers passionately disagree. Here we have the authentic mark of Thatcherism, as the Secretary of State, a member of the Cabinet, will agree. It is being foisted autocratically on people, without a shred of consultation. When the right hon. Member says that he will listen to arguments in future, but the remaining stages of the Bill are being rushed through on Wednesday, his assurance does not carry much conviction. It shows how anxious the Government are to push through the Bill before systematic opposition to it can be mounted. If the Prime Minister wanted a squalid little memorial to her reign, this could be it.

The effect of the changes that the Secretary of State has outlined, according to an answer given by the Under-Secretary of State two weeks ago, is that 3 million employees with earnings between £125 and £175 a week will no longer be eligible for the higher rate of statutory sick pay if they fall sick after 6 April next year. About one fifth of that number, or about 600,000 people, are expected to claim statutory sick pay annually, and they will lose an average £9 a week. Because low-paid workers are primarily the victims of these measures, 60 per cent. of all the losers are expected to be women.

I should add immediately that these cuts next year are not new, nor the first. Similar cuts were imposed on sick employees only a few months ago. In April this year, the Secretary of State removed nearly 2 million workers earning between £90 and £125 a week from eligibility for higher rate SSP. Of those, about 300,000 are expected to claim SSP annually, and they are losing an average of £13 a week each week. As many as three quarters of those losers are expected to be women.

The Bill is part of a clear pattern. The number of losers and the amounts that they will lose are even greater this year, but the pattern of whittling down the sick pay rights of those on low incomes has already been set. There is every reason to suspect that the Government will continue the process of erosion each year that they remain in power. The Secretary of State glided over this point, so I invite him, if he wishes to take time from my speech, despite the length of his, to give the House a guarantee that there will be no further cuts. We are interested to know the Government's intentions. Does the right hon. Gentleman wish to intervene? He does not. We can draw our own conclusions from that.

There is another striking fact about the Bill: the Secretary of State has the support of no one in introducing it, which is fairly rare. The Confederation of British Industry, the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses, the Trades Union Congress, trade unions and voluntary bodies such as the Low Pay Unit and the Disability Alliance do not support the Bill. I suppose that it is a true Thatcherite Bill—two fingers to the rest of the country, the Prime Minister is right and everyone else has got it wrong.

The Bill does not even have the support of the Government's adviser, the Social Security Advisory Committee. Because the Government have not consulted about the Bill, the SSAC has not had a chance to comment on these proposals. It gave its view on the April 1990 changes which, as I said, were on almost exactly the same lines as the Bill's provisions. Like the Bill, those changes increased the higher rate pay threshold by much more than inflation. The SSAC opposed that because the majority of the losers were women and "a significant number" of the losers would not have occupational sick pay cover and would be significantly worse off if they had to claim statutory sick pay.

[Mr. Michael Meacher]

Like the Bill, those changes in April 1990 increased the higher rate benefit by less than inflation. The SSAC opposed that a year ago because it would impose additional financial burdens on businesses, because employers would be less willing to employ disabled people and those with poor health records and because employers who did not have their own sick pay schemes might be deterred from introducing them. Those were comprehensive and compelling reasons for rejecting the April 1990 changes. They are no less comprehensive and compelling reasons for rejecting these further measures in the Bill and, I repeat, they are the reasons given by the Government's advisory body.

As the Secretary of State has no supporters for the Bill —except, of course, the Treasury—I turn to his reasons for introducing it. In his uprating statement and again today, the right hon. Gentleman gave three reasons. He said that statutory sick pay rates were irrelevant because of the expansion of private occupational sick pay coverage—the crucial point about which we had so many exchanges. On 24 October, the right hon. Gentleman said:

"Occupational sick pay schemes have grown to such an extent that more than 90 per cent. of the work force now work for employers providing this cover . . . This in turn means that, for the great majority of those in work, the rates of SSP bear little or no relation to the amount that they actually receive when sick."—[Official Report, 24 October 1990; Vol. 178, c. 349.]

As the Opposition made clear repeatedly, the right hon. Gentleman was citing a 1988 survey, but in such a selective and grossly misleading manner that his defence of it was extremely deceitful and unworthy of him—[HON. MEMBERS "No."] It was unworthy of him. I have great respect for the right hon. Gentleman's integrity, but today he was trying to defend the indefensible, and it showed. A series of interventions by my hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) and others of my hon. Friends completely undermined the basis of his case.

The Secretary of State mentioned the increase in the number of employers offering some sort of private scheme, but he did not say—these are the facts—that substantial numbers of employees are not covered by such schemes. He did not respond to my point. I said that the survey showed that 44 per cent. of private sector employers did not offer any form of occupational sick pay provision. Worse still, it is in the hazardous industries, such as mining and construction, where sick pay provision is most needed, that it is least likely to be available. Moreover, more than half the firms with fewer than 10 employees—these firms are growing the fastest—have no sick pay scheme.

The picture is even more patchy than that. Of those firms that have schemes, half of private sector and two thirds of public sector employers operate exclusion clauses. The Secretary of State said little about exclusion clauses even where there are such things. They limit the coverage to certain groups of employees in terms of their length of service, hours of work, grade of job, age or earnings; a range of exclusions cut the cover that people have. Nearly three quarters of all employees are potentially affected by these exclusions. The Se State continues to use the extremely deceptive fi per cent. That is unworthy of a Government s defend a Bill when it is the hinge on which to ju proposals.

All this evidence shows that, when the Sec State said again today that 91 per cent. of the w now work for employers providing occupationa cover, he is being extremely Jesuitical. In fact, a s proportion of the work force—the right hon. G would not hazard a guess, but the percentage is several times larger than the 9 per cent. he implies covered by occupational sick pay provision and the state SSP scheme on which to fall back. Friend the Member for Ladywood hazarded a gu the number, and I suspect that we may be talking million to 15 million workers. The Bill is a majo of their employment rights.

Mr. Newton: Despite my obvious disagreem several of the hon. Gentleman's points, I have n to intervene frequently in his speech. I do not thi can mean that the Bill is a major erosion of peop These proposals do not affect the rights of any If I understand the point aright, the remarks hon. Gentleman just made—indeed, almost that he said—have absolutely nothing to do wit

Mr. Meacher: The right hon. Gentleman i logic. He knows perfectly well that I am referr whole package of measures. I am not talking s about clause 1. This is a narrowly drawn Bill. hon. Gentleman knows that we are discu provision of sick pay for employees and the which that is done.

Mr. Newton: It is important to clear up this hon. Gentleman said that I chose my words ca though that were an accusation. I do not thin would want to mislead anyone. I did not try referring to other parts of the package in my spe very least, when speaking about the effect of th important that the hon. Gentleman should c words carefully.

I advert to a point on which I might have earlier. The hon. Gentleman apparently assu merely because the higher rate of SSP is not bei this year, all those who might be affected by th are somehow losers. Whatever may lie betwee the hon. Gentleman would have to accept th number of those people will not be affected be will get back in occupational sick pay what the received by way of an increase in SSP. Gentleman needs to weigh some of his w accusations more carefully.

Mr. Meacher: On the right hon. Gentlema point, because he could not give a precise occupational sick pay cover, he cannot be sure he says is accurate. We do not know the numbe who will be disadvantaged by the Bill and who occupational sick pay cover. That is pre objection. We have good reason to believe th number of people will lose.

In response to the right hon. Gentleman's fi shall gladly change the word "Bill" to "package equally gladly admit that his justification for th 91 per cent. was inaccurate and that the figure needs to be changed. We are talking not simply of a change of word, but of a change of meaning in the background to the Bill. If the right hon. Gentleman will make that change and acknowledge the inaccuracy of what he was trying to convey, I shall gladly change one word.

The right hon. Gentleman's justification for the Bill fell back on his old friend "targeting". Just as most people are suspicious when the generals talk about military intelligence—which many people regard as a contradiction in terms—when the Tories talk about social targeting, we are entitled to react with similar suspicion. The right hon. Gentleman said in his uprating statement:

"it is better for additional resources from the taxpayer to be concentrated more clearly on those least likely to have occupational provision, or in other areas of social security for which employers cannot be expected to provide."—[Official Report, 24 October 1990; Vol. 178, c. 349.]

As so often happens when the Tories talk about targeting, the effect will be the opposite of what they predict. Instead of concentrating more resources on workers least likely to have occupational sick pay provision, the Bill will increase discrimination against the potentially sick and the disabled at the point of recruitment. That is a key point. The net effect of the changes will be to increase the net cost to employers in general if an employee falls sick. Obviously, employers will be all the more wary of recruiting anyone whom they feel, whether rightly or wrongly, may become ill or who may be more frequently ill than the average. There is already clear evidence of that, and it shows what the effect of the Bill will be. A study carried out for the Spastics Society entitled "An equal chance for disabled people?" found systematic evidence of the most blatant discrimination by employers.

There is other evidence to show that the right hon. Gentleman is wrong to claim that the Bill will target more aid on those most in need. A substantial number of workers are not covered by occupational sick pay schemes, and they are most likely to be the low paid, part-time workers, or low-grade manual workers. That is also the group that is most vulnerable to abuse by employers trying to evade their legal obligations under the SSP schemes. That was revealed by a report published in 1986, which drew on the experience of citizens advice bureaux throughout the country. It concluded:

"There have been clear instances of deliberate employer abuse of the responsibility to administer SSP. Employees have been told that their firm does not operate SSP, and have been pressurised into becoming self-employed, unemployed, or waiving their right to SSP. There have also been cases of employees being refused statutory sick pay outright, having their medical evidence of incapacity rejected, or simply being dismissed so that the employer can avoid payment."

The right hon. Gentleman said earlier that the SSP scheme was firmly bedded in, and that that justified the further changes being made. The report, in 1986—admittedly that is four years ago, but I doubt whether all the problems have been resolved—says that, far from being bedded in, it is still working improperly.

Mr. Alexander: The hon. Gentleman's allegations are serious and they need to be considered seriously. Does he have information about where those instances happened, and does he know whether complaints were made at the time that sick pay was refused?

Mr. Meacher: I was quoting a survey by the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux, which I regard as an extremely reputable organisation. It is supported on both sides of the House. It engages in very thorou investigations. It has 900 or more offices throughout t country and it systematically collects data from those w come to its bureaux for assistance. The people who wo for that organisation are well trained, and in considera detail. I know that, because my daughter is one of the The bureaux do not accept reports or anecdotes at seco hand. A NACAB report can be relied upon and must accepted as true.

I shall cite three typical examples from the report. T first reads:

"Mrs. J. works for a private employer. She was not t about the procedure for claiming statutory sick pay. H employer has now refused to pay her statutory sick p because she had not notified him within seven days."

That is one example of an improper and, I suspect, illeg response by an employer.

The second example is:

"Mrs. N. is an embassy worker earning above the natio insurance lower earnings limit and in full-time work. She h been off sick for three weeks and her employers had advis her that she was not entitled to statutory sick pay or a sickness pay from them."

In fact, the rights office advised the woman to take up t matter with her employers, and statutory sick pay was th paid. However, we must ask how many cases of that so of response from an employer do not lead to peop seeking advice from the rights office and having the matt put right.

The third example is:

"Mr. I. was employed as a driver for a small firm. H earned less than £80 for a 45-hour working week. H employer refused to pay holiday pay and no sick pay schem is in operation. When Mr. I had been off sick for four day his employer dismissed him."

When the right hon. Gentleman seeks to justify the B by saying that he is targeting the low paid, perhaps w should take him at his word because it is the low paid wh will be the victims of the Bill. The right hon. Gentleman right on one point. It is ironic that he may be correct saying that statutory sick pay rates bear little relation the amount that workers receive, because millions low-paid workers are getting nothing.

The right hon. Gentleman did no better with his thi and last rationale for the Bill. It is a matter of great concern to Tory Members than to Opposition Membe that employers will be compensated for reduced sta reimbursement through offsetting reductions in the rate employers' national insurance contributions. He offere no rationale for reducing state reimbursement employers from 100 per cent. to 80 per cent. I do not thin that there is any rationale, other than the saving to th Treasury of £180 million—a figure that will grow durin the next few years.

The right hon. Gentleman also said in his upratin statement that he would reduce employers' lower an standard rate contributions, and concluded that that "will go some considerable way in helping employer particularly smaller employers who tend to have lower-pai employees, to meet any extra costs which might otherwi arise from the new arrangements."—[Official Report, 2 October 1990; Vol. 178, c. 349-50.]

The right hon. Gentleman has expanded on thos remarks at considerable length today, but, as Conservativ Members have said, that is not how it appears to th smaller employers. The National Federation of Se Employed and Small Businesses, in a brief that it ha supplied widely throughout the House, said that it was "strongly opposed to the proposed changes."

[Mr. Meacher]

It gave eight reasons for that. It may be of some relief to hon. Members if I say that I intend to cite only the first two, but as they come from that source they are worth stating clearly. The first reason is:

"When statutory sick pay was first introduced in the early 1980s, the national federation won an agreement from the Government that at no time would employers be asked to foot any of the statutory sick pay payments. With this new measure the same Government have broken that new agreement"— and the federation adds in capital letters—

"WITHOUT CONSULTATION."

It is not often that I agree with Conservative Members, but the employers are wholly correct about that. From 1979 to 1981, the Government made a series of different proposals to statutory sick pay, giving less than 100 per cent. compensation to employers. Each of those proposals was unsatisfactory, and was heavily and intensely lobbied against by the employers' organisations. As a result, on 15 October 1981, the right hon. Gentleman's predecessor as Secretary of State announced at the Tory party conference that the Government would provide 100 per cent. compensation, despite their previous opposition to doing so.

That situation has prevailed until now, and—not surprisingly—employers are angry with the Government for reneging on the agreement, and without consulting the relevant parties. Fortunately for the Secretary of State, he does not have to stand for re-election either by social security claimants or employers. Even the gerrymandered rules of the Tory leadership election would not save the right hon. Gentleman from either of those factions venting their spleen.

The second reason of the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses for opposing the Bill is that it sees

"this measure as the thin end of the wedge. If reimbursement is 80 per cent. this year, then once the precedent is set, Government will find it easier to move to 60 per cent. next year and 40 per cent. the year after until employers foot the whole SSP payment. The same thing happened on redundancy rebates."

The same progressive rundown occurred also in the Exchequer contribution to the national insurance fund, from 18 per cent. to nothing. So there are certainly precedents for the Government's current action.

As this is the Second Reading of the Bill and we are examining its full implications, perhaps the Secretary of State can say what are the Government's intentions for a progressive reduction in the reimbursement made to employers.

Mr. Newton: The answer is simple, and the hon. Gentleman could have guessed it for himself. We have no plans to make further changes, but given the way that matters have been developing and the continuing need to examine priorities across the whole spectrum of social security, it seems sensible to have a provision that is capable of being changed. However, there is no plan to make any further change. There is no drawer in my desk containing papers with figures pencilled in for future years. Nevertheless, I will not rule out further consideration of that aspect. It would be foolish for either me or the hon. Gentleman to do so.

Mr. Meacher: Without the right hon. admitting that the Government have such an in could not really have gone further.

Mr. Newton: A large part of the social secur including nearly all the rates of benefit—quite the whole range of other rules—is in a form th lock it into primary legislation, so that chan made by secondary legislation. Governme complexions have acknowledged that that is a s of dealing with social security matters. I say no that. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not some vast, elaborate edifice out of the normal a for dealing with social security matters.

Mr. Meacher: The right hon. Gentleman a his words very carefully, for which I do not blam took great pains not to rule out further chang only that he does not have any plans to changes. I recall the right hon. Member Coldfield (Sir N. Fowler) saying once that he h to make fundamental changes to the pensions a couple of years later he brought forward a pr would almost have ended the state earni pension scheme. Such is the lack of credibility t attach to Ministers' statements.

Of course, the right hon. Gentleman doe something hidden in the drawer of his desk, bu that his officials and civil servants will not revea next stage of their plan until the Bill has been clear that the Government have every in reducing reimbursement below 80 per cent. an quite soon.

The federation makes its threat pretty clear Bill

"goes through, employers will look very closely a they employ. The health record will be a prime choosing an employee."

That is an extremely revealing sentence. The em that if the Bill passes into law, they will be careful about who they employ, and will decisions on the basis of an applicant's hea Anyone with a poor health record or a poor p good health for the future will be unlikely to

Mr. James Cran (Beverley): Will the hon. take it from me, as one who has been closely industrial representations, that it is not un representative bodies to make relatively claims about the likely effect of proposed leg order to influence the Government in a very Does the hon. Gentleman concede that extrava have been made in the past by almost every rep body one can think of, and that that will happen? Does not the hon. Gentleman know th between such representations and common se

Mr. Meacher: The hon. Gentleman clearly s experience. When he says that the representati made to the Government on behalf of th region's Confederation of British Industry shou been taken at face value because they dishonestly exaggerated a point in order t Government policy, he is letting the cat out o a big way.

Dr. John G. Blackburn (Dudley, West): Will the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) confirm the date of the representations to which he refers?

Mr. Meacher: The federation's representations are date-stamped 15 November, which is 11 days ago. Unless the hon. Gentleman is suggesting that the federation has changed its mind, which I doubt, we can assume that they represent the current view of small employers.

The effects of the Bill on prospective employees who have poor health records could hardly be plainer or more worrying. It is no comfort to hear the Secretary of State keep repeating that he will reduce employers' national insurance contributions by one quarter of 1 per cent. The effect could be exaggerated for many small employers if they were confronted by a statutory sick pay payment for up to a maximum of 28 weeks. The National Farmers Union, whose members are probably the largest employers of low-paid workers in the country, stated in a submission dated 14 November:

"The combination of these changes will increase employers' costs for sickness payments by £26·50 per week for employees earning between £125 and £174·99 per week and by £19·90 per week for employees earning £175 or more. These are very significant additional costs for many hard pressed small employers, and they will only be partially offset by the proposed small reductions in National Insurance contributions."

The right hon. Gentleman appears to take a different view, but I quoted the National Farmers Union view, and I look to it for a serious examination of these proposals.

The right hon. Gentleman has achieved a remarkable feat today by creating a unanimous front against the Bill. He has even achieved a situation in which the employers are arguing the case for national insurance—I really did not think that that was possible. If I may quote the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses for the last time, it said that most "of Britain's businesses employ less than 20 people, and do not have the resources to take on their employees health insurance, that is why national insurance was first introduced."

It is certainly ironic that the Government have chosen to effect this latest erosion of accepted national insurance principles, and to impose a further financial burden of up to £11 or more a week for a maximum of 28 weeks, at the very time when there is an accelerating recession and small businesses are going down like ninepins.

The Bill clearly signals the Government's intention to allow this vital area of social security provision to be removed from the state sector and to be left entirely to the discretion of employers—Opposition Members would say that in many cases it was left to proven abuses by employers.

The right hon. Gentleman's rationale for the measure does not stand up, even to the most superficial analysis. The Bill is unanimously disliked by all the relevant parties, and it has been forced on him by the Treasury. He said that the Bill would pay for other measures, such as residential home charges. I suppose that this is the sick paying for the elderly—the poor paying for the poor. If he does not stand up to that sort of Treasury attack, he should not hold that post. There has been much discrimination by the Government in favour of the rich, and it is quite wrong for the right hon. Gentleman to talk about priorities and to make the poor pay for other benefits for the poor. If he either will not or cannot stand up to the Treasury, we shall certainly stand up to it in the Lobby tonight.

5.52 pm

Mr. Patrick Nicholls (Teignbridge): When my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State opened the debate some one and a half hours ago, he pointed out that the Bill is extremely short and for that reason he felt that it should be commended. I agree entirely with my right hon. Friend. The Bill is refreshingly short, and as such compares very favourably with other Bills with which I have recently been involved. Given my interest in social security matters, I should like to think that Bills will always be that short, but I suspect that I may be wrong.

The style demonstrated by the Department was also refreshing. My right hon. Friend made a full speech—as was necessary in such a case—yet he knows that any points of detail that might arise can at once be referred to his right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People. That was splendid. Having been in his position, although in a less exalted post, I wish my right hon. Friend well, and I look forward to hearing his reply to various points of detail at the end of the debate.

The Bill deals with social security matters. One cannot begin to understand its scope without placing it in a general context. My right hon. Friend referred to the general context of the Bill and its perspective. When discussing what is clearly a valuable but also fairly modest measure, it is all too easy to forget what sort of budget we are dealing with. The social security budget approaches £63 billion a year—a truly vast sum of money. One cannot begin to get to grips with the scope of the Bill until one realises the totality of the expenditure involved. It is an extraordinary sum. A Labour Government would have been proud if it had been able to devote such resources to those who are most in need.

In case the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) is trying to work out the increase that that figure represents compared with the miserable performance of the Government in which he served as a Minister with responsibility for social security with such a lack of distinction, it amounts to about 41 per cent. in real terms, after taking account of inflation.

That is the context in which we should view the Bill, but what is its contribution? [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) is howling from a sedentary position as usual—obviously one of her disconnected remarks. It will be useful to hear what she has to say later.

We cannot begin to assess the worth of the Bill unless we bear in mind its general context. I do not want to detain the House long, as I know that other hon. Members want to take part in the debate. I can see that the hon. Lady has a series of disconnected remarks that she wants to offer to the House. However, I can usefully point out a number of issues.

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: I hope that my hon. Friend will make it clear that he is referring to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) and not to me, his colleague.

Mr. Nicholls: Let me save both my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster (Dame E. Kellett-Bowman) and the hon. Member for Ladywood any embarrassment. I am sure that if I accused either of being the other they would both sue me for libel, were it not for the fact that any remarks that I make are privileged. I accept entirely what my hon. Friend the Member for Lancaster says. I had the hon. Member for Ladywood in mind.

[Mr. Nicholls]

When discussing such expenditure, we must bear in mind the fact that we are not in a position to spend the money until it has been raised. Clearly, we are talking about massive sums. It is interesting that the hon. Member for Oldham, West, in his last few words, could not resist once again presenting our policy in terms of the rich and poor, and talking about the allocation of resources from the poor to the wealthy. That is the constant theme in his remarks. It is deja vu. The last time that I took part in a social security debate was in the previous Parliament. I remember the hon. Gentleman replying on behalf of the Opposition. It is extraordinary that the speech that he gave on that occasion was precisely the same as the speech that he made today. Perhaps one should never accuse a politician of being at fault because he is being consistent, but the trouble is that the hon. Gentleman is consistently wrong.

The hon. Gentleman talks about the rich and the reallocation of resources, but can we bear it in mind that the money that is necessary for social security expenditure —sickness pay or whatever—has to be raised from the taxpayer? Although the idea that one can have Christmas 365 days a year by wrecking the rich is part of the hon. Gentleman's general attitude, the reality of raising money for all the things that we want it to be spent on is that it will not come from the rich. There are simply not enough rich people to get the amount of money that the hon. Gentleman needs. About 90 per cent. of the money raised in income tax by the Treasury comes from basic rate taxpayers, not from rich people paying higher rate tax, such as the hon. Gentleman and myself. When we are talking about social security and about expenditure totalling £63 billion, we have to remember that we owe it to the people from whom we take the money to ensure that expenditure is targeted on those who need it most.

One of the impressive aspects of the Bill, and the policy underlying it, is that it does not shirk the necessity to spend vast sums of the public's money on social security, but it does something about targeting money on those who clearly need help.

The hon. Gentleman made great play of the Bill's effect upon employers. He quoted from various studies, which showed that employers were concerned about the measure. It was remarkable that it had to be pointed out to the hon. Gentleman that the Bill deals not with the amount of sickness pay but with the mechanism for reimbursement —the difference between 80 per cent. and 100 per cent. We are talking about the contributions that employers might be required to make to statutory sickness pay.

It says something about the hon. Gentleman's acquaintance with the day-to-day business of employment that, when he has to consider the rights and wrongs of asking for a fairly modest contribution from employers towards statutory sickness pay, he can offer us only a litany of faults and errors, which he attributes to the employer community. Whether the hon. Gentleman is talking about social security, employment or trade unions, the moment he mentions the employer community, he cites the worst examples that he can think of. The hon. Gentleman's only contribution to the subject is not to talk about the average employer's relationship employee as he does not want to know merely to talk about bad employers—the he feels will go out to take advantage of pe fend for themselves because of sickness.

Such employers obviously exist, but i base criticism of the Bill on the fact that worst employer to behave worse than he Such prejudice and misunderstanding is u Gentleman.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West a hon. Friend the Secretary of State for so cent. of employees are employed by emp some form of sickness pay. The hon. "Don't give us those figures, let us look instead. I am not sure what they are, but them instead; they will be much worse." he went through a number of docum understood, cobbled together a numbe found one hard, constant figure that must can consider figures, cut them, recut th them, re-present them and make ther anything one wants. That is a measu Gentleman's prejudice, but, as my right h the starting point must be that 91 per ce are covered by a scheme.

Statutory sick pay covers the first 28 w but on average it covers not 28 weeks but In the context of whether employers' co improved, it must be asked: w is th when it is looking after taxpayer's money for an average of three weeks, the state sh relationship between employer and em "Even for a period of only three weeks, bond between employer and employee ar a matter for the state"?

The hon. Member for Oldham, West employers have a role to play or that t responsibilities. Time after time, he says must always be on the state and that it s matter of personal responsibility betwee another.

It is unfair to criticise the hon. Mem West for his lack of experience in govern out that his experience was more than a d he had recent experience of being a sm would realise that it is unreal to think th resent having to make a modest contribu sick pay for an employee who performs a is easy to say when it is considered acade ways, this place passes for an ivory towe perfect sense when preparing one's remar or the Library, but it makes no sen considered against the reality of what hap employer and an employee. That again sh Gentleman cannot remove the idea of bad his mind.

What is wrong in saying that for a period—an average of three or four wee should be asked to make a contribution? I say that, in the past, it was said that under would be 100 per cent. reimbursement, what can happen in practice and the fact t to try to work out where resources must

It has been suggested that, if the schem it will discriminate against employe otherwise employ sick people. I have news for the hon. Member for Oldham, West. I hope that he will remember, as my right hon. Friend said, that the sickness record of disabled people is extremely good. Anyone who considers the figures will find that they have much to offer. The statistics on their average time away from work show that they are an extremely good bet.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West thinks that employers will go out looking for sick people to employ, but as a result of the Bill will suddenly stop employing them. That is simply unreal. Employers do not go out looking for ill people and say to them, "I shall take you on, but if I have to make a modest contribution towards SSP for a short period I shall not have you on my books." That is complete nonsense, but it does not matter to the hon. Gentleman. He finds the fact that it is complete nonsense positively attractive, because once again it panders to his prejudice, and his almost obsession, that employers will always act from the worst of motives.

The Bill makes a modest but worthwhile contribution and points to the direction that we should be taking. Nevertheless, one theme underlies it, on which for a short period—short enough not to embarrass either of us—the hon. Member for Oldham, West and I might be able to share some agreement. In a more general way—it has to be general for the hon. Gentleman—the Bill is about how we care for people who need care. It forms part of the massive process of public expenditure.

Surely we do those who need the help of state benefits a disservice by holding out the prospect of help and assistance on a scale which is completely unreal and which does not take account of the fact that the money to pay for it must be raised, or by painting a picture that in some way far greater benefits are available. Time and again, we hear Opposition Members say that, if they were restored to power, they would restore the earnings link with pensions. Although that point relates to old-age pensions, it is closely tied to this because it is all about promising more than can be delivered.

The hon. Member for Oldham, West must live with the fact that he was a member of the previous Labour Government who introduced the earnings link for retirement pensions but who failed to implement it in three out of four years. What is best—to set modest targets that we can deliver and fulfil, or to set out a stall of benefits and promises which are tawdry in the extreme and which can never be honoured? I know what attitude I feel more comfortable with. I know what disabled people in my constituency need and what those who are in need of assistance prefer—honesty. In the presentation of the Bill, they have honesty, but if they want the alternative they can read the remarks of the hon. Member for Oldham, West.

6.8 pm

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): The hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls) said that this was the first time that he had spoken in this Parliament on social security matters. It is a consolation to realise that the House has lost little by his imposed silence.

The strange conclusion that the hon. Gentleman reached about pensions was unfortunate. When the last Labour Government took office, the amount paid in pensions increased from 17·5 per cent. of average male earnings to 20·5 per cent. Under the Thatcher Government, it has decreased to 16·5 per cent. The Conservative party has a disgraceful record on bas pensions. The more Conservative Members crow abou what they did, the more that people become antagonist towards them.

The hon. Member for Teignbridge completely misse the point on some matters. He spoke of vast sums, but th Secretary of State spoke of the minute sum of money tha is involved in the Bill. He said that it amounts to 0·05 pe cent. of the wages bill. It sounds a small amount, but fo the worst-off it amounts to £181 million.

Many millions of people collected money last weeken for Children in Need. Many of us supported the campaig and contributed towards it. If the campaign is mor successful than it was last year, the total sum collected ma amount to £30 million. We are talking about six times tha figure. However, the public believe that they have done great deal for children in need, that they have solved th problem and that children do not need social security. might be a good idea if that day were to be christene Thatcher day, in remembrance of the millions of childre whom she has put into need during her years in powe

The Secretary of State made a curious comment abou the disabled. He said that they will not be adversel affected by the Bill. Where is his evidence for tha assertion? Every organisation that contacted hon Members told a different story. The Disability Allianc Educational and Research Association, which covers whole range of groups that look after and lobby for peopl with disabilities, says:

"The withdrawal of the full reimbursement of employe for their payments of SSP and the proposed changes in th structure and level of SSP payments mark an unjustifiabl retraction of state responsibility"— not that the hon. Member for the middle ages woul recognise that; state responsibility is a fairly moder concept, which has been with us since about 1911—

"resulting in increased hardship and insecurity for many o the most vulnerable workers."

The Disability Alliance points to the additional powe that the Secretary of State will take. Statutory sick pay i a Government-initiated scheme, but salami cuts have gon on year after year. A very large cut is now to be made. Th Secretary of State refused to confirm that he intends t phase it out and reduce its effect altogether.

The Disability Alliance also says:

"Two large-scale recent surveys looking at the employ ment status of people with disabilities revealed that th average earnings of people with disabilities is significantl lower than those of the general population and that disable workers are more likely to be working part time and in lowe grade occupations."

The myth peddled today is that employers are looking fo people with disabilities. That is far from the truth. Th Secretary of State said that people with disabilities have good attendance record, but that is not the genera perception. Disabled people find it very difficult to obtai employment. The Disability Alliance says:

"These groups are most likely, therefore, to be excluded from private schemes and have to depend entirely on the stat SSP scheme. The Disability Alliance fear that increasing th cost to employers of administering SSP will encourage greate discrimination against all workers, particularly those with th most severe disabilities."

There was a bold plan a few years ago under whic companies, Government Departments and all othe employers were to employ at least 3 per cent. registere disabled, but the reality is a disgraceful picture throughou industry. How many disabled people do Governmen Departments employ? In 1986, the Home Office employe

[Mr. Paul Flynn]

0·5 per cent., when it should have employed 3 per cent. However, there has been a decrease in the number of registered disabled people employed: from 0·5 per cent. to 0·3 per cent.—one tenth of what it should be. The Government Department average is only a disgraceful 1·3 per cent. Even the Department of Social Security employs only 1·5 per cent. registered disabled. It is a sorry record. If Government Departments believe that the attendance record of disabled people is good, why do they not give them jobs?

The most detailed picture I have of any Government Department is, not surprisingly, the Welsh Office. The percentage of disabled people whom the Welsh Office has employed since 1980 is a revealing figure. The Secretary of State said that there is no shred of evidence that the introduction of the statutory sick pay scheme had had any effect on the employment of disabled people. In 1980, 1981, and 1982, 2·3 per cent. were employed. From that year onwards, there has been a decline: 2·1 per cent., 1·4 per cent., 1·5 per cent., 1·3 per cent. In 1989, it stood at 1·1 per cent. Statutory sick pay was introduced in 1983, which was when the decline began.

The whole point that the hon. Member for the middle ages missed in his cheap and snide diatribe against my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) was that the basis of the scheme has already disappeared, that it is dead and has joined the choir invisible. We made that point twice at least in the Chamber during two stages of the last Social Security Bill. The report—now old, dog-eared and tattered—was published in 1988 and was based on previous research.

I vividly remember the proceedings on the Social Security Bill. After comprehensively going through the report, I pointed to its weaknesses. I was accused unfairly at the time, by the Minister of State, of quoting selectively from the report, but I quoted every possible conclusion in the report to make my point.

The Secretary of State says that he is not deceitful when he uses the figure of 91 per cent. If he is not deceitful, it was extremely fortunate that he should choose to take that figure. He constructed his sentence in such a way as to make it appear that that large percentage of the work force are covered by decent occupational schemes. He failed even to make a guess about the percentage today. If he does not know what it is, nobody knows.

My hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West pointed out that the report on occupational schemes painted a sorry picture of inadequate schemes that did not cover the most vulnerable. I referred earlier to the fact that, in the private sector, only 56 per cent. of employees are covered by sick pay schemes. Those who are employed in the mining and construction industries, who face the most serious and crippling accidents, are even less well-off. Only 43 per cent. of them are covered by sick pay schemes.

Only 49 per cent. of small employers with 10 employees operate sick pay schemes, but many employees are excluded from them. At least half the employees in the private sector and two thirds of employees in the public sector are excluded. The most common exclusions are recent recruits, since the qualifying period is between three and 12 months. Part timers are also excluded. It is during the first few months in a job, when people are unfamiliar with machinery, that accidents occur. That is especially true in retailing. A large number of the employees are low-paid, part-time women employees.

Only 19 per cent. of private sector schemes and only 22 per cent. of public sector schemes pay sick pay throughout the whole of the six-month period covered by the statutory sick pay scheme. Large numbers of low-paid workers will be asked to rely on inadequate schemes.

Conservative Members are great believers in myths. The hon. Member for Stockport (Mr. Favell) referred in two interventions to his belief that the whole purpose of the Bill is to punish the sick because they go sick. He referred to a report about certain local authorities in London. I suggest that he study it in more detail. If he penetrates beyond the tabloid headlines, he will find that the report has no context: it does not discuss the mass of authorities in the country but confines itself to a limited number—all, coincidentally, Labour-controlled.

The report makes no relevant judgment or comparison. Let us suppose that a comparison was made of absenteeism in the House of Commons. Perhaps this would be an unfair time to do that, but many of us would find that we were doing very badly in relation to our parliamentary salaries.

The Conservative party is consumed by mythology. During one of our debates on a Social Security Bill, we were told about a book called "The Myth of the Scrounger". I have heard one member of the No Turning Back group—the loony right—cite the women who deliberately becomes pregnant in order to obtain a council house; in the 1920s, the current mythology involved a women in a fur coat, travelling in a limousine from unemployment office to unemployment office. The entire political ideology of the Conservatives is fed by such myths, but no one has mentioned that in the context of the Bill.

Although it is brief, the Bill is very nasty. It is as loathsome as any of the other 13 Social Security Bills introduced by the present Government. Let us examine the effect that it will have on various earnings bands. Since SSP was introduced in April 1983, there have been a number of changes, but those proposed in this Bill and the accompanying package will be far the most significant. An example is the SSP rates that will be received by people whose earnings are between £60 and £200 a week in 1991-92, and those received by people with comparable earnings in 1983-84. I am assuming that earnings have doubled in that time. Someone earning £100 a week in 1991-92 will receive 43·5 per cent. of those earnings in SSP; the same person earning £50 a week in 1983-84 would have received 67 per cent. Hon. Members should ponder those figures: they represent an enormous cut.

We are talking about people whose employers have already cheated them with low pay. The biggest losses have been suffered by those who are now earning between £90 and £180 a week, which covers a wide range of low-paid work: average full-time weekly pay is now over £200.

In his October uprating statement, the Secretary of State was rather more cautious. He said:

"more than 90 per cent. of the work force now work for employers providing this cover"—[Official Report, 24 October 1990; Vol. 178, c. 349.]

"The Way Ahead" was a little less discreet. I ask the Minister of State to try, in his reply, to re-establish its credibility—if it ever had any. The rationale has been destroyed.

Contrary to what the Secretary of State has said, SSP is of crucial importance to most employees, especially the low-paid; yet they have been hit hardest by the cuts. For many of them in 1991 SSP, as a proportion of earnings, will be worth little more than half what it was worth in 1983. That makes nonsense of the Government's claims about targeting resources on the low paid: in fact, they are targeting the cuts on the low paid. Every time they target their tax handouts, however, we know that they will hit a bull's eye.

This is a shabby Bill. It continues the theft of money, jobs and self-esteem from people with disabilities and people on low pay. Low-paid workers are being thrown into the insecurity of cut-price schemes, and pushed away from the security of Government schemes.

6.24 pm

Dr. John G. Blackburn (Dudley, West): Let me begin by paying a warm and generous tribute to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the manner in which he introduced the Bill. Conservative Members feel a great respect for the honesty and brevity that he has exercised within its confines.

I will not sit in the Chamber and hear the Bill described as "theft", "loathsome" and "deceitful". I happen to believe that many of its provisions will, by their very nature, be attractive to the working population. Having listened with much care to what has been said, I also find it difficult to accept that the rights of 15 million workers will be eroded.

I would dispute many of the points made by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), to whom I listened very intently, but I shall centre my comments on that absurdly exaggerated figure of 15 million. I say that as a fully paid-up member of the same trade union of which the hon. Gentleman is a member. The statutory sick pay scheme certainly imposes a considerable burden on employers; it may well be complex and expensive to operate, particularly for small companies. However, it brings stability to small businesses, because the Government reimburse sickness benefits.

We have heard that there is only one winner—the Treasury. What blatant nonsense. It has been agreed on both sides of the House—I am seeking common ground—that SSP savings are being used to give help where it is needed most.

As is clear from the statement made by my right hon. Friend on 24 October, it is without challenge that a further £200 million will go to pensioners, in real terms. Let me say—theologically—"Amen to that." A further £235 million will go to residential care, and an additional £350 million to families. My hon. Friend the Member for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson), who is not in the Chamber now, rightly pointed out that we are talking about a budget that is—within the terms of social security—breathtaking: a budget of £63 billion a year, including the further £3 billion announced in the autumn statement.

For a few moments, I should like to talk not about the Bill but about its effects. I have sat here since the beginning of the debate, and I have heard many figures, a good deal of rhetoric and much scoring of political points.

I am more interested in people than in politics. Once we lose our vision about people we lose everything. I speak soberly from recent experiences. I believe passionately in the concept of more and more benefits and money going to the long-term ill and disabled. I am completely committed to the national health service and I am humbled by the fact that I have been in six cardiac units at six different hospitals in the past year. By the grace of God and by the nursing skills of the health service I stand to speak in this debate. I have seen at first hand the problems of people who have open heart surgery, transplants and other cardiac-related surgery. In the quietness of my soul I know that I have a responsibility to those people to say that the Government should give more. I know that as a result of this small measure resources will go in that direction. It is a testimony to any Government who care about the long-term sick and disabled.

I am entitled to reflect that when I gave what was probably my second speech in this honourable House I was savaged by Labour Members. They reminded me forcefully that the constituency that I have the honour to represent, Dudley in the west midlands, had the highest infant mortality rate of 26·2 per 1,000 live births. I was ashamed to inherit that record. As a result of education, increased medical care, the introduction of a district general hospital and, by tonight, an improvement in maternity benefits, the figure is below the national average. I am grateful to this Government for showing care and compassion to the women in my constituency who are pregnant and giving birth to the next generation. All hon. Members—I make no distinction between us—are here because we have a vision about people, and it is one that I share.

I was simply overwhelmed by the comments of the hon. Member for Oldham, West about the provision of statutory sick pay in the private sector. I listened intently and three times he said that these provisions cover only managing directors. What blatant nonsense.

Mr. Battle: Nobody said that. Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Dr. Blackburn: I shall most certainly give way.

Mr. Battle: Will the hon. Gentleman reflect on what he has just said? Nobody has suggested that the schemes are only for managing directors. We suggested that the schemes for companies would not necessarily cover all employees, not least because exclusion clauses will rule out most people in firms of fewer than 10 employees. Is not that true?

Dr. Blackburn: I was most happy to give way to the hon. Gentleman, but the suggestion was made three times. I shall not enter into a conflict with him because there is much in what he says about exclusion clauses meaning that provision may not cover all people.

Ms. Short: I am grateful to my fellow west midlander for giving way. May I clarify the point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle)? In response to my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West, the Minister and other hon. Members said that we had made such an allegation. The Government claim that 90 per cent. of British employees work for employers who provide an occupational sick pay scheme. Our point is that, although two or three employees in a firm may be included in such a scheme, the rest may not be, yet they would be included in the Government's figures. My hon. Friend gave the extreme example of a firm that provided only for the managing director, yet the whole firm was included in the Government's statistics. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman would wish to understand that and would not wish to mislead the House on that point.

[Ms. Short]

Dr. Blackburn: Can the House imagine a reputable company engaged in providing these financial services not embracing the whole company, even if it was only for business, never mind anything else? I hold fast to the view that it would be in the company's interests and the interests of the company that produces the prospectus to include the entire company in a comprehensive scheme, rather than to take in two, three or four only.

I can go further. Of the companies with which I have had professional dealings in the west midlands—they are recorded in the Register of Members' Interests—not one does not have a comprehensive scheme for everybody. I readily concede that it is difficult to operate a scheme from the moment a man or woman takes up employment. There is usually a probationary period of three months.

There is tremendous scope for people in industry to make provision through the private sector. That is good, provided that the facility exists and the incentive is given. It is up to the Government to ensure that there is adequate provision of that facility throughout the working population, almost as of right, providing that the finances can stand it.

The Bill is not only commendable but, in the final analysis, will be welcomed. I was delighted that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) paid me the great compliment of saying that I shared with her the honour of representing a constituency in the west midlands.

Let me speak from personal experience. Wherever I go, I want to pay tribute to disabled people who, in some ways, have been attacked tonight. No word against those people will ever escape my lips. The disabled are worthy of more than commendation. I visit many offices and factories in my constituency and in greater Birmingham generally and I am always humbled when I see the achievements of disabled people who have climbed to the very top in their chosen career. To do that requires loyalty, skill and talent, and disabled people have all those attributes, which employers find very attractive.

Mr. Battle: Oh.

Dr. Blackburn: The hon. Gentleman has made his speech and he has made his point and now, in all modesty, I am making mine.

I am impressed by the standing of disabled people in my area. I have seen working at Birmingham airport a disabled man more gifted and talented than many who are marvellously fit. Similarly, I have seen disabled people working at hospitals and for companies who have made me want to salute the disabled people of the west midlands.

One figure that is not in dispute is the average of 15 working days a year lost through sickness, and I have no doubt that that is a perfectly acceptable figure. I do not for one moment depart from the argument that cover should be available. What I have argued—with sincerity, strength and dedication, I hope—is that I have a passionate interest in the welfare of the long-term sick and disabled. I salute both those groups of people and I know that, one day, they will reflect on the Bill and be glad that we passed it because of the extra resources that it will give to those who really need it. That is why I have no hesitation in supporting t Bill. It is the easiest thing that I have ever done in my li When I walk through the Lobby, I shall have in my mi a vision of the sick and disabled people, as well as t pregnant ladies in my constituency, who will benefit fro its provisions. I wish the Bill godspeed.

6.34 pm

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): I welcor the remarks by the hon. Member for Dudley, West (D Blackburn) about the way in which he has benefited ov the past year from the health service. Judging by l comments tonight, he is now in very good health.

The Bill is short and admirably clear, although I fe that its provisions will be damaging both to employees a to employers. The Secretary of State claimed that the B did not pose any threat or bring any disadvantage employees, yet the examples from citizens advice burea reports, given by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (M Meacher), clearly showed that, in a number of cases, t operation of the statutory sick pay regime h disadvantaged employees.

The hon. Member for Teignbridge (Mr. Nicholls), wh is no longer with us, dismissed those examples by sayi that they referred only to bad employers. When the ho Gentleman was an Employment Minister, we served two Committees considering Employment Bills, and I c well remember that that was one of his favour arguments. If one followed that argument to its logic conclusion, however, one would have to say that we d not need the criminal law because murderers were only small proportion of the population. The measures that t hon. Gentleman introduced in his Employment Bi played into the hands of bad employers and gave the further material and further opportunities. Similarl many of us fear that the Bill will give those who have n been good employers—especially in the operation of SS —an incentive to continue as poor employers.

The CABs have not been alone in commenting on t announcement by the Secretary of State in October. T Disability Alliance, for example, said that the cut reimbursement of statutory sick pay would aggravate t problem of non-payment by small employers. We may talking about only a small minority, but a growing numb of employees have expressed their concern that they ha been unfairly treated in the operation of SSP, and t House should not do anything to encourage such unfa treatment.

The hon. Member for Teignbridge argued th employers do not go out in search of sick and unhealth people. But it is not so much a question of who one brin on to one's books. During a recession, employers may looking for redundancies and, leaving aside the possibili of unfair dismissal, those with a poor health profile m well be top of the list. That trend will be encouraged employers are made to pay more for such people wh they are sick.

Despite the claims of the Secretary of State, the Bill m have damaging consequences for employees or potenti employees. It will also be damaging for employers particularly those in small businesses. I shall not repeat the reasons given by the National Federation of S Employed and Small Businesses for its belief that the B will be disadvantageous to those whom it represents, especially as the hon. Member for Oldham, West has already placed a number of them on record.

One of the most important causes for concern is that the provisions have been introduced without consultation. The Government are changing a system agreed after long and hard bargaining in the early 1980s. The Government's original proposals did not envisage any reimbursement. It was only after tough negotiations that the present position was reached.

Ms. Short: Perhaps the speed with which the Bill is being introduced can be explained in terms of the history of these matters and of the employers' campaign which forced the Government to be more generous in their reimbursement arrangements. We are debating the Second Reading on Monday and, on Wednesday, the remaining stages are to be debated—most unusually—on the Floor of the House. That timetable has been deliberately designed to prevent employers' organisations from mobilising to get back what they have won on previous occasions.

Mr. Wallace: That may well be the reason. The timetable is certainly unusual. Whereas we shall have had six hours or more to debate the Second Reading of the Bill, detailed consideration and Report are to be afforded even less.

The president of the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses, Mr. Bill Knox, is reported to have said:

"On the introduction of SSP we were promised that although we would be obliged to accept the cost of administering the scheme we would not have to fund it. We are bitter that the Government now appears to be reneging on what we considered to be a 'cast-iron contract'."

We are concerned not only that—certainly in the eyes of small business men—the Government are going back on an agreement. The Bill will enable them further to reduce the rate at which they will reimburse employers for amounts paid in statutory sick pay. The Secretary of State was pressed on that point, and obviously he would not give an undertaking that it would never happen. If that was the case, he would not have included a provision in the Bill to allow him to alter the rates. Having experienced what they would consider to be a breach of promise or of good faith on the Government's part, employers fear that there will be further such breaches and that the percentage might decline from 80 per cent. to 60 per cent. or to 40 per cent.

I listened carefully to the Secretary of State when he responded to the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). The right hon. Gentleman said that other priorities and pressures on the social security budget would have to be taken into account. I would not necessarily take issue about that. However, the Secretary of State made great play of the fact that, in many respects, this proposal could be considered neutral, in that what was being lost by the business community was being made up in terms of relief in national insurance contributions.

If other priorities are to be considered, further cuts could perhaps take place without any compensating changes in national insurance contributions. Although there will be compensating changes on 1 April 1991, how long will that last? It is fair enough to say that there will be an offset in year one, but will that continue into years two, three and four? The financial memorandum refers to the sum of £250 million, comprising £180 million in the first year, as what will not be recovered in compensating payments by employers, and £70 million which cannot be claimed back in terms of the 7 per cent. national insurance contribution when statutory sick pay is paid.

The figures balance out in terms of what is given back as national insurance contributions. If that is the case, why in the world did the Government bother? If one side is to be balanced out by the other, why bother with this proposal, which will obviously cause aggro for small businesses and for the Confederation of British Industry which represents big business? It will place pressure on business at a time when it is being asked to cut costs.

Although the figures appear to balance out in arithmetical terms and the Secretary of State could give us specific examples of business that would benefit, it does not necessarily follow that the proposal will be a general benefit to the business community. The fact that some businesses will benefit means that others will not.

According to the Green Paper entitled "Income during initial sickness: a new strategy", published in the early 1980s, which contained the original proposals for SSP, there was to be a flat-rate scheme of statutory sick pay, and employers were to be reimbursed or at least offset by a reduction of 0·6 per cent. in national insurance contributions liability. There was also to be a 50 per cent. reimbursement for small businesses. That proposal was considered by the Select Committee on Social Services in 1980-81, and it stated:

"whilst the reduction in national insurance liability will be approximately proportional to payroll costs, the liability to pay ESSP will be far less evenly spread. Industries, occupations or regions with higher than average rates of sickness will have relatively greater costs under ESSP."

There are obviously higher rates of sickness and injury in the construction industry, in mining and, regrettably, in agriculture. Regrettably, people in Scotland and the north of England do not have such good health as people elsewhere.

The Government have tried to portray the proposal as neutral for the business community, but it is clear that many businesses will find it damaging. The hon. Member for Surry, North-West (Mr. Grylls) suggested that there should be a two-tier system. If that was the case, small businesses with fewer than 20 employees could continue to have better benefits and a higher rate of reimbursement. In the 48 hours before the Committee stage of this Bill, I hope that the Government will consider that proposal.

Many small businesses that employ a small number of people do not have the resources to adopt private sick pay schemes. Undoubtedly some businesses will be in the "can pay, won't pay" category, but many small businesses are in the "can't pay, won't pay" category. It is not to their discredit that they cannot take on that obligation: they simply do not have the resources to do so. While the Secretary of State made great play of the fact that it is important that the private sector is encouraged to make provision for employees when sick—we would all endorse that as a good objective—many small businesses cannot attain that objective, yet the Government are placing this extra burden on small businesses with regard to the provision of the state insurance sector.

Small businesses have been hit by the uniform business rate and increases in the rate of inflation, and they must administer the arrestment of their employees' wages under the poll tax. They now have this additional burden to bear. A number of studies have shown that the cost of tax compliance bears more heavily in relative terms on small businesses than on big business, which usually has a large personnel organisation to deal with such matters.

[Mr. Wallace]

The Minister responsible for small businesses has not been present for this debate. When I asked him a question during Employment Question Time two weeks ago about the effect of the uniform business rate, he quite properly said that it was a matter for the Department of the Environment. We are now discussing an issue which affects small businesses, but it appears to be a matter for Social Security Ministers and not a matter for the Minister responsible for small businesses. Many of us regret the fact that there is no co-ordination in the Government over how they treat the small business sector. There should be a Minister of Cabinet rank with overall responsibility for co-ordinating the small business sector, as happened during the Lib-Lab pact in 1977-78.

The Bill is unusual, because it penalises both employers and employees. That is no mean achievement for a small Bill but, because of that, we will oppose it in the Division Lobby tonight.

6.57 pm

Mr. James Cran (Beverley): I congratulate my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Social Security on one of the most lucid expositions of a subject that very few people understand. I have no intention of bandying statistics with my right hon. Friend because he showed the Opposition perfectly well that he knew the logic of his position much better than they did.

The logic of my right hon. Friend's position is perfectly clear to me and I followed it easily. Whether I agreed with all parts of it is another matter. I believe that the proposals in the Bill are relatively innocuous, although, of course, the representative bodies involved would not say that. Those bodies are concerned because if such propositions can be put to us today, they might face a position similar to that which arose over redundancy payments. Consequently, the business community and employees want to know the Government's future intentions. I do not necessarily expect to hear chapter and verse about this tonight, but a nod and a wink from the Minister who is to reply will do.

I know that the very difficult case of small businesses has been outlined in this debate. Hon. Members on both sides of the Chamber have made the case eloquently, although some Opposition Members exaggerated it. When trying to influence any Government it is important not to exaggerate—but that is precisely what the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses has done: exaggerated the effects of the proposals to such an extent that no reasonable person could accept the logic of its position. If such organisations were more reasonable in future when commenting on Government legislation their representations may be more successful.

I want to examine the logic of the position even though it has been outlined before, because repetition is no bad thing when an important principle is involved. I started with the Secretary of State's press release of 24 October. In eloquent and winning language he said that he wanted a sensible new balance between the state and employers. I have heard that before many times—sometimes I have accepted the idea in question, sometimes not.

The alarm bells sounded not when I heard submis from representative bodies, but when I heard companies in my constituency. Generally speaking are not large; there are many small companies there correct that many—generally large—companies expanding the cover that they provide in the for occupational sick pay schemes, and we certainly wa encourage that. Once we have encouraged them r more than we have so far, that will be the time to extending these proposals. If I concede, however, that should be brought in now, they should certainly n extended.

I do not necessarily accept the proposition occupational sick pay schemes are increasingly us small companies in my constituency—they are not, do the Government expect these companies, many of marginal companies that do not make the sort of p that financial companies in the City make, to appl proposals? The Secretary of State could not rule ou possibility that some of them will be adversely affecte course they will be——

Ms. Short: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that, Government claim that the effect on companies is ne —they will lose £250 million but get it back in anothe —it is unbelievable that they would have brought i legislation unless they intended over time continua cut the proportion of rebate paid to employers? could do that under the Bill without even needi affirmative resolution of the House.

Mr. Cran: I well understand what the hon. La saying but it would be uncharacteristic of me to myself to be dragged into agreeing with her. I do not for the simple reason that I believe that this meas relatively innocuous; it is what might happen i Government decide to amend it in future years worries me. As they stand, the proposals are l neutral, but they will not remain so if the Goverr keep developing the policy in the way that I fea might.

I am moderately surprised—although I may hav wrong—that the Government did not seek represent on this point. In my simple view of life, it is always listening to all points of view. Sometimes the uncomfortable, sometimes they are the opposite of one believes, but the Government must always opinions.

Finance directors in my constituency have told m if the Government ask companies to spend comp money, that must be worth representations. I agree. was that not done? I heard the Secretary of Stat something about it, but I fear that I did not hear

The companies in my constituency are worried be the principle that the Government should reim companies 100 per cent. has been broken. Compani the cost of administration, and they are perfectly hap do so, but 100 per cent. reimbursement is nec because the principle is that companies are not in c of sickness—they do not cause their employees' sic Employees become ill for a variety of reasons, u related to medical factors, not to factors to do wi company. This measure does not recognise that industries and establishments have higher sickness than others, again for a variety of reasons. If I have misunderstood this aspect I shall be more than delighted to be reassured of that later.

It will come as no surprise to learn that what worries me is the movement from 100 per cent. to 80 per cent.—in itself relatively harmless, as I told the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short). Changes in national insurance contributions, worth about £250 million in 1991-92, cover it. But companies are worried about the signal that that sends about the Government's intentions.

After three years in this place I have started to learn—one learns every day here—to read Bills rather more carefully. That is clearly the secret of success in this place. Clause 1(2) is a case in point. It contains a provision further to vary the 80 per cent. figure. I think that most hon. Members would accept that I am a trusting soul, but equally I can claim not to be daft, and I have an awful feeling, as do the companies in my constituency that I have consulted, that the Government cannot possibly intend to increase the percentage from 80 to 90 or 95 at some point. Again, I am happy to be corrected on that point, but it is probable that the 80 per cent. will be reduced at some stage to 60 per cent.

Perhaps this will parallel the slow death of redundancy rebates—I am sure that we all remember them.

Ms. Short indicated dissent.

Mr. Cran: The hon. Member for Ladywood nods, but I agreed with the Government about those rebates because companies cause their own redundancies, so it was perfectly logical of the Government to decide that companies should pay for them. However, as I have said, the same does not apply to sickness. The Government must recognise that. If sickness is caused by an employer, the health and safety legislation exists to prosecute the employer for it.

I have discovered that statutory sick pay will cost the Government £955 million in 1991-92, and—if I have understood it correctly, I fear that this Bill will surreptitiously and elegantly, pass this entire burden to companies in the fulness of time. We can all argue about when there will be a downturn or an upturn in the economy. However, such a bill passed over to companies will deter investment when we want to see more. It will also affect the profitability of companies and none of us would like to see that.

If my assumptions are correct, this could be a potentially heavy burden—I emphasise "potentially"—for some businesses. The Government should listen to those businesses. I have attempted to rehearse the downside of the proposals, but I have not exaggerated them. If the Government go no further than 80 per cent. I see no difficulty with the proposals. If the Government hint that they are prepared to move from 80 per cent. and ask employers to carry much more of the burden, and eventually all of it, there will be problems. I hope that I am entirely wrong. I should be delighted to be proved wrong and merely seek reassurance. I hope that I get it.

7.10 pm

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): We have had two interesting and contrasting speeches from Conservative Members. The hon. Member for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn) gave us a panegyric, especially on behalf of the disabled, and suggested that the Bill would be celebrated because it marked an increase in resources. That is not the case; the Bill spells out how much will be saved. The hon. Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran) suggested that the proposals should not be lavishly welcomed. I think he said that we should treat them as innocuous and that at present they were at best neutral. He expressed the reservation that they could be damaging in future and he referred to the clause which suggests that the contribution may be reduced even further. If the Bill receives its Second Reading perhaps he will move an amendment in Committee to delete the phrase

"any greater or lesser percentage."

That phrase is ambiguous and means that the contribution could be increased or reduced in future.

We strongly argue that the thrust of the Government's policy in this short Bill is to reduce the contribution by the state and push the burden on to the employer. In the long term employees will have to pay the price for that. Conservative Members say that our claims are exaggerated. We have been here before and been accused of that. We were told that our fears about the poll tax and the uniform business rate were exaggerated. Nearly a year ago to this day there was another social security Bill dealing with the availability for work tests. We were told at that time that our fears were exaggerated.

The Minister for Social Security and Disabled People is in his place. In Committee I suggested to him that the Bill dealing with the availability for work tests would cause great hardship because when people applied for a job they would be forced to accept the lowest rate of pay on offer. The Minister will remember that when I challenged him about that he did not believe the rates of pay being offered in my constituency. He seemed to think that they were much nearer the national average of £268 a week. However, in some jobs people were paid about £1 an hour. I seem to remember that he checked the figures. The effects of that Bill are precisely as we predicted. As unemployment rises in my constituency wage rates are again dropping.

We were accused of exaggerating the reality of poverty until the figures were slipped out just before the summer recess. One of the primary causes of poverty in our society is low pay, and we should read the Bill in that context. The explanatory and financial memorandum to the Bill makes the savings plain. It states:

"Clause 1 will produce savings in public expenditure of £181m in 1991-92, rising to £190m in 1992-93 and £197m in 1993-94."

The word "savings" is a Government euphemism for cuts in public expenditure. Clause 1 will reduce from 100 to 80 per cent. the statutory sick pay that employers can recover from their remittances of national insurance contributions.

This is the second year running that the Government have reduced statutory sick pay for low-paid workers—last year it was by £80 million. As a result, 4·9 million workers lost their entire entitlement to the higher rate of statutory sick pay. That is one in five of the work force. When the changes in the Bill are combined with the decision in October's uprating statement to raise the threshold for the lower rate of statutory sick pay from its current level of £125 to £185 and the proposal to freeze the higher rate at its current level of £52·50, they will bring to the Treasury a saving of a further £100 million.

In the uprating statement, the Secretary of State called this "restructuring". In moving the Second Reading of the present Bill, he used that word again. When we in areas such as Leeds which have depended on a manufacturing base hear such a word, it suggests cuts, reductions and redundancies in the work force. "Restructuring" is a euphemism for cuts.

[Mr. John Battle]

Perhaps the Secretary of State had to find from somewhere the money for the token increase in child benefit for the first born. It has been taken from statutory sick pay. The Bill is about withdrawing the role of the state. The Government are ambiguous about that and are not quite clear where they stand. They ask whether the state should have a role or whether it should be pushed back to the employer and the employee. That is the thrust of the Bill. They are again pushing forward the make-the-people-pay principle—make them pay 20 per cent. minimum of the poll tax; make them pay at least 20 per cent. of their housing benefit. Now the Government want to make the employers pay 20 per cent. of statutory sick pay.

The impact of this so-called restructuring on employees was spelt out in a reply in Hansard on 12 November. According to the Government, about 3 million employees with earnings of between £125 and £185 a week will be pushed down to the lower rate of statutory sick pay. They will no longer be eligible for the higher rate. A wage of £125 is well below the Council of Europe's decency threshold of £178.91 a week. Will Conservative Members, with their great new approach to Europe under a new leader, acknowledge that Council of Europe threshold? In the meantime, people who fall sick on or after 6 April next year will be pushed to the lower rate if their wages are within that bracket. In practice they will lose £9 a week.

The failure to raise the higher rate will result in a loss of £5·70 a week for those earning £175 or more. As we know, it is estimated that 60 per cent. of such people are women. The Government make much of the fact that families need to have two earners, and we have had debates about it. A woman who works to provide a much-needed second income to pay the family's poll tax or to make up for the reduction in child benefit and who is not covered, will be subjected to means testing. If the husband is working she can apply for income support, but she has no chance of getting it. There will be no cover for the income that is lost. The Government cannot deny that such families will suffer a loss of income.

Those earning below £46 a week are unable to claim statutory sick pay. When people face a shift not simply from employment to unemployment but from relatively secure work to temporary, part-time and low-paid work, the impact of the Bill will be greater than the Government are letting on. People with disabilities are more likely to be working part time and in lower-graded occupations. They are also the ones most likely to be excluded from the private schemes and so dependent entirely on the state scheme. As soon as the Bill passes through the House, it will lead to further withdrawal of state responsibility, with a resulting increase in hardship and insecurity for the most vulnerable people in work. It will force disabled people to work for low wages. Others will stand to lose their long-term incapacity benefit.

Employers will face an increase in administration costs on top of the uniform business rate, high interest rates and the rest. If the Bill goes through, it will encourage discrimination against those with severe disabilities employers will stop recruiting them. Too few of them already employed, so how will the Bill give emplo incentives to be more progressive in employing people disabilities? It will encourage employers to go in opposite direction.

Conservative Members say that the Nati Federation of Self Employed and Small Business exaggerating, but I notice that it has said that it opp the Bill not least on the ground that the Government b an agreement about consulting it. That should have t place before Second Reading. Furthermore, the federa said:

"96 per cent. of British businesses employ less than 20 pe and do not have the resources to take on their emplo health insurance. That is why National Insurance was introduced."

I suspect that that is why the Government are trying to out of the system of national insurance. They are tryin privatise the state benefit provision. This is back-d privatisation of the welfare state.

The Government try to justify what they are doin the basis of the report commissioned by the DSS. T claim that it shows that the vast majority of workers covered by private occupational schemes. However, detail of the report shows that 44 per cent. of all pri sector firms and 55 per cent. of firms with fewer tha employees, which accounts for 75 per cent. of firms, no scheme. Does that show that 91 per cent. of emplo are covered by private schemes?

Furthermore, even in firms where some occupati scheme exists, coverage is far from universal because employees most commonly affected by exclusion cla are those working part time in the lower grades and on wages. Nearly one in two schemes have exclusion cla relating to the length of service and the hours of worl other words, 72 per cent. of employees may be affecte those exclusions, so they have extremely limited cove

Beveridge wanted the national insurance schem provide a fully comprehensive scheme from the crad the grave, based on the actuarial principle that people in contributions and then got help when they needed difficult circumstances. The Government have m away from that fully comprehensive principle and trying to enforce on the people a back-door, third p fire and theft coverage, on the basis that the pers premium is the absolute minimum. If one cannot af the full premium because one is sick or ill—the reason the system was invented in the first place—one will no full coverage. We cannot treat people in the labour ma like second-hand cars, providing the minimum assistance for those likely to break down. What is wor that, if it is not their fault, they stand to lose out altoge

There is a group in the Lobby at the moment—the Turning Back group—which is looking for a champio defend Thatcherism. The fact that the main architect been deposed means that there is a danger of the w project going. That project was spelt out in Septemb a pamphlet published by the group. A chapter he "The Withering Away of the State"—says:

"Our purpose should be to wean people off welfare advocate the systematic reform of the welfare system into based on insurance—run on a private agency system . should be a privately managed insurance-based system g people maximum protection and opportunity . . . Nothi our proposals would affect the benefits paid as of rig disabled people."

The group is obviously a little sensitive about disabled people, but the system and principles are clear. It would dismantle the whole of the welfare state and make people take out private insurance to cover the times when they lose their jobs or are struck down by illness.

At the heart of the Bill, and of the clause to which the hon. Member for Beverley referred, is democracy. When the hon. Member spoke about the potential in the Bill for changing the system to make it even harsher, and reducing the contributions even further from 80 per cent. he did not spell out the way in which the legislation will be changed. The Secretary of State will have the power to alter the percentage rate without a proper parliamentary debate. It is all right for the Secretary of State to say that there has been a shift from affirmative to negative orders. The Bill is paving the way for future detailed reductions in the level of state reimbursement for employees, which can be passed without proper parliamentary scrutiny.

The Bill is a clear signal that the Government are intent on their project of withdrawing from state provision and of dismantling the welfare state. It is not good enough that they have taken money from the poor and redistributed it to the rich. The principles of the national insurance scheme and the welfare state have been fundamentally undermined. Conservative Members may claim that I am exaggerating, but I refer them to what happened when we debated the poll tax, the availability for work test and the poverty figures that Conservative Members denied for months.

This time, it will not be good enough for the Secretary of State to offer, in answer to questions from his hon. Friends, a fundamental review. Three people out in the Lobby are offering fundamental review of the poll tax, but it is too late for that because millions of people have paid the price. Before millions of people pay the price for this Bill, I urge the House to reject it and make the Government change track.

7.28 pm

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): The hon. Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) is worried about the No Turning Back group, but from his speech, it is obvious that he is a member of the no turning forward group. I recommend that he reads The Independent of today, which has on page 3 an article headed:

"Kinnock seen as liability by colleagues".

Until the Labour party gets round to having a leadership election, it is condemned to being a no turning forward group.

The hon. Gentleman's speech was entirely in favour of the nanny state. He said that he was concerned about withdrawal of state responsibility, and he said that without any regard to the fact that people want to have some responsibility for their lives. Employers want to accept more responsibility for their employees. Many more people are self-employed now than there ever were when the Labour party was in office. That is because people want to accept that responsibility. The hon. Gentleman should not condemn people for wanting to do that, but he seems to think that they have to turn to the state for their care because they cannot provide for themselves. He is mistaken to look at it in that way. People want to have more responsibility in their hands and do not want to have to depend on the state to anything like the extent that they had to in the past.

The hon. Gentleman talked about cuts in public expenditure, but there have been enormous increases to £200 billion. He talked about cuts in the work force, but there are 27·5 million people in work. How can he talk about cuts when a record number of people are in work?

Mr. Battle: Does the hon. Gentleman accept that the increase in the work force reflects an increase in part-time, temporary and low-paid work? That is the reason why the Government claim that the employment market has increased. In reality, it is not an increase. Unemployment is rising.

Mr. Thurnham: The hon. Gentleman said that the primary cause of poverty is low pay, but he is wrong. The worst cause of poverty is unemployment. Only the Labour party would prefer people to be unemployed rather than in part-time work if they want to take it. The hon. Gentleman should not condemn people if they want part-time work. People from days of old would probably think that most people now are in part-time work as they work only 40 hours a week. Circumstances change. The hon. Gentleman should look ahead and not imagine that everything is as it was when the Labour party was in power.

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): Does my hon. Friend agree that probably the commonest pattern for women with children returning to the work force is that they choose to work a certain number of hours while their children are small, gradually increasing those hours as their children become more self-sufficient, until eventually they are extremely well placed to take a full-time job?

Mr. Thurnham: I could not agree more. One should look at part-time jobs as a way to help people to move into full-time jobs if that is what they are looking for.

I apologise for having missed part of the debate. I am sorry, but I had to leave the Chamber briefly to attend a meeting of the group Exodus, which campaigns for mentally handicapped children to move out of institutional mental hospitals into the community. The thrust of the Bill is about facing up to priorities and reallocating resources where needs are greatest, and that is an example of the way in which one wishes resources to be reallocated.

Ms. Short: I want to take the hon. Gentleman back to when protection for low-paid workers was being reduced. He said that unemployment was the worst possible cause of poverty for anyone. We are going into a period of rising unemployment. Does the hon. Gentleman stand by his statement that, rather than having unemployment, it would be better if Britain were one great big sweatshop, with low pay for virtually everyone?

Mr. Thurnham: If the hon. Lady looks at my speeches, she will see that I spoke about the country being a wealth shop. We should be concerned about the creation of wealth. Only Labour Members would rather that people were out of work than in work. Most people would prefer to be in work and creating wealth rather than out of work. I refer the hon. Lady to my speeches on that subject if she wants to see what I have said. She pressed my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State about the number of people who were included in schemes, rather than merely working for employers who had schemes. That is a spurious line to follow.

Mr. Quentin Davies (Stamford and Spalding): On the vital matter of unemployment, is my hon. Friend aware that the Labour party has come out with a proposal for a statutory minimum wage? That would inevitably knock many people out of jobs and increase unemployment to a higher level than it might otherwise have been. Is my hon. Friend aware that, according to some calculations, 750,000 people would be needlessly thrown out of their jobs by that pernicious proposal?

Mr. Thurnham: That is typical of what the Opposition say without paying proper attention to what will happen. I refer them to the time when Barbara Castle, now Lady Castle, was Secretary of State for Employment and Productivity. She looked into the matter and produced a report saying that that proposal would lead to massive unemployment, particularly in the regions and Northern Ireland.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): Will the hon. Gentleman explain why this country, alone of all the EEC countries, does not have minumum wage provisions or standards? Why can the Germans, French and Italians all believe that it is possible to have minimum wage provisions, but this country cannot? If this country were much more successful than all the rest, I could understand it, but as Britain is undoubtedly the sick man of Europe in economic terms, obviously the hon. Gentleman's argument does not bear examination.

Mr. Thurnham: Britain was the sick man of Europe when the Labour party was in power. It is no longer the sick man of Europe because we do not have legislation that stops people working. The legislation about which the hon. Gentleman spoke would stop people working. It is not really applied in those other countries anyway—it is only a fiction—because it stops people working. Only the Labour party wants to put people out of work. I see it as a progression—if people can start at a low rate, they can progress up the ladder. If we stop them starting at that lower rate, we stop them proceeding up the ladder.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) asked in an intervention in the speech by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State how many employees were included in schemes, rather than merely employed by firms that provided the cover of a scheme. That is a spurious question. It is illusory. The question cannot be answered in the terms that the hon. Lady wants. New employees are not usually covered by those schemes. A period of three, six or perhaps 12 months must elapse before such people can qualify. Part-time employees are generally excluded—they may be employed by more than one employer.

Most of all, the hon. Lady's question does not stand up because private firms generally use discretion. I declare an interest in that I am a small employer. I am concerned about the Bill and the effect on small employers. The difference between private and public employers is that private employers use their discretion and, where they can see that they should help their employees through a period of sickness, they will generally do so. Only in the public sector and in the local authorities mentioned in the report by the Audit Commission—which the Labour party wants to abolish—are there automatic "free days" when one does not need a sickness certificate. Private firms do not go in for that. They judge each case on its merits, as they should.

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): The hon. Gen comments amuse me a little. For more than 20 worked for a private company, which obviously like the firm owned by the hon. Gentleman. It did at an individual to see whether he had blue eyes to decide whether to give him sick pay. My firm n sick pay conditions with the employees and t unions, and sick pay was a right for all employ hon. Gentleman advocates giving sick pay to the c sick, like the policy of giving to the deserving p pay is not about charity. It is about entitleme civilised country.

Mr. Thurnham: We want to work towards a s which there is greater responsibility—more indivi able to accept responsibility and more employers to accept responsibility for their employees. We n 3 million people who are self-employed and who c accept that responsibility.

In a recent article in The Sunday Times, the Ch of the Exchequer, my right hon. Friend the Me Huntingdon (Mr. Major)—who may soon be lead Conservative party—listed the factors by which h new proposals. He said that he asked himself six q about any proposed legislative change:

"Would it enlarge freedom and extend opportu
Would it make producers and provide accountable and responsive to consumers?
Would it encourage people to take more resp for their own lives?
Would it improve life for the worst-off in soci
Would its effects be environmentally sound?
Would it enable individuals to make the m contribution to society?"

The Bill stands up well by those yardsticks.

Ms. Short: It does not.

Mr. Thurnham: Yes, it does. It encourages peo more responsible and helps to allocate resources w need is greatest.

The Bill's costs have been explained to us. The a movement from 100 per cent. to 80 per cent., w cost employers £250 million. That will be offse reduction in national insurance contributions, w right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said wou close to £250 million. The major change is the £10 saved by freezing the higher rate of statutory sick raising the threshold. About £100 million is because of the change.

The change affects those with the higher incomes, not those with the lower band of incor Opposition say, wrongly, that it affects people on t incomes. However, it makes money availa distribution in areas where the need is greatest. hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and People is responsible for the independent livi which now costs more than £60 million. That is an of where resources are being reallocated. W establish priorities and then decide where the greatest.

The Opposition are always quick to cond Government for doing too little too late, for bein and so on. The Government have introduced a shows where resources can be made available. Th be some limit on resourses. Even if the Oppositio Government, they would have to accept a resources. It is a question of how those resources are allocated, and the Bill is effective in the way in which it tackles that.

Mr. Battle rose——

Mr. Thurnham: We are having quite a lively debate.

Mr. Battle: Does the hon. Gentleman seriously believe that £175 a week is a high wage? How does he contrast that with the tax benefits in recent Budgets for people earning more than £2,000 a week?

Mr. Thurnham: We are talking about different bands. The figure that the hon. Gentleman mentioned relates to the higher band. The Bill fully protects those in the lower bands from inflation. The £100 million available because of the changes comes from the higher band—mainly people in firms that have occupational schemes. Cover is provided for the vast majority of employees either through occupational schemes or through the discretion of the employer. The hon. Gentleman is wrong.

The Government should be commended for introducing the Bill. Any change usually results in those who think that they might be losers making loud protests, whereas in general the gainers are either unaware that they are gainers or they tend to remain silent. There have been protests from the small business lobby, half a protest from the big business lobby—on whose behalf my hon. Friend the Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran) spoke—and the disability lobby has expressed concern. They are confused about the impact of the Bill. They should recognise that, within the whole balance of priorities, there are benefits.

Hon. Members on both sides of the House share a genuine concern for the disabled and for those in society who cannot look after themselves; but I am concerned that some people who are not ill take advantage of the £1,000 million a year statutory sick pay. I refer Opposition Members to the Audit Commission's report. The hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) said that the report did not refer to the generality of authorities, only to the London authorities. It is clear that he did not read the report. The very first exhibit refers to all districts. It shows that sickness levels in all local authority direct labour organisations are above the CBI's average national figure. The averages for the shire districts, the metropolitan districts and the London boroughs are all above the national average.

Ms. Short: The hon. Gentleman is making a serious and dangerous point. We all agree that it is wrong when people pretend to be sick, and there should be a tightening of the rules wherever that is happening. However, if the hon. Gentleman is using that to justify cutting the sick pay of low-paid workers who are genuinely sick, that is inexcusable.

Mr. Thurnham: I share the hon. Lady's concern, but it is clear from the report that there are cases of non-genuine sickness. It gives considerable detail of the causes of the problem, including institutionalised sickness that is not genuine sickness. It suggests that there is a lack of proper management. The Bill is good because it brings more responsibility to bear on individual employers, so that if they have higher than average levels of sickness, they have greater reason to question why. I recommend the report, which is very good, to the hon. Lady. It lists many factors that can lead to higher than average sickness rates. It is not simply because the employees are not healthy; it is because the management systems are not adequate.

Mr. Rowe: Somewhat to my embarrassment, I must confess that I have not read the report. I was a civil servant many years ago, and it was commonplace to hear people say, "I have sick leave due to me." Perhaps that is what the report is highlighting.

Mr. Thurnham: My hon. Friend has put his finger on an important point.

Paragraph 55 of the report states that one of the authorities had 12 days uncertificated sickness absence built into its computer printouts as free days. If someone does not take all of those days, no doubt he is asked why. It is an example of where the greater responsibility that is built into the Bill will bring home to all those employed in an organisation the real causes of sickness levels. Is it because employees are generally unhealthy——

Mr. Martlew: When the Government introduced statutory sick pay, they also introduced self-certification. Is the hon. Gentleman admitting that that legislation has been a flop and has increased the number of days lost through sickness?

Mr. Thurnham: I understand that largely the legislation is working very well. Employees can self-certificate for periods up to six days. I suspect that the legislation is working differently in private industry from in the public sector. I refer the hon. Gentleman to the report. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, the Opposition and all sides of industry agree that the legislation has worked well since it was introduced, although I do not think that it is working that well in areas of the public sector.

I recommend that the hon. Gentleman reads the report, which lists ways to study the matter, sets target levels for acceptable degress of sickness, and sets trigger levels that would automatically instigate management investigation. It gives a list of key success factors that will enable authorities to study practices in their organisations. For the most part, local authorities have a good reputation as caring employers, and I am sure that they would not wish to lose that. However, there is evidence that in London and in a number of other authorities—such as my authority of Bolton—sickness is above the average rate for industry. That suggests that not all the reported absences can be due to genuine incapacity.

The report states that it is clear that much can be done to reduce the current high levels of sickness absence without introducing burdensome terms and conditions. Many of the authorities reviewed in the report have already implemented recommendations and are now benefiting from the improvements. That demonstrates how a more responsible attitude to sickness can be to the benefit of everyone in industry, and especially to those who are most deserving of the help that we can give them. I commend the Bill to the House.

7.47 pm

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): It is ironic that the last Bill to come before the House for its Second Reading under a woman Prime Minister should be one that will have such a bad effect on women. As my hon. Friend the Member for

[Mrs. Alice Mahon]

Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) said, it is a squalid memorial to Thatcher's reign. She might be a woman, but she is certainly no sister.

It is legitimate to ask the three contenders for the Tory crown who are now grubbing about in the Lobbies what they think about the Bill and what they will say in 12 months' time if it has the bad effects that we expect. They have all stated their credentials for the job that they all want. They have all claimed a common touch—the class warrior, the potato planter and the weightlifter. I should be interested to know whether, in a few years' time, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) will deny thrice before the cock crows that he had supported the Bill. I shall be interested to know what Lobby he votes in tonight.

The Secretary of State appeared reluctant to accept the reality that low-paid workers in non-unionised workplaces often have difficulty in obtaining statutory sick pay, and there is plenty of evidence of that. The Low Pay Unit has clearly stated the effect of the Bill on women. Female employees having earnings between £125 and £175, and part-time workers—many of whom are excluded from occupational sick pay schemes—will be badly hit by the Bill's provisions.

It is no use the Secretary of State making spurious arguments to the effect that small businesses do not really mean what they say. There is plenty of evidence of opposition to the Bill, if only the Government will listen. The National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux undertook a survey of employers who do not provide statutory sick pay, but obviously the Government do not want to hear that evidence.

There can be dire consequences for employees who are dismissed because of sickness. They not only risk immediate hardship, but will lose entitlement to unemployment benefits for six months if they cannot prove unfair dismissal if they qualify under the two-year rule. The Government had access to NACAB's reports on SSP, low pay and poor working conditions, but have ignored them.

One citizens advice bureau in Hertfordshire reported seven cases in one month of employers refusing to pay SSP to eligible workers. There is a great deal of evidence that employers cheat on that benefit.

The National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses is strongly opposed to the Bill, and rightly accuses the Government of reneging on their earlier promises. The Secretary of State let the cat out of the bag tonight when he was questioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher), and refused to reveal the Government's intentions in respect of the future level of reimbursement to employers. The right hon. Gentleman had an opportunity to tell the House what he is about, but refused to take it.

My hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) is right when he says that the Government's long-term intention is to privatise the scheme and to rid themselves of what they see as a burden, as they go about breaking up the welfare state. The hon. Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran) asked the Secretary of State for a nod and a wink, but he will be bitterly disappointed. We have heard all that we are to hear tonight.

Many other organisations oppose the Bill being taken in the Lobby tonight are any in shall see another Prime Minister in the Thatch the Dispatch Box next week. The Goverm refuse to listen and are totally inflexible, Opposition's arguments may be. Many ba rights have been lost under the present Gover include maternity benefits, the right to against unfair dismissal, wage protection people, benefits for short-time working, and safety protection in many areas.

In my own constituency, workers at the Co were left without protection when it went into Loyal, long-service workers who were entitled notice were unable to claim until that peri expired. If they are lucky enough to find work that—after a month, say—they receive only redundancy pay, and none of the extra se negotiated by their union. The receiver has a the company's shareholders, and they consideration. That unfortunate group of wo even get their holiday pay. It is scandalous thing should happen to decent people.

The hon. Member for Bolton, North Thurnham) referred to low pay. Last week, Halifax jobcentre to see what work was on o textile workers. There were only four advertised, and they were all in other area Calderdale. One of the vacancies was for twister machine operator, at £99·79 for a 4 Another was for a security guard dog handl £1·50 to £2 per hour. The third job was controller in a meat processing factory, at a per hour. That is what my right hon. and mean by low pay.

A number of workers made redundant by already been to see me. One 56-year-old despair because it is unlikely that he will fin —at least with a company like Coloroll. tragedy has nothing to do with the Bill, bu what is happening in the real world and i arguments about low pay. Three hund workers in my constituency face a very blea

John Ashcroft, the high-flying managin Coloroll, who wreaked such havoc on the the community of Sowerby Bridge, was p rooftops by the Prime Minister as the entrep year. He will have a good Christmas, bec himself £1·2 million in dividends the year be collapsed.

Other Community countries have protecti France helps workers caught in dreadful situ that at Coloroll.

The Bill is another attack on low-paid emp of whom do dirty, hazardous and boring w can never save for the day when they may fa an accident. I refer to the people at the botto about whom Conservative Members do no but who will be penalised still further u legislation. It is estimated that 3 million low will lose out under the Bill. It has been employers' national insurance contributions which will provide some compensation employers will not make that connection. Secretary of State claims, the changes wil against employers whose workers fall sick.

My hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West quoted the clear advice of the Spastics Society that the Bill will discourage employers from taking on people who are disabled or have poor health records. The Government know that that is true. We saw a dreadful performance by the Secretary of State: he was so embarrassed by what he had to tell the House that he went on for about an hour and a quarter, but he could not cover up the fact that the disabled will be worse off.

The Bill is about saving the Government money—getting rid of the existing scheme and having it privatised. It is all part of the Government's attack on the low-paid. It is like a creeping, deadly slime that is suffocating the basic rights of working people. I hope that Conservative Members will feel a twinge of conscience, and will vote against this shabby, nasty little Bill.

7.58 pm

Mr. Roger King (Birmingham, Northfield): The hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon), who spoke with great feeling, said that the Bill is shabby, and claimed that it is another attempt to cut Government expenditure in an area of social welfare provision. She is wrong. This legislation must be seen as part and parcel of the Government's growing commitment to social welfare provision. One cannot consider it in isolation, or without taking into account the significant financial improvements announced for next year, in respect of pensions, residential care and nursing home allowances, family benefits—and in particular, as was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn), benefits for the disabled.

That is a major step forward in the provision of help where it is required, and we all warmly welcome that. It is targeted help. The Government appreciate that that is the only way to put increased financial resources into areas where there are known problems, so that we can tackle them more easily.

Ms. Short rose——

Mr. King: I have only just started, and I hope that I have not said anything with which any hon. Member would disagree.

Ms. Short: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He is absolutely right that in the uprating statement, when the Government gave a little increase for the first-born child because they were embarrassed about the failure to increase child benefit, something for people in residential homes because elderly, frail people were being evicted and something for poor pensioners—all of which is welcome—the Treasury said that the Department could not have any more money, so something else had to be ripped out of the social security budget. This is it—the low-paid sick are paying for those improvements. Does he agree with that?

Mr. King: No, I do not agree with that. It is a Government Department's task to deal with the Treasury—to wheel and deal within the financial constraints placed upon it—to get the best settlement that it possibly can, and establish a set of priorities as to where that money should be spent.

To my mind, the Bill is a perfectly acceptable piece of legislation, but I make one strong suggestion, which has already been mentioned this evening. The Bill sets out a requirement that national insurance contributions will b reduced from 100 per cent. to 80 per cent., and as consequence the reimbursement rate can in future b reduced or increased, by order. I am a little unhappy abou that, but I can accept the principle contained in the Bill t provide assistance for employers.

If any adjustments are necessary, I hope that my righ hon. Friend will consider further assistance for employer to ensure that no great net disadvantage is passed on t them.

If one considers the Bill's financial implications, th reduced amount given to employers is worth about £25 million and is weighted in favour of those employer whose employees are paid less. That is important because by and large, small businesses pay less than large ones Therefore, my right hon. Friend has done what he can t help smaller businesses.

The main problem which we face has not bee mentioned in the debate—how to resolve the constan difficulty of funding statutory sick pay for about 6 millio people. In 1989-90, that amounted to £955 million. On wonders whether such an enormous sum of money—it i growing every year—must necessarily be paid by society t fund the growing incidence of sickness.

There is little incentive for us to stay healthy in thi country. The statutory requirements of the health and safety at work legislation are fulfilled by businesses well but to what extent do companies provide for the health o their work force? Japanese businesses and many continental companies have active health programmes fo their employees which reduce the cost of absenteeism and sickness. As a nation, we have been accused of being unhealthy.

Mr. Martlew: I think that the hon. Gentleman will find that those Japanese companies which have occupational health schemes also have the best sick pay policies. The companies with the worst sick pay policies make no provision for occupational health.

Mr. King: To some extent, I do not disagree with the hon. Gentleman. The probable reason why the Japanese can have the best sick pay benefits available is that they are much healthier as a result of the active health programmes that employees enjoy.

Some British companies are beginning to consider following the Japanese idea of physical jerks first thing in the morning. There is no doubt that that seems to have ensured better attendance by workers of Japanese manufacturing companies. Perhaps we should consider that idea in more detail.

As a result of passing on a little more of the commitment to provide funding for statutory sick pay, perhaps companies in this country will pay more attention to the welfare of the work force, at very little cost. It is not a question of having to invest vast sums of money.

The average person in this country has often been accused of having a poor diet, eating the wrong things, drinking too much, smoking and having a poor life style. All that is probably to some extent true and many of us are guilty. The trend cannot be easily reversed. Local authorities have launched a programme to acquaint everyone with the risks of being a lounge lizard, of not doing enough exercise, and of eating the wrong things—they can only lead to heart problems and to stress. Many people lack exercise. Their only sport may be darts or snooker, which is more evidence that we have an unphysical outlook towards recreation and sport.

[Mr. King]

There is a way forward, if we try to link the sick pay which companies have to provide and their increasingly important role in improving the health of their work force. It should not just be a question of people turning up at work at 7.30 am, starting work and going home in the evening. Companies pay a great deal of attention to their machinery and to the equipment which provides work, but not much to the most vital of production—the employees themselves. I hope that closer attention to the health and welfare of their employees will be a consequence of this legislation. That can be tackled easily.

How many offices have too much heating and are too hot? Some can be found within the Palace of Westminster. Poor ventilation and overheated premises lead to employees becoming unhealthy—they get colds, sickness and flu. Admittedly, it would take a great deal of money to put that right in the Palace, but in many factories, if air conditioning, proper ventilation and heating were introduced, the result would be a saving in carbon dioxide emissions.

Poor lighting is another problem which needs to be considered. Not only too little light, but too much can cause sickness and absenteeism from the work place, with increased costs to the community and the company.

Other, more high-tech, problems are being encountered by visual display unit operators and computer programmers who stare at screens all day long, and more research is being carried out in that area. Such employees are encountering problems with headaches. Companies shrug their shoulders and put it down as a fact of life, because someone else will pick up the bill when employees are off sick. If we pass on a little more of the burden to employers, perhaps they will consider working conditions more carefully. Although working conditions might pass a health inspection, as technology and techniques move on they probably need to be reconsidered.

Mrs. Mahon: Has the hon. Gentleman considered the effect of Government policies and privatisation? For example, domestic workers at the health authority for which I work were privatised. The work force was cut by half but was expected to achieve impossible performance targets. Those people, who were mainly women, suffered from stress, anxiety and sheer tiredness in trying to achieve the impossible targets, and within 12 months there had been a 100 per cent. turnover in staff. Will he consider such problems in speaking on what employers can do for employees?

Mr. King: The hon. Lady makes an interesting point. I would not try to defend any get-rich-quick organisation that sought to undercut an established operation by using labour in the way that the hon. Lady mentioned. There is no doubt that many excesses and problems have resulted from that splurge of privatisation. No management or company director can operate successfully in that way. There is nothing worse than a high turnover of staff or than signing a contract with a health authority or school only to discover that no one shows up because they are not well or because they have walked out. The private sector can operate only if its employees are prepared to work with it. Businesses will not last long unless t between management and the work f conditions are right to ensure continuit Employees of the National Freight C other business benefited consider Government's privatisation policy. W improvement in working standard privatisation has produced.

Mr. Martin Redmond (Don Valley): hon. Gentleman. He suggested that o employees are capable of continuous w sector employees give total commitment and many, such as nurses, are committe elderly. I wish that he would withdraw sector employees do not give full comm

Mr. King: If I said that, and I am qu not, the hon. Gentleman misunderstoo cast a slur on any national health serv anyone else. I do not doubt that they commitment to their jobs. I would no that a public sector employee does not w I hope that the hon. Gentleman will companies are capable of ensuring loyalty and efficiency than are some p sector because the profit motive driv forward. Nothing better illustrates t repairs, which are carried out in Birm labour oganisations and the private sec organisations work less effectively and the private sector.

Mr. Battle: On a point of order, Mr Probably more than most hon. Membe like to debate housing policy, which sufficiently. Is it in order for the hon. housing in a debate on the Statutory S

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean debates lend themselves to fairly wide s yet heard anything out of order, b Member for Birmingham, Northfield (M that point I should begin to become w

Mr. King: I hear what you say, Mr. have clearly touched a sensitive nerv explanation of the differences between private sector organisations. I accept organisations can be, and are, as e organisations, but the private sector, operate efficiently, should not be brand inconsiderate of its work force.

The Bill should result in heal Employers will want to ensure that the and opportunities for their employees t and to fulfil the duties for which they

By ensuring that employees are c work, we could eliminate one of th consequences of manufacturing and —backache and back trouble. That is facing us and is the primary cause of ab done to address the causes of sickne make employers redouble their effo workplace more attractive and h employees. To that extent, it is a ste should welcome.

8.17 pm

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): I am not surprised by the speeches of Conservative Members. The Bill is bent and it has been produced by a bent Government. [Laughter.] That is what it amounts to. The hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) can laugh. I listened to what he had to say and I am clear in my mind that I agree with one comment that he made on the workplace: it should be healthy for employees, but he knows as well as me that in the past 11 years the Opposition have been trying to convince the Government that the workplace is not right. One of the reasons for that is the cuts—I am not talking about money, but it relates to money—in Her Majesty's inspectorate, which has been reduced and reduced. How can inspectors do their job in the workplace when those cuts have been made?

I came from the mining industry and know only too well that there were not enough inspectors on the job. Full-time trade union officials, without political interference, told us quite clearly that we must make the Government do something about the mines inspectorate. What did the Government do? They reduced the number of inspectors. We kept banging the Dispatch Box, but the Minister still did not take any notice. The hon. Member for Northfield mentioned backache. That is the worst thing in the mining industry, and it is the same in the factories. If inspectors do not get round to factories, that suffering goes on.

People are sick and are getting injured because in many cases the employer could not care less; as long as he is getting his production and his profit, he does not care about the workers. The hon. Member for Northfield can grin—he sits on the management side. Conservative Members sit there—there are not many here at the moment—and they are all connected to Lloyd's. [Laughter.] Oh, yes, I hit the nail right on the head there. A number of hon. Members have connections with insurance companies when it comes to sick pay, so there is a rake-off for them.

Members of Parliament do not have to bother about sick pay. It is nice and cushy to sit on these green Benches and talk about what workers should have.

Mr. Quentin Davies rose——

Mr. Haynes: Hey-up, here comes Stamford and Spalding again; he is always at it, but I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Davies: I apologise for intruding during the hon. Gentleman's characteristic performance, but does he agree with me in principle that to weight the national insurance system towards the lower-paid so that they derive the greatest benefit from it is a laudable aim? Does he welcome my right hon. Friend's proposal fully to index the lower rate of statutory sick pay, thereby favouring the lower-paid as against other groups of workers?

Mr. Haynes: I do not understand this fellow. When we were considering a Bill in Committee, one day I saw him downstairs in the cafeteria where he was studying share prices to see how much money he had made. He talks about sick pay and the lower-paid, but how does he know what we are talking about when it comes to sick pay and low-paid workers? He and many other Conservative Members have been living off the backs of the low- is high time we got to power and turned things ro other way.

I am pleased that the Minister for Social Secu Disabled People is still here. He was sitting on t Benches just now, but he is down there again. That because he wants to hear what I have to say. He c be ashamed of himself; he is supposed to repre disabled. I see that he nods in agreement. He kno there is a measure on the statute book that sta businesses should employ 3·5 per cent. of disabled in their work force. He has never done his job. Ma do not employ any disabled people, never mind cent. The Bill will lead to businesses taking on fe fewer disabled people. They will be looked on as a Small businesses have something to shout about, a doing that on their behalf.

Mr. Redmond: The Bill will undoubtedly employers reconsider the number of disabled peo employ. The Minister could announce that he int take steps against those employers who do not ful quota. My hon. Friend ought to be aware that t Board does not employ its full quota. Before M look at what happens outside this place, they o consider the number of disabled people who are em here and find out whether we are meeting the quo

Mr. Haynes: We do not. Months ago, I t question about the number of disabled people w employed in this building. The Government a meeting the quota. The Minister for Social Secur Disabled People ought to be ashamed of himself; h doing his flaming job. It is time that he came over side, or did not even come back to this place. He o let someone else get on with the job of looking a disabled.

We have got this leadership election [HON. M "We have."] There are three of them.

Mr. Quentin Davies: The hon. Gentleman n leader.

Ms. Short: The hon. Member for Stamfor Spalding (Mr. Quentin Davies) is trying to cover h embarrassment.

Mr. Haynes: I will tell the hon. Gentle [Interruption.]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. It is very unfair to intimidate the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Haynes: That one there does not intimida With a voice like that, how could he work in a pi

Mr. Davies: The hon. Gentleman may have de from the sound of my voice, that I am suffering bronchitis, but he may have noticed that I am not cl statutory sick pay.

Mr. Haynes: The hon. Gentleman knows damn that he does not have to. I said just now that he gets his salary, even if he is off work, so it ma difference. He is as thick as a pudding, and a Chr pudding at that. Why on earth does he not listen t is said?

Three Conservative Members are up for the lead All three of them, over a period, sat round the C table with the lady at No. 10 and agreed all the p

[Mr. Haynes]

What do we hear now? They want to change them all. How dishonest can that be? It is hypocritical. However, they are trying to cadge votes from their colleagues because they want to be leader of the Conservative party, with a view to becoming Prime Minister. The people outside have already seen through that one. Never mind the opinion polls; they can be forgotten.

The hon. Member for Northfield will go. He will be able to return to one of the jobs that he has already got besides being a Member of Parliament. A whole clique of them sitting over there know what they will do when they lose their seats at the next election. They have covered their backs. The hon. Member for Northfield is one of them. So is the hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies).

A number of small business men in my constituency are suffering. They have had to lay people off. Many of them have gone out of business. They are a burden on the state; they have lost everything because of this Government's policies. Here comes another burden that they do not like. It is no use hon. Members such as the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) saying that businesses agree and feel that they should be making their contribution. Oh, yes, they will be making their contribution all right by going downhill. What he said was a load of rubbish. Those firms will go out of business if the Government carry on in this way.

The Government have done many other things that have not helped businesses. That is why the nation is in such a mess. We want the Minister of State to say tonight that he intends to withdraw the Bill. It is a complete waste of time. It will also be a complete waste of time to have the Committee stage on the Floor of the House. Let us get on with something that is really important—for example, the leadership campaign for the next Prime Minister. While I am at it, let me point out that we have a first-class leader and I am right behind him. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding really has got a cough; hark at him. He is not at all well. I do not know what he has been doing.

Mr. Martlew: He has been out shooting.

Mr. Haynes: He has been out shooting, has he? It is no wonder, in this weather, that he has bronchitis.

We do not support the Bill. We hope sincerely that it will be withdrawn. I agree completely with what was said by my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle). Since 1979, the Government have been adamant that they will destroy the welfare state. This is another step towards that destruction. The sooner we have the next election, to turn things around and put my party on the other side of the Chamber so that we can run the country in the interests of all the people in the nation, the better off we shall all be.

8.29 pm

Mr. Andrew Rowe (Mid-Kent): I anticipate the next election with no anxiety about its outcome, but with some sorrow, because I know that the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) does not intend to stand. I think that we shall all miss his robust form of pantomime. He expresses, in a way that none of his colleagues can match, the heart of the Labour party's philosophy—the view that at no time and in no manner should a party re-examine the policies that it has devised: indeed, he claimed that it was hypocritical to do so.

Mr. Redmond: That is simply not true. Opposition Members are constantly reviewing policies, on the ground that what is good enough for today may well not be good enough for tomorrow. We are always looking at the problems facing the country. Regrettably, Conservative Members are not doing the same: we see no change of policy until a leadership election, when each candidate names the policies that he would like to alter.

Perhaps the hon. Gentleman could approach the three leadership candidates and ask them to consider whether the Bill is worth passing, in view of the tremendous damage that it will do to industry. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that the main problem with social security policies is the fact that, since 1979, they have been continually altered.

Mr. Rowe: I shall certainly include that in the list of questions that I shall be asking the three candidates. I should, however, be interested to know how many Opposition Members agree with the hon. Member for Ashfield—who clearly considers it positively hypocritical for Cabinet Ministers, and former Cabinet Ministers, to reconsider policies—and how many agree with the hon. Member for Don Valley (Mr. Redmond). The hon. Member for Don Valley was, of course, right to remind us that Labour's views on nuclear disarmament, membership of Europe and, indeed, the sale of council houses have undergone a number of changes—which we welcome, as they have now adopted in substantial measure the policies that we have consistently advocated.

Ms. Short: Although the Labour view on council house sales has been divided in that some Labour councils have always sold them, there is complete agreement that it is sinful to sell them and not replace them, which is what has been done under the present Administration. We favour council house sales to tenants who want them, but they should always be replaced to avoid the increasing homelessness that we have seen in Birmingham as a result of the Government's refusal to allow councils to build.

Mr. Rowe: There is considerable merit in a policy of increasing the number of houses available to those on low incomes. I welcome the moves to strengthen the housing associations; I do not, however, believe that many councils' record of administration, maintenance and organisation of housing stock is nearly good enough for us to welcome the prospect of their returning to large-scale building and management.

I am sorry to see that the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) has left the Chamber. I listened to her speech with interest, and found it extraordinary that one of her arguments against the Bill should be the fact that employers constantly cheat on legislation. In my view, there is something inherent in the system of 100 per cent. reimbursement that will encourage malevolent and fraudulent employers to cheat: with or without the connivance of the work force, it will be perfectly possible for them to claim a state payment amounting to 100 per cent. of what has been claimed from them.

Small businesses genuinely fear that another burden will be placed on them, at a time when they are not very well placed to deal with such burdens. I hope that my right hon. Friend will consider carefully before any decision is made to change the 80 per cent. arrangement. Ultimately, however, I think that the whole national insurance scheme should be re-examined. It has never—from the day of its introduction—worked as Beveridge intended: it has never been properly funded, and has therefore always been subject to the vicissitudes of the national economy. Whenever a Government of any colour have found themselves in any kind of difficulty, they have used the national insurance system as a regulator for the economy generally, and the nation as a whole has had a pretty bad deal as a result. Any private insurance scheme that was run in such a way would be regarded by those who paid into it as a pretty duff show. It is high time that the way in which we meet people's needs was radically overhauled.

As many of my hon. Friends know, I have long advocated the introduction of a national minimum income, although I also consider that the national minimum wage is either enormously destructive of jobs or ineffective. We already have the rudiments of such a system: with the exception of married people who do not work but whose spouses do, not a single group does not receive what could be described as the beginnings of a national minimum income.

Mr. Martlew: The hon. Gentleman appears to be saying that employers can pay very low wages and the state can top them up. I do not think that the state should get into the habit of subsidising poor employers; that militates against the employers who pay a reasonable rate.

Mr. Rowe: One of the difficulties of a national minimum income scheme is exactly that. I believe that we need a system whereby people's incomes cannot fall below a certain level, and any amount that employers contribute above that minimum should not necessarily be accompanied by a 100 per cent. reduction: they should not lose £1 every time they add £1. The country has got itself into a real mess. This is not a party political or partisan point. Any Government must face the fact that it is now almost impossible to organise the paying out of benefits and the meeting of specific needs without a large group of people losing out every time the boundaries are changed.

Mr. Redmond: I thank the hon. Gentleman for clearing up the confusion on that point.

Regrettably, the Government have pursued a policy that has tended to depress minimum rates of pay. One of the problems is that sickness benefit has also been eroded. I understood sick pay to be a safety net to stop people from falling into poverty, but unfortunately that does not appear to be the case. I agree that there should be a national minimum wage and sick pay to match it. Pundits, academics and experts are all agreed on that.

Given the advice from all sides that a minimum rate should be set other than what the Government decree, does the hon. Gentleman agree that there is a vast difference between what the Government state and what people outside state? As the Government are not interested in a safety net for sick pay or in a minimum rate of pay, could the hon. Gentleman convince his colleagues that a safety net is desperately needed to eliminate poverty at the sharp end where people feel it?

Mr. Rowe: The hon. Gentleman misunderstands my point. A national minimum wage would destroy jobs because many individuals and businesses would be unable or unwilling to pay that wage. Either it would be enforced by inspectors, in which case many jobs would go, or, as in many mainland European countries, it would simply be ignored.

I am interested in the definition of a national minimum income.

Ms. Short: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Rowe: If the hon. Lady will forgive me, no.

There should be a sum below which no one, whether in or out of work, should be expected to operate. Clearly, if a person were in work, any contribution that the state had to make would reduce on a taper.

Mr. Redmond: I apologise to the hon. Gentleman. I thought that he was advocating a national minimum wage. If he is saying that there should not be a national minimum wage but that there should be statutory sick pay, which stops people falling to a desperate level of poverty, he is arguing that the state should continue to subsidise firms that pay horrendously low wages. Taxpayers' money should not be used to subsidise bad employers.

Mr. Rowe: I am a great believer in a high-wage, high-skill economy. Good and successful companies have good working conditions, pay good wages, have good redundancy arrangements and so on. That is the way forward. Do not let anybody be under any misunderstanding about that. A national minimum income would remove substantially the danger of subsidising low wages because people would not be forced into taking low wages. I do not want to go too far from the main thrust of the Bill.

The national insurance system does not operate anything like as smoothly as it should. There may well be a great deal of advantage in having a system that is fully funded. The Government may be able to contribute to that funding for those who cannot make their contribution from their low wage. We have a pay-as-you-go system, which is completely sensitive to the Government's handling of the economy and it does not work well. I am anxious to have a contributory system, which would be fully funded. It would probably be operated by a private organisation, although it would not worry me unduly if it were operated by a national organisation that was wholly separate, fenced round and properly audited.

I accept that there is the difficulty of exclusions. There are those whose state of disability or health record is such that a private insurance company will not accept them easily. The Government have a responsibility to help those people make the necessary additional premium contributions that allow them to remain beneficiaries of the insurance system. Hon. Members on both sides have pointed to the real danger that in the short term the Bill may make it harder for disabled people to be employed because many employers do not understand that the loyalty of disabled people frequently outweighs the illness quota that they must have over and above the average. The way to handle that is not to have a national statutory sick pay scheme such as we have now, but for disabled people to be able to lay claim to whatever additional resource they need to make it possible for an employer to take them on. There may be considerable advantages in exploring that line.

I am prepared to accept the measure at its 80 per cent. level now, but before we go much further, we need to incorporate the statutory sick pay arrangements in a much wider review of the way in which we meet national insurance-type needs. The present national insurance scheme has never worked as Beveridge intended. It has never been properly funded. We need a radical review. I am much more willing to talk to the three candidates for the Conservative party leadership about that than about the detail of the Bill.

[Mr. Rowe]

8.47 pm

Mr. Eric Martlew (Carlisle): I was impressed by the flamboyance of my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) in telling the Minister to come to the Dispatch Box and withdraw the Bill. I can suggest a replacement. Indeed, today I wrote to the Prime Minister on the matter. I addressed it, "To Whom it May Concern" and put a second-class stamp on the envelope. My suggestion is that the Government should replace this Bill quickly with a Bill to eradicate the poll tax. Tory Members are as opposed to the poll tax as we are. If the Government put such a Bill before the House, I am sure that the Labour party would accept it, it would pass through both Houses quickly and be on the statute book just after Christmas. In that way this year's poll tax bills would be the last and we would not fight a fraudulent election on whether the legislation should be amended. As that could be classified as a digression, I shall now turn to the Bill.

The Government introduced statutory sick pay in 1981. I was one of the unfortunate people who had to implement it in industry and it was not a popular measure. It is bureaucratic. The Government's idea was to redeploy 5,000 civil servants. They redeployed 5,000, and probably had to employ a further 2,000 in the private sector to calculate the system of statutory sick pay. There was no saving in manpower. It is just a way of shifting expenditure from the Exchequer to the private sector. That is what the Bill will do. It will not save money; it will merely place the burden on the private sector. Given high interest rates and the number of bankruptcies that we face, it seems ridiculous to place such extra burdens on industry. We should reduce those burdens, principally by reducing interest rates.

The introduction of SSP was partly the result of self-certification which, in turn, was brought about by pressure from the British Medical Association—when it was still speaking to the Government. The doctors said, "It is not our job merely to provide medical certificates." Human nature being what it is, the number of days lost through sickness was bound to increase. The hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) gave us a disgraceful example which emphasised the point: the number of days lost through sickness has increased, but we are refusing to take responsibility for it.

Self-certification did three things. First, it delayed the moment at which a sick person went to the doctor. In some cases, that delayed the person's recovery. On that point, we must remember the pernicious tax that the Government have levied on sick people in the form of prescription charges. Many low-paid workers cannot afford to pay prescription charges and that, too, delays their recovery.

Secondly, self-certification destroyed confidentiality between doctor and patient——

Mr. Quentin Davies: Will the hon. Gentleman concede that the previous certification procedures sometimes involved wasting a great deal of the GP's valuable time? Doctors could have been treating patients who needed treatment instead of filling in forms for people in respects of whose ailments no medical attention was necessary.

Mr. Martlew: There is no evidence to suggest that we are now a healthier society. The general practitioners argued that, following self-certification, they would be able to spend more time with sick people and so reduce the amount of sickness. The reverse has proved to be the case, although the result probably has more to do with the Government's economic and social policies than with the medical care offered by general practitioners.

Self-certification also destroyed confidentiality. A doctor who did not want to disclose to an employer the ailment from which a person was suffering would merely write on the certificate "debility", and that was good enough for both management and the state. That is no longer the case. The employee has to say what he is suffering from. The word "debility" will not be accepted by management and it will certainly not be accepted by the Department. It would be very difficult for someone suffering from AIDS to say so on his self-certification form, but that is what the rules require; there is no argument about that.

Thirdly, self-certification has enabled people to pretend that they are ill, and there is no doubt that that sometimes happens.

Mr. Redmond: Does my hon. Friend agree that the trouble with self-certification is that someone may diagnose himself wrongly? The beauty of going to a doctor and explaining one's symptoms is that the doctor may be able to detect a severe disabling illness in its early stages. If the person is suffering from nothing more than a hangover, the doctor can say, "I'm sorry: you ain't getting a note." That means that the person will think twice before trying to mislead his employer again. I agree with my hon. Friend that if someone goes to a doctor and explains his problem, his life may be saved.

Mr. Martlew: I could not agree more. Moreover, self-certification may put public health at risk. Under the old system, someone suffering from food poisoning who worked in a food factory could have his problem identified immediately. The doctor would tell the environmental health officers and the person would be excluded from work. That no longer happens and, as we know, there has been a threefold increase in food poisoning since self-certification and the statutory sick pay scheme came into effect.

As I was saying, there is the odd person who will not play the game—who will skive. In my experience, the entrepreneurial people tended to come back with a sun tan because six days' leave plus a weekend had enabled them to spend a week in Spain. They were a small minority, but it happened nevertheless. We have had a perfect example this week. People who are masquerading as Ministers have in fact been running an election campaign. They are not working. I understand that the Chief Secretary to the Treasury, who was here a moment ago, is the campaign manager for one of the contestants in the leadership election. I bet he has not done much work today. If we had self-certification in the House, the right hon. Gentleman would probably have certified himself sick so that he could get on with his other job.

Mr. Rowe: Some of the hon. Gentleman's post hoc ergo propter hoc arguments are a little loose. It seems to me likely that food poisoning has increased because of the widespread use of microwave ovens rather than because of self-certification. The hon. Gentleman's argument is somewhat dangerous.

Mr. Martlew: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman should say that, as many people's jobs depend on the manufacture of microwave ovens and such a slur could affect them badly. I am a member of the Select Committee on Agriculture, which is looking into the problem of microwave ovens. We have yet to be given any evidence to suggest that that is a major cause of food poisoning.

Mr. Rowe: I did not suggest that microwave ovens were the cause of food poisoning but, rather, that food poisoning is caused by people who do not understand how to use microwave ovens.

Mr. Martlew: I am surprised that Conservative Members should not have learnt the lessons of imprecision. One Minister lost her job because she implied that there was something wrong with eggs. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not lose any influence that he may have by suggesting that there is something wrong with microwave ovens.

Statutory sick pay was a very bureaucratic system, which transferred the costs to industry. I fear that we shall have a problem with disabled people. At present, we do not meet our quota, although I am not sure that a quota system is the right way to get disabled people into employment. Many companies employ people who are disabled but who are not registered as such because there is no need for them to register. I am saying not that the Government have anything other than a diabolical record on the recruitment and employment of disabled people but that the Bill will encourage employers to sack people who are sick. An employer who does so will make a saving. No civilised Government should create such an incentive, yet that is exactly what the Bill does. It will also transfer the cost to the state.

Mr. Quentin Davies: Will the hon. Gentleman reconsider that allegation? No tribunal would accept a genuine illness as a valid ground for dismissal. To sack someone on that basis would result in the employer having to pay redundancy or other compensation charges far greater than any notional saving under the SSP arrangements contained in the Bill.

Mr. Martlew: The hon. Gentleman should be able to square his conscience about this, but if he votes in favour of the Bill tonight, he will not be able to do that. Many people do not have the right to go to a tribunal. If someone has been employed for less than two years or is working a reduced number of hours, he or she will not have the right to go to a tribunal. Those people will qualify for SSP because they have worked long enough for an employer, but they might be dismissed before they have any real rights.

If someone has been working for an employer for 22 or 23 months and is about to qualify for protection under the industrial tribunal legislation, the employer has a double incentive to sack him. If that person is off sick and the employer does not get rid of him beforehand, the employer will be stuck with him. Unfortunately, some employers take that cold, calculating view. I believe that the Government are aware of it, and that is another reason why I shall be voting against the Bill.

9 pm

Mr. Richard Alexander (Newark): I am glad to take part in this debate because I was a member of the Standing Committee that considered the Social Security and Housing Benefits Bill in 1982. I was never a great enthusiast of the sick pay scheme. I felt that it imposed an extra duty on employers whose cup was already full. If they had very few staff and one went sick, they had to pay sickness benefit. Of course, they were reimbursed their payment and the national insurance contribution upon it, but I felt, and still feel to some extent, that that was a burden that I was not terribly happy to impose on the employer.

To my recollection—this is also the recollection of those who briefed us on this matter—assurances were given at that time that the scheme would not require employers actually to pay employees' sick pay. On that basis, those of us who believed that we were part of a crusading Goverment on behalf of smaller businesses and were intent on relieving them of the unnecessary burdens imposed on them by the previous Labour Government went along with the proposal. My right hon. Friend the Minister may correct me when he replies, but I believe, as do some people outside this place, that the Government are going back on commitments made and assurances given at that time. There is also widespread concern about it among the organisations which represent smaller businesses.

The National Farmers Union has given the figures. On present benefit figures, according to the NFU, the changes under this Bill will increase employers' costs for sickness payments by £26·50 a week for employees earning between £125 and just under £175 a week and by £19·90 a week for employees earning £175 or more a week. The Bill proposes that the reimbursement should be reduced from 100 per cent. to 80 per cent. and that the 7 per cent. of national insurance reinbursement should be removed.

I listened carefully to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I was impressed by his examples of how the effects would not be adverse for the vast majority of employers. On that basis, I will be supporting my right hon. Friend in the Lobby tonight. However, we have heard from outside bodies which lobby us that there will be adverse effects and that reductions in national insurance will not cover the extra amount that employers must find. That seems to me to mark a fundamental change in the whole ethos of the social security system.

Had I been a member of the Opposition this evening I should have attacked the Government and said that they were introducing this fundamental change suddenly and by the back door without many people realising what was going on; but since I am a supporter of the Government I will not say that. I suggest, however, that either we have a fully funded social security system or we do not. Like my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) I think that a larger debate is due, in the House and in the country, on the place of social security in our social system, and on the national insurance scheme. Clearly they may be open to reform, but if we are to make major changes we need a more thorough debate on whether that reform is necessary.

[Mr. Richard Alexander]

My understanding of national insurance, which has been on the go for almost 50 years, is that it was designed to recognise that employers could not always afford to pay for employee's sickness. It should not now be for employers, particularly small ones, to have to insure against their employee's sickness. That is one of my basic worries about the Bill and I hope that my right hon. Friend will deal with it in the wind-up Opposition Members have said that the proposal will create a problem for people with disabilities or illness, and I agree. I listened carefully to my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, who said that he did not believe that the measure would have that effect on the disabled. He said that they had a fine employment record, that employers found that they were good employees and that there was no real discrimination against them. Perhaps the Bill will not mean that employers will be reluctant to take on disabled people, but there is a case for doubting whether people with a poor health record will be taken on. Employers, especially those at the margins, may look at a potential employee and say, "What is your health record? Unless you can give me some assurance that you are a fairly fit chap"—even for an unskilled job—"I will not take you on." I hope that these provisions will not have that effect, but I am worried.

All hon. Members know that smaller businesses are fighting for their lives and trading on the margins. We are all, I hope, trying to ensure that we do not impose on them greater burdens which will mean that they are pushed over the cliff. I am advised that there could be a burden of up to £11 a week for as many as 28 weeks. When I put that point to my right hon. Friend he assured me that the vast majority of cases of sickness lasted much less than 28 weeks. Nevertheless, this potential burden exists and I believe that I should articulate it on behalf of smaller businesses.

Smaller businesses are a loyal group—loyal to their employees and to the communities where they trade—and we need this section of industry. I look forward to hearing how the Minister proposes to deal with the anxieties that smaller businesses have expressed in correspondence with hon. Members and in a meeting that I had with my local federation of the self-employed. We have to sell these ideas to our constituents. As I said, some businesses are trading very much on the margins and we have a big selling job to do. The first task in that job is for my right hon. Friend the Minister to sell the ideas to us.

9.10 pm

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): The Bill has just three clauses, and clauses 2 and 3 are consequential on clause 1. However, the Minister took some time to introduce it.

I entered the House in 1978 and the hon. Member who replied to my maiden speech said that he was very happy about how things had gone. He said, "The hon. Gentleman has retained his seat, the Conservative has increased his vote, and the Liberal candidate did not lose his deposit." According to the Minister, the Bill is like that, because he said that it would not hurt the employee and does not make any difference to the employer. However, £157 million has to come from somewhere.

There is a Yorkshire saying, "You don't get owt for nowt." That means that we have to look at what is behind something that is seemingly being given away. If the Minister had said that his proposals were part of an overall scheme and would eventually lead to a new social security system, I could have accepted it. I would have welcomed the modernisation of a hotch-potch of welfare benefits in which we alter bits here and there. We are not being honest with ourselves unless we say that there is a plan to get rid of a hotch-potch of a system.

I believe the Minister when he says that there is nothing else in his drawer, because there is no reason why there should be anything. However, the Government's ultimate aim is to move responsibility for the state-funded welfare service to the backs of others. That happened with the poll tax, when the Government moved the burden of taxation from central to local government. The Bill is a continuation of the policy of moving the burden of the welfare state away from central Government and on to the employer: that is what it is all about.

The Secretary of State says that his proposals will not hurt the employer. He has not thought deeply enough about them, because their effect depends on the size of the employer, the number of his employees and his turnover. When we argue for increased wages, the Government tell us that employers cannot stand the expense, but the Bill creates additional expense for the employer. It will bring back to the Government over £150 million and, as I have said, that must come from somewhere. It will come from the employer.

The Government say that the money will be targeted elsewhere, but I am a little fed up with talk about targeting. When targeting takes place, it is always the lowest-paid who are hit. The Bill moves from the poor to strike at the poorer still. The Government are reallocating the money in the system rather than bringing in new money. The explanatory and financial memorandum to the Bill states:

"Clause 1 will produce savings in public expenditure of £181m in 1991-92, rising to £190m in 1992-93 and £197m in 1993-94."

It is simply taking money from one pocket and putting it into another. There is nothing magic about it. They are trying to create an illusion of being a caring Government looking after the low-paid workers. We have to ask ourselves who created these low-paid workers, the number of whom has increased since 1979. The Government are simply looking after a problem that they have created by creating further problems. That is what the Bill is about.

The Bill will affect the employer and the employee. I am sure that hon. Members will agree that a disabled person in employment gives more because he is disabled and appreciates having a job. I am concerned about people affected by recurring sickness. The Minister knows, because we have talked about this, that in mining areas there is a high incidence of bronchitis and emphysema. Chest diseases manifest themselves with the start of the cold weather. People who have left mining and gone into other employment will often have such illnesses.

An employer will wonder why he should take on such a person when he knows that it will cost him later on. I remember a manager saying to one of his employees who was ill, and who had said that he thought that the manager might have more sympathy, "I have, lad, but I can't run t' pit on sympathy." That is what the feeling of an employer will be when he has to decide whether to employ certain people.

As the recession bites and people have to be laid off, the first to go will be those who add to the running costs of a company, although they are the very ones who should be kept in work. The Bill will not only contribute to such problems, but is part of an overall scheme. During progress towards the completion of the scheme, many problems will be caused for sick people and, without any shadow of a doubt, for the small employer.

Let us not forget that the national insurance scheme was brought in on the understanding that there would be a full rebate and it would cost the employers nothing. It has always cost the employers something, because they have had to administer it, but 7 per cent. never even did that. By saying that they will pay only 80 per cent., the Government have reneged on their promise. There is a sting in the tail as well, in that the level of payment can be reduced through a statutory instrument, without a debate in the House. The Secretary of State has taken that power on himself, and it is no good saying that it will never be used. That was said about the rules and regulations on adopting a leader, but they are being used. The very fact that the power is there will lead a Secretary of State to use it when he thinks fit. That is wrong.

9.18 pm

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): The Secretary of State made it clear that it was impossible to discuss the Bill in isolation, without referring to the package of reforms on statutory sick pay that he announced in the uprating statement. Tory Members of Parliament have talked almost exclusively of their worries about the effects that it will have on employers. We share those concerns, but we are also concerned about the effect on employees.

I am sorry that the hon. Member for Stamford and Spalding (Mr. Davies) is not here, because when he suggested in an intervention that the package protects the low-paid, he was wrong. Some £100 million is being deliberately taken away from low-paid workers when they are sick. Some 3 million people earning between £125 and £175 a week will lose up to £9 a week. That is because the threshold has been moved and they have been deprived of the higher rate of sickness benefit.

The hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) suggested that it was right that the higher-paid should help other groups in need—taking money from those who are sick to give it to, for example, elderly and frail people in residential homes. That is one poor group funding another poor group, which is the wrong way to go about it. If the hon. Gentleman thinks that people earning up to £175 a week are well paid, I ask him to examine his monthly pay cheques.

It is interesting that in this package the Government recognise the Council of Europe's decency threshold. The aim of all EEC Governments should be that no one should be paid an income below that threshold. For Britain, that would be a little more than £175 a week. The people about whom we are talking are, by definition, low paid. Conservative Members must not talk as if people on less than £175 are well off and can afford to lose out when they are sick in order to help other needy groups.

Under this package, 3 million people earning between £125 and £175 a week will lose up to £9 a week when they are sick. That is in addition to the 2 million people who were deprived in that way last year. Five million people will lose out significantly on the amount that they are paid when sick. Because there was no uprating in line with inflation, those earning more than £175 a week will lose up to £5·70 a week. The Government are hiding behind inflation to impose a cut on sick people. There is also no doubt that the changes will make it more difficult for people who have been sick, who are mentally ill or who are recovering from serious illnesses such as a stroke to obtain employment.

When the Secretary of State quotes studies showing that people with disabilities are reliable workers, and therefore claims that the package will not affect them, he talks as if they are a group with a firmly defined difficulty that does not include all those who have had some sickness and difficulty in their lives and are beginning to join the group of those who are low paid and have difficulty in employment because of sickness. We know that the majority of people with disabilities become sick during their working lives—they do not have a disability at birth that affects them throughout their lives. The National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses said that the package will lead to much more difficulty for those people in obtaining employment.

I should like hon. Members to reflect personally on that matter. There is too much of a feeling in the House that it is all about some funny people outside who can live on £175 a week and are well paid. No hon. Members who examined their weekly income and outgoings would talk like that.

We are always pleased to see the return of one of our colleagues who has been sick, as happened tonight. The hon. Member for Dudley, West (Dr. Blackburn) referred to his serious illness. I am sure that we were touched by his comments and are glad to see him back. However, I am glad that, during his illness, he did not have to see his income drop to a third of what it otherwise would have been and that he and his family did not have not only the worry about his illness but the worry about whether they could find the money to pay the bills while he was ill.

We all share these values, but only for us, only for the higher-paid in society. Meanwhile, we vote for a measure that would increase the insecurity and worries of lower-paid people. That is what we have in front of us. There are two nations—a point that should mean something to Conservative Members, especially when they are trying to restore their image and to show that they are not in favour of such a bitterly divided nation. We are talking about people earning only £125 a week being paid £43·50 a week and about people earning more than that being paid £52·50 a week. Imagine keeping one's family on those amounts.

Mr. Newton rose——

Ms. Short: Let me continue and I shall give way later to the right hon. Gentleman. I am sure that I know what he is going to say.

The Government are deceitful—I repeat the serious word used by my hon. Friend the Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher)—about the evidence on the existence of occupational sick pay schemes. I am shocked that the Secretary of State so often stresses the misleading figure claiming that 90 per cent. of employees work in firms that provide occupational sick pay for some of their workers, and from that tries to hint that most people are covered. We know that that is not the case. A false excuse—a misrepresentation of research—is being used to justify a cut in the income of sick people. I thought more highly than that of the right hon. Gentleman.

[Ms. Short]

As hon. Members will be aware, the Disability Alliance represents a federation of 80 organisations concerned with the interests of people with disabilities. It is its strong view that "the Government have grossly distorted the findings of its research. A closer look reveals that 44 per cent. of all private sector firms and over half, that is 55 per cent. of firms with less than 10 employees, which in turn accounts for 75 per cent. of all firms, have no scheme whatsoever."

That is the reality.

We know that many firms and organisations that have schemes do not provide for all their workers. The management and the white-collar workers are more likely to be provided for than the low-paid and manual workers. The Bill will cut the income of low-paid workers when they are sick, many of whom will have no other income to support their family. That is outrageous and the Secretary of State should be ashamed of himself.

Mr. Newton: I do not intend to go over the ground that I covered in my speech, although my right hon. Friend the Minister will no doubt say a word or two more about the statistics. I want to pick up the hon. Lady on her assertion that those workers have no other income when they are sick. Surely she realises that people with family responsibilities and no other income are entitled to income support—whether last year, this year, next year or the year after. For a man supporting a wife and two children, at no time during recent years would sickness benefit or statutory sick pay have provided his whole income. He would be entitled to income support at the normal rate. The hon. Lady should at least acknowledge that.

Ms. Short: If the right hon. Gentleman represented a constituency such as mine, he would know that many families with an income as low as £125 to £175 a week do not like being dependent on benefit. That is one reason why many low-income families do not claim family credit. They juggle their child care responsibilities so that both partners can work—usually with an even lower income for the wife—and maintain their family. If one of the working partners becomes sick, they will not be eligible for income support and they will also lose about £80 a week to the family budget at a time of worry and sickness.

Of course, the right hon. Gentleman is technically correct to say that those dependent on low pay, who have no other income and are therefore falling below the level necessary to exist, would be eligible for income support, but there is no doubt that the figures for those claiming it are low. Many families will be faced with both the worry of sickness and a large drop in their income. The Secretary of State's package will make that very much worse.

It is true, as my hon. Friend the Member for Leeds, West (Mr. Battle) strongly asserted, that the changes are part of a process in the constant erosion of the ideas and principles of the national insurance scheme. There is no doubt that the Government and Conservative Members hate—on the basis of ideology, not from any rational examination—the idea of any state provision that cares for all of us. They want to privatise pension provision and sickness provision. That is a much worse system.

We all know and understand that the pattern employment are changing and that we are all like change jobs on a number of occasions during our wo lives. We therefore need flexible pension provisions th can carry with us when we change jobs, and the flexible is the state scheme. One can take it whereve works. It covers everyone. It has no holes. Everyone into it when they are doing okay, and can afford to and it offers protection if something happens neighbour, friend, or to oneself. We are part of a s that provides a basic level of security.

Under SERPS, it is possible to opt out, but the scheme provides a minimum standard for all. I like provision, and the same should apply to sick pay should all pay into a scheme according to our income be protected according to our needs. I am happy for to be opting out or enhancements to that arrangemen the existing provision offers the most flexible and way of providing everyone with insurance—for t what it is. Why have a lot of competing and ineff systems when there can be one national scheme provides a basic minimum for all? However, we favour also of private and topping-up schemes enhance the desirable minimum arrangement.

Conservative Members do not agree with suc arrangement. They hate the national insurance syste the idea of any state provision. They try constant erode it and to break it up, and the Bill is part o ideological destructiveness—quite apart from st £100 million from sick and low-paid workers.

It is clear from the contributions of Conser Members that they have no regard for the points ma for example, the Low Pay Unit, which is deeply w about the effect of the changes on low-paid workers. surprised that Government Members made no refere the briefing from the Disability Alliance, which i deeply opposed to the changes, believing that the seriously harm the disabled and make it more difficu those with a record of illness, or who are recovering a serious illness, to obtain employment. Conser Members showed little concern also about the submi made by the National Federation of Self Employe Small Businesses, which is also strongly opposed Bill. We oppose it both for its likely effects on the sic because of the strain that it will impose on employers.

The Bill has been introduced disgracefully quickl without consultation, partly to achieve savings, bu will not begin to be made until next April. Therefor legislation could have been dealt with more gracefully Government acted in the way that they did to consultation. They were defeated before by bu organisations. When there was a previous risk that th scheme would not be fully funded, the business comm made such a fuss, and placed so much pressure on p such as the hon. Member for Newark (Mr. Alexa who served on the relevant Committee, tha Government were forced to give in and to go for 1 cent. reimbursement.

The Bill is receiving its Second Reading today, an have its Committee stage on the Floor of the Hous Report on Wednesday, so that it can be passed wi giving the small business organisations time to mobi stop it. As the hon. Member for Newark clearly sai Government are breaking their word and the pro that they made in the past.

The National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses received an undertaking that there would be full funding, but now—and without any consultation—that is being done away with. The federation says that the Government are dishonourable and have broken their word. The federation is also deeply worried that the Bill will reduce reimbursement not only from 100 per cent. to 80 per cent., but down to zero if necessary. It is worried that the intention is to withdraw all state funding of statutory sick pay, and there is no other explanation for the Bill. If the Government simply wanted to save £100 million, they could do so by failing to uprate or to change the thresholds, which would not require the Bill. It is needed to give the Government the power in future to cut the amount that is reimbursed to small businesses.

Currently, the package is neutral, in that businesses will lose £250 million, but will be paid £250 million this year. However, as the Secretary of State acknowledged, that does not mean that individual businesses will not lose out. He gave two examples of ways in which small firms could gain, but that must mean that others will be losers, depending on the types of occupation, the region, different types of small firms, and the different levels of sickness in certain occupations and regions involved, and so on.

There is no point to the Bill, and the Government would not have put it together unless they intended to erode the funding of SSP over the years. We should not go to all that trouble for a neutral package—there would be no point. It would be meaningless. We already have figures that show the extent of Government savings next year and the year after, and they are higher. The Government have given no undertaking that reimbursement to businesses will be equal in future years to the figure in the Bill. Erosion will start next year and will continue the year after, even if there is no change in the reimbursement to business.

There is no doubt that the Government are planning to disengage from sick pay and pass on the burden to employers. There is no other explanation. It is impossible to explain the Bill in any other way. I think that the hon. Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran) understood that very well and stated it in the cautious way that a Conservative Member who supports the Government has to. If any hon. Member thinks seriously, there is no other explanation why the Bill should be before the House.

The National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses also said that the measures will hurt the sick and that a national insurance scheme is essential for small businesses. Small organisations cannot possibly organise insurance, firm by firm, to protect their employees. We agree. We think that statutory sick pay is good for people and good for small businesses. The Government are attacking the principle of national insurance.

The hon. Member for Birmingham, Northfield (Mr. King) offered an interesting argument. If he is right, all the assurances that we have been given by the Government are wrong. He said that we should make employers pay when their employees are sick, because that would make them organise health programmes for their employees.

Mr. Roger King: No.

Ms. Short: I thought that that was the substance of the hon. Gentleman's speech. I also thought that about 90 per cent. of it was out of order, but clearly I was wrong as no one called him to order. His programme depends upon punishing employers, charging them more, to encourage them to develop health programmes for their employees. That was his whole argument. He let the cat out of the bag. He does not support what the Secretary of State says, although he asserts that he does, but he wants to punish employers, to force them to make employees go into health programmes.

That is that package before us, and it is very unappetising. Why do we have it? One reason is the plan for the future, which will punish businesses more and phase out any national system of protection for sick pay, but there are other reasons. That leads us to the uprating statement. The Government were becoming more and more embarrassed by their failure to increase child benefit. They claim to be the party of the family, but they were reducing the value of child benefit—the benefit that demonstrates the costs and value of children that we recognise as a society and pay.

The Government were embarrassed. In the end they came up with a package that contained some increase for the first-born. How were they to pay for it, as the Treasury required a neutral uprating package, with no extra money for social security? By stealing money off the low-paid sick.

The other embarrassment for the Government was high levels of poverty among pensioners dependent upon state pensions, because they have broken the link between earnings and state pensions and such pensioners are falling further and further behind the rest of society. So we got a special little bonus for very poor elderly pensioners, which is to be paid for by the low-paid sick. The third group that will benefit from the cut are poor, frail, elderly people in residential homes, who are in danger of eviction.

Of course, we want to protect the elderly sick, we want to increase child benefit, and we certainly do not want frail elderly people to be thrown out of residential homes. However, we think that it is an outrage and a disgrace that the low-paid sick should be required to pay.

The Government have deliberately made enormous cuts in taxation for the richest people in our society. The figures are shocking. Virtually every time we discuss social security I quote them, and I shall do so again. They are the answer to every Conservative Member who picks up the Conservative central office briefing, and who asks how we can possibly find the money for £900 million in sick pay for the nation—or whatever the figure may be.

Taking into consideration the combined effect of cumulative tax and benefit changes from 1979 to 1988, since the Conservatives came into power—so it is worse than this now—a serious publication by John Hill, which I recommend to any hon. Members who want to check it out, states:

"Remarkably what has happened has been a virtual zero net cost reform. The cuts in direct taxes have been entirely paid for by cuts in the generosity of benefits. There has indeed been a major redistribution from those on low incomes to the better off. Overall, the bottom 60 per cent. of the income distribution has lost, while the top 30 per cent., especially the top 10 per cent., has gained. The losses for the bottom 50 per cent. average out at nearly £8·50 per family—a substantial proportion of their net incomes—while the top 10 per cent. have gained nearly £40 per family. Overall, the bottom half of the population has lost £6·6 billion, of which £5·6 billion has gone to the top 10 per cent., and indeed £4·8 billion has gone to the top 5 per cent."

The figures are worsened by two further years of the erosion of pensions and child benefit and, of course, by the poll tax. There is no money for child benefit or for the frail elderly sick because you have given it all in tax cuts to your very rich friends——

[Ms. Short]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Ms. Short: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker. The Government have done that.

I understand that in the leadership contest for the Conservative party, the Secretary of State supports the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who keeps forcing all these cuts on him. The Conservative party had to get rid of the Prime Minister because she is disliked by large parts of the British population and because her Government made our society so unequal, so unfair and so divided. The Bill introduces a further package of such unpopular measures. All three candidates for leadership of the Conservative party support the changes. Whoever leads it, we oppose the 11 years of redistribution and inequality. It has damaged our country, made it more unjust and more unequal, and the Bill is a further example of that.

9.41 pm

The Minister for Social Security and Disabled People (Mr. Nicholas Scott): I doubt that our proceedings will find a place in The Guinness Book of Records, unless it is for the record number of interventions that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State allowed. Before the hon. Member for Halifax (Mrs. Mahon) leaves, it was bizarre for her to criticise him for speaking for an hour and a quarter of embarrassment. He spoke for that length of time because he was concerned, with his usual courtesy, to allow hon. Members, mainly Labour Members, to intervene. Her charge hardly hits the target.

We have had a long debate on a Bill that has only one substantive clause and two consequent ones. I make no complaint about that. Several themes have emerged to which I shall try to reply.

I must tell my hon. Friends the Members for Mid-Kent (Mr. Rowe) and for Newark (Mr. Alexander) that, in the time available, I do not propose to go down the route that they invited me to tread about a wholly different structure for social security benefits. When I was first told the time that I might have to reply to the debate, I might have been tempted to take that route, but as the time has been filled so satisfactorily it is not necessary.

I shall deal, first, with the important point about whether we propose any change or whether we have broken a pledge made when we moved to the statutory sick pay scheme. I was elsewhere when the scheme was introduced and subsequent changes were made, but I acknowledge that the method of reimbursement was a major factor in discussions with employers and their organisations before SSP was introduced in 1983. I can trace no guarantee that the Government, having launched the scheme on the old basis, would not wish to review the position once employers had experience of operating SSP and in the light of other developments. That is precisely what the Government are doing under the Bill.

My hon. Friend the Member for Beverley (Mr. Cran), the hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) and other hon. Members sought assurances about our future plans for the reimbursement rate. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made it clear that we have no plans for any further changes—up or down. In the before becoming a Member, I used to say that the of Lords was littered with Ministers who had said "I It would therefore be pretty unwise of me to tal route today. All these matters will have to be consid the light of future circumstances.

The hon. Member for Orkney and Shetland whether, if adjustments are made, changes would b at the same time in the national insurance contri These are two quite separate matters. As my righ Friend said, this year we are considering the change context of reductions to be made in national ins contributions. The two, however, are not linked. Th statutory duty that my right hon. Friend has when h at the national insurance fund is to consider the inc and outgoings from the fund and to decide what c may be necessary.

Of course, it would be desirable further to contributions to the national insurance fund in o ease the burden of different levels of pay outside, b has to be considered separately from anything tha hypothetically happen to levels of reimbursem statutory sick pay.

Mr. Wallace: The Secretary of State made great the fact that, although more money will com employers after the Bill is passed, there are neve compensating features in terms of national ins contributions. Is the Minister saying that in futur employers will be unable to expect automatic compe reductions in their national insurance contributions?

Mr. Scott: The hon. Gentleman has leapt a nu fences. I have already said that we have no plans t either up or down, the rate of reimbursement for st sick pay. This year we have looked at the pr changes in the light of reductions in national in contributions. We should have to see where we we ever wanted to consider changing the rate of rei ment either up or down.

Opposition Members have criticised the statutory sick pay package because of what I regar fairly modest shift in the balance of short-term s provision between the state and business which wi from the changes. They got quite excited at tim made, in my view, some totally unjustifiable alle about the effects of the proposals on employees. return to those accusations later.

I have to disappoint the hon. Member for Ashfi Haynes), who, I see, has changed his place, ju changed mine earlier in the debate, by saying tha not seek to withdraw the Bill at this time.

One of the most bizarre accusations in the deb that made by the hon. Member for Birmi Ladywood (Ms. Short), both in an earlier interven alluded to in her wind-up speech. She accu Government of seeking quick passage of the legisl avoid criticism by the small employers lobby. I beli to be an absolutely ridiculous accusation. If it w case, we should not have sent copies of my rig Friend's uprating statement to those organisatio should we have sent them copies of the Bill—whic immediately after it was presented to Parliament. moving more quickly, simply to give employers make arrangements to operate the new rates and for the changes. That is sensible.

Some of my hon. Friends expressed concern about the cost to employers, particularly small employers. I shall seek to deal with their concerns. The House will not be surprised to hear that, as Minister for Social Security and Disabled People, I am particularly concerned about some of the suggestions regarding the impact of the changes on those who are disabled or handicapped. In particular, a number of hon. Members suggested that the result of the proposals will be that employers will be less likely to employ people with disablilities, or those who suffer from bad health.

That is something which is close to my heart. I should be very concerned if it were to turn out to be true. However, I strongly believe that that will not be the case. My right hon. Friend made it clear in his opening speech that charges of that nature have surfaced in the past, both when statutory sick pay was first introduced and later when it was extended to 28 weeks. However, they have never been substantiated. If that were happening, I am confident that I should have heard about it. In fact, what evidence there is points in the opposite direction.

In general, people with disabilities—this point was made by a number of my hon. Friends and also by the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew)—do not have bad attendance records. Often they are better than those of able-bodied people. Patricia Prescott-Clarke, of Social and Community Planning Research, found that half the people with disabilities in work took fewer than five days a year off work for sickness or treatment. Over a five-year period, half of them had not had a spell of sickness or treatment lasting a month. There is no suggestion there that the employment of a disabled person would lead to increased costs for the employer.

It has been the constant endeavour, not just of this Government but of successive Governments in recent years, to make employers increasingly aware of the abilities of disabled people. The Department of Employment continues to work to get employers to see facts such as these and also the advantages and opportunities that the employment of the disabled can provide. In the past year, the Department of Employment spent about £350 million obtaining employment for disabled people and keeping them in employment. I hope that we shall be able to break down progressively any reservations felt by employers about employing them.

As I have said before in the House, the pressures of demography—and, certainly, the application by employers of enlightened self-interest—will increasingly make it imperative for employers to look for the skills that disabled people are able to bring to the job market.

Mr. Flynn: I am sure that the Minister is sincere; however, it has already been pointed out that his Department has employed less than half the quota of people with disabilities. That is slightly better than the record of the other Departments—1·1 per cent.—but should not he and the Government lead by example?

Mr. Scott: I am sorry that the hon. Gentleman has felt it necessary to repeat what he said earlier. I note that the hon. Member for Carlisle (Mr. Martlew) disagreed with him.

The quota is for registered disabled people. Many thousands of disabled people do not want to hang the "registered disabled" label round their necks. If every employer in the country sought to employ a 3 per cent. quota, there would not be enough registered disabled people to go round. I think that it is much better to operate on a broader front, encouraging employers to respond to the skill shortages that will appear increasingly in the economy, improving access to buildings—workshops, factories and so on—introducing new technology to help disabled people to earn their living and, not least, implementing the new benefit that we shall introduce in 1992: the disability working allowance, which will provide immense encouragement for disabled people to earn their own living.

Mr. Haynes: What about the firms which do not take on any disabled people, although they are able to do so?

Mr. Scott: As I said, I believe that the way forward lies in encouragement and example. Many employers not only take on disabled people but communicate their experience of employing them to other employers, encouraging them to follow their good example. That, surely, is a much better approach.

It has been said that some of those who lobby on behalf of small employers sometimes overstate their case. That may be true, but none of them approaches the record of the hon. Members for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) and for Ladywood in overstating theirs in successive debates. Much has been said during the debate about the effects that the changes contained in the Bill will have on small employers, and I accept that there is genuine worry on both sides of the House. I have seen the representations made by various organisations, and I understand their concern. It is because we appreciated that the changes might hit smaller employers harder that we have weighted the reductions in national insurance contributions in the way that we did.

By reducing the employers' national insurance contributions for rates of pay up to £185 a week by 0·4 per cent.—not 0·25 per cent., as was suggested by the hon. Member for Oldham, West—as against a reduction of 0·05 per cent. for those earning more than that amount, we are weighting the reductions in respect of employees who will be on the lower rate of SSP. Therefore, the savings for small employers—my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State gave examples in his opening speech—will be proportionately greater than those for other employers and, in some instances, will more than match any extra SSP costs. I am not sure that that has yet been fully appreciated by the small employers' organisations.

The present Government have a good record of pursuing policies that assist small employers. The taxation structure has been dramatically simplified since 1979 for both individuals and small firms; overall rates of taxation are lower, and special rates of corporation and capital tax operate for small employers.

Moreover, the number of special schemes and training services set up by the Government is substantial. Let me mention just a few. There is the loan guarantee scheme which, since its inception in 1981, has issued more than 25,000 guarantees for loans totalling over £837 million. A report by independent consultants has confirmed that the scheme meets a real need in small firms finance. There is also the business expansion scheme, the activities and programmes of the Training Agency, the enterprise allowance scheme and the business growth scheme. No one can accuse the Government of not caring about small firms; quite the reverse. I hope that the small firms' interests and hon. Members who are concerned about their needs will recognise that.

[Mr. Scott]

One must take into account the following three factors. First, over half all statutory sick pay spells are over within two weeks and 90 per cent. are over within eight weeks. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said, the average spell is three weeks. Secondly, the savings that will be achieved are only a small fraction—some 0·05 per cent.—of the labour costs over the economy as a whole, which are estimated to be about £300 billion. Thirdly, the reduction in national insurance contributions, which is the important context of these changes, will provide worthwhile savings to employers.

It is clear from this debate that the impact on individual employers will not be as significant as some may have feared. The Government believe that such additional costs as may transfer from the state to employers are not unreasonable.

Some hon. Members, particularly Labour Members, have suggested that many employers cannot cope with SSP and often get it wrong. Even worse, some employers dismiss employees rather than pay SSP which, incidentally, is against the law. Reference has been made to the recent report by the National Association of Citizens Advice Bureaux entitled "Hard Labour".

Mr. Martlew: Will the Minister elaborate on that point? Which law would be broken if a person were dismissed on those grounds?

Mr. Scott: Employment protection legislation.

Mr. Martlew: That does not always apply.

Mr. Scott: So long as a person has been working for a reasonable time for the employer——

Mr. Martlew: Two years.

Mr. Scott: Yes, I accept that point.

My right hon. Friend and I have seen the report. Although it deals mainly with employment protection and wages matters, it includes some references to SSP. The Department has already sent to NACAB a detailed reply on all the recommendations relating to Department of Social Security responsibilities. Despite some individual cases cited, which hon. Members have mentioned tonight, it is certainly not our experience that employers cannot operate the scheme.

Over the past two years we have made considerable efforts better to inform employers about SSP. We have employed outside market research consultants and the SSP guide for employers has been completely revised in both content and presentation. A quick guide has been introduced which employers can use in straightforward cases. A wall chart and a video have also been made available. I can tell the House that the new literature has been widely welcomed by business.

In addition, the Department provides a freeline telephone inquiry service directly for employers about national insurance contributions, SSP and statutory maternity pay, plus a free seminar service. Since January, well-attended seminars have been held in many major towns and cities.

I should also point out that the Departm representative employers panel, consisting of large employers and their organisations. It in example, the National Federation of Self Emp Small Businesses and the CBI. They are consulted by us.

I accept that there will always be small emp will be unsure about some aspects of the sche because they need to operate SSP only infreque that the House will agree that the initiatives th taken and will continue to take will greatly problems.

Finally, if NACAB, the Low Pay Unit or organisation uncovers what it believes malpractice or mistakes by an employer, it sh local social security office know immediat procedure is put into operation when an considers that he has been wrongly denied SS being paid the correct amount. The employee for a formal decision from the adjudication o local DSS office. Where an employer fails to c a decision of the adjudicating authorities prescribed time, responsibility for paying SSP p DSS, which will at the same time consider fur against the employer. The employee is the protected, if the correct action is taken promp

Much has been said during the deb occupational sick pay coverage, and Oppositio have called into question the Government's as the majority of employees will have any differ entitlement made up by occupational sick research was carried out by a responsible and international consultancy organisation and it information that we base our claims that, alth not know exactly how many people are cove pay schemes, 90 per cent. of firms have such

We have had a good debate. The Gover taken the right steps and I commend the Bill to Question put, That the Bill be now read time:—

The House divided: Ayes 231, Noes 119

Division No. 11]

AYES

Aitken, Jonathan	Browne, John (Wi
Alexander, Richard	Bruce, Ian (Dorset
Alison, Rt Hon Michael	Burns, Simon
Allason, Rupert	Burt, Alistair
Amess, David	Butterfill, John
Amos, Alan	Carlisle, John, (Lu
Arbuthnot, James	Carlisle, Kenneth
Arnold, Jacques (Gravesham)	Carrington, Matthe
Arnold, Sir Thomas	Cash, William
Ashby, David	Chalker, Rt Hon M
Aspinwall, Jack	Channon, Rt Hon
Atkins, Robert	Chapman, Sydney
Atkinson, David	Chope, Christophe
Baker, Rt Hon K. (Mole Valley)	Clark, Sir W. (Cro
Baker, Nicholas (Dorset N)	Clarke, Rt Hon K.
Batiste, Spencer	Coombs, Simon (S
Bellingham, Henry	Cormack, Patrick
Bendall, Vivian	Couchman, James
Benyon, W.	Cran, James
Bevan, David Gilroy	Davies, Q. (Stamf
Blackburn, Dr John G.	Davis, David (Boo
Boscawen, Hon Robert	Day, Stephen
Bowden, A (Brighton K'pto'n)	Devlin, Tim
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)	Dover, Den
Brazier, Julian	Dunn, Bob
Bright, Graham	Durant, Tony
Brown, Michael (Brigg & Cl't's)	Dykes, Hugh

Evans, David (Welwyn Hatf'd)
Fallon, Michael
Favell, Tony
Field, Barry (Isle of Wight)
Finsberg, Sir Geoffrey
Fishburn, John Dudley
Fookes, Dame Janet
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fox, Sir Marcus
Franks, Cecil
Freeman, Roger
Gale, Roger
Gardiner, George
Gill, Christopher
Gilmour, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Glyn, Dr Sir Alan
Goodlad, Alastair
Goodson-Wickes, Dr Charles
Gorman, Mrs Teresa
Grant, Sir Anthony (CambsSW)
Greenway, Harry (Ealing N)
Greenway, John (Ryedale)
Griffiths, Peter (Portsmouth N)
Ground, Patrick
Grylls, Michael
Gummer, Rt Hon John Selwyn
Hague, William
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hanley, Jeremy
Hannam, John
Hargreaves, Ken (Hyndburn)
Harris, David
Haselhurst, Alan
Hawkins, Christopher
Hayes, Jerry
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Sir Barney
Hayward, Robert
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael
Hicks, Mrs Maureen (Wolv' NE)
Hicks, Robert (Cornwall SE)
Higgins, Rt Hon Terence L.
Hill, James
Hind, Kenneth
Hogg, Hon Douglas (Gr'th'm)
Howard, Rt Hon Michael
Howarth, Alan (Strat'd-on-A)
Howarth, G. (Cannock & B'wd)
Howell, Rt Hon David (G'dford)
Howell, Ralph (North Norfolk)
Hunt, Sir John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Hurd, Rt Hon Douglas
Irvine, Michael
Jack, Michael
Janman, Tim
Jessel, Toby
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Robert B (Herts W)
Kellett-Bowman, Dame Elaine
Key, Robert
King, Roger (B'ham N'thfield)
King, Rt Hon Tom (Bridgwater)
Kirkhope, Timothy
Knapman, Roger
Knight, Greg (Derby North)
Knowles, Michael
Knox, David
Lamont, Rt Hon Norman
Lang, Ian
Latham, Michael
Lawrence, Ivan
Lightbown, David
Lilley, Peter
Lloyd, Peter (Fareham)
Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
McCrindle, Sir Robert
Macfarlane, Sir Neil
MacGregor, Rt Hon John
MacKay, Andrew (E Berkshire)
Maclean, David
McLoughlin, Patrick
Mans, Keith
Maples, John
Marshall, John (Hendon S)
Maude, Hon Francis
Mayhew, Rt Hon Sir Patrick
Meyer, Sir Anthony
Miller, Sir Hal
Mills, Iain
Mitchell, Andrew (Gedling)
Mitchell, Sir David
Moate, Roger
Morrison, Sir Charles
Moss, Malcolm
Mudd, David
Neale, Gerrard
Nelson, Anthony
Neubert, Michael
Newton, Rt Hon Tony
Nicholson, David (Taunton)
Nicholson, Emma (Devon West)
Norris, Steve
Onslow, Rt Hon Cranley
Oppenheim, Phillip
Paice, James
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Porter, David (Waveney)
Portillo, Michael
Powell, William (Corby)
Price, Sir David
Raffan, Keith
Raison, Rt Hon Timothy
Renton, Rt Hon Tim
Rhodes James, Robert
Ridley, Rt Hon Nicholas
Roberts, Sir Wyn (Conwy)
Rowe, Andrew
Ryder, Richard
Sackville, Hon Tom
Scott, Rt Hon Nicholas
Shaw, David (Dover)
Shaw, Sir Giles (Pudsey)
Shaw, Sir Michael (Scarb')
Shephard, Mrs G. (Norfolk SW)
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Sims, Roger
Skeet, Sir Trevor
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Hon Nicholas
Speed, Keith
Speller, Tony
Squire, Robin
Stanbrook, Ivor
Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Steen, Anthony
Stern, Michael
Stevens, Lewis
Stewart, Allan (Eastwood)
Stewart, Andy (Sherwood)
Sumberg, David
Summerson, Hugo
Taylor, Ian (Esher)
Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Taylor, Teddy (S'end E)
Tebbit, Rt Hon Norman
Temple-Morris, Peter
Thompson, D. (Calder Valley)
Thompson, Patrick (Norwich N)
Thornton, Malcolm
Thurnham, Peter
Tracey, Richard
Trippier, David
Twinn, Dr Ian
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Walker, Bill (T'side North)
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, Charles (Bexhill)
Warren, Kenneth
Watts, John
Wheeler, Sir John
Whitney, Ray
Widdecombe, Ann
Wiggin, Jerry
Wilkinson, John
Wilshire, David
Winterton, Mrs Ann
Winterton, Nicholas
Wood, Timothy
Woodcock, Dr. Mike
Yeo, Tim
Young, Sir George (Acton)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Irvine Patnick and
Mr. Tim Boswell.

NOES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Allen, Graham
Alton, David
Archer, Rt Hon Peter
Ashdown, Rt Hon Paddy
Ashton, Joe
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)
Barnes, Harry (Derbyshire NE)
Beckett, Margaret
Bellotti, David
Bermingham, Gerald
Blair, Tony
Blunkett, David
Boyes, Roland
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, Nicholas (Newcastle E)
Buckley, George J.
Caborn, Richard
Canavan, Dennis
Carlile, Alex (Mont'g)
Clark, Dr David (S Shields)
Clelland, David
Coleman, Donald
Corbett, Robin
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Crowther, Stan
Cryer, Bob
Dalyell, Tam
Davies, Rt Hon Denzil (Llanelli)
Davies, Ron (Caerphilly)
Davis, Terry (B'ham Hodge H'l)
Dixon, Don
Dobson, Frank
Eadie, Alexander
Eastham, Ken
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Fields, Terry (L'pool B G'n)
Flannery, Martin
Flynn, Paul
Foot, Rt Hon Michael
Foster, Derek
Foulkes, George
Fraser, John
Galloway, George
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Golding, Mrs Llin
Grant, Bernie (Tottenham)
Griffiths, Nigel (Edinburgh S)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grocott, Bruce
Hardy, Peter
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Howarth, George (Knowsley N)
Howells, Dr. Kim (Pontypridd)
Hoyle, Doug
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark)
Ilsley, Eric
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S W)
Kilfedder, James
Kirkwood, Archy
Lambie, David
Leadbitter, Ted
Leighton, Ron
Lewis, Terry
Litherland, Robert
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Lofthouse, Geoffrey
McKay, Allen (Barnsley West)
McKelvey, William
Mahon, Mrs Alice
Marshall, Jim (Leicester S)
Martlew, Eric
Meacher, Michael
Meale, Alan
Michael, Alun
Michie, Bill (Sheffield Heeley)
Morgan, Rhodri
Morley, Elliot
Morris, Rt Hon J. (Aberavon)
Mowlam, Marjorie
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Paul
Nellist, Dave
O'Brien, William
Pike, Peter L.
Prescott, John
Primarolo, Dawn
Quin, Ms Joyce
Redmond, Martin
Richardson, Jo
Rooker, Jeff
Rooney, Terence
Rowlands, Ted
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Short, Clare
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, J. P. (Vale of Glam)
Soley, Clive
Strang, Gavin
Taylor, Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Thompson, Jack (Wansbeck)
Turner, Dennis
Vaz, Keith
Wallace, James
Wardell, Gareth (Gower)
Wareing, Robert N.
Watson, Mike (Glasgow, C)
Welsh, Michael (Doncaster N)
Williams, Rt Hon Alan
Williams, Alan W. (Carm'then)
Winnick, David
Wise, Mrs Audrey
Worthington, Tony

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Frank Haynes and
Mr. John Battle.

Question accordingly agreed to.

Bill read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Committee of the whole House.—[Mr. Sackville.]

STATUTORY SICK PAY BILL [Money]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Statutory Sick Pay Bill it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of any administrative expenses incurred in consequence of the Act by a Minister of the Crown.—[Mr. Sackville.]

Civil Jurisdiction and Ju

10.15 pm

The Solicitor-General (Sir Nicholas move,

That the draft Civil Jurisdiction and Ju (Amendment) Order 1990, which was laid on 7th November, be approved.

The purpose of this Order in Counci
United Kingdom to ratify the conventio and Portugal acceded to the 1968 Bruss jurisdiction and the enforcement of judg commercial matters as well as to the 19

The Brussels convention establishe determine the international jurisdiction c member states, to facilitate recognition an expeditious procedure for securing th judgments within the Community. Th confers jurisdiction on the Court o
Community to interpret the convention

On becoming a member of the Com undertakes to accede to the Brussels co protocol. The United Kingdom, Denm acceded by a convention signed on 9 Oct
Brussels convention is now in force in ea
Greece acceded by a convention signe
1982. That convention was ratified
Kingdom last year and came into force o
The convention on the accession of Sp
the two final states, was signed on 26 M

Section 14 of the Civil Jurisdiction a 1982 provides that Her Majesty may by make such modifications of the Act appropriate in consequence of any revis convention or the protocol. The greater order consists of schedules replacing tho 1982 Act.

I shall now deal with changes convention. There are two elements to th to the 1968 convention by this accession there are those changes which are di upon Spanish and Portuguese accessio convention and, secondly, there are substance. The former are reflected in a text of the 1982 Act, and include revise conventions and of contracting states.

Article 8 amends section 3 of th consideration by United Kingdom cou the meaning or effect of any provisio convention or the accession convention the report on the Spanish and Por convention drawn up by three emin
Martinho de Almeida Cruz from Port Desantes Real from Spain and the ho administration at the Belgian Ministry Monsieur Paul Jenard, to whom all ho expect me to pay special tribute, and immeasurable contribution to this work years. Section 3 already permits corresponding reports on the Brussels the earlier accession conventions.

There are just a few changes of sub of the Brussels convention. The Civi Judgments Bill was introduced in an November. The object of that Bill is to

Kingdom to ratify the Lugano convention on jurisdiction and the enforcement of judgments. That convention was drawn up between the member states of the European Community and the member states of the European Free Trade Association, and creates a régime between the states of those two organisations parallel to that of the Brussels convention. Although the provisions of the Lugano convention follow, so far as is appropriate, those of the Brussels convention, the opportunity was taken to incorporate some changes deemed to be necessary in the light of 20 years' experience of the practical operation of the Brussels regime.

Given the parallel nature of these two conventions, it was considered desirable by the working party negotiating the Spanish and Portuguese accession convention to take that opportunity to reflect—if I might call them this—the Lugano improvements back into the 1968 Brussels convention.

Most of these changes are minor, and I shall highlight only three of the more significant. They affect, in matters of detail, the rules on jurisdiction in title II of the 1968 convention. The relevant articles are articles 5, 6 and 16 relating respectively to contracts of employment, matters relating to a contract where the action may be combined with an action relating to rights in rem, and proceedings having as their object tenancies of property for temporary private use.

Thus, in article 5, instead of treating employment contracts in the same manner as all other contracts, it has been decided to introduce an additional element of protection for the employee. Article 6 of the Brussels convention sets out various situations in which a person domiciled in a contracting state may be sued. The Lugano convention added an additional category, and this is now imported into the 1968 convention.

Thus, the revised article permits a person domiciled in a contracting state also to be sued in matters relating to the contract, if the action may be combined with an action against the same defendant in matters relating to rights in property in the court of the contracting state in which that property is situated.

The decision of the Court of Justice in Rösler v. Rottwinkel in 1985 had thrown up a problem in connection with short lets. The court had found itself obliged to interpret article 16(1) literally as meaning that the courts for the place where the property was situated should have exclusive jurisdiction over all actions relating to the property, even in a dispute over rent on a short-term holiday letting in Italy where lessor and tenant were both domiciled in Germany.

The amended form of article 16 will allow jurisdiction to be asserted either by courts of the contracting state in which the property is situated or, in proceedings which have as their object tenancies of property for private use of up to six months, in the courts of the contracting state in which the defendant is domiciled, so long as both the landlord and the tenant are natural persons and are domiciled in the same state. Accordingly, a dispute between an English landlord and tenant over a holiday letting in the Dordogne may now sensibly be heard in the English courts.

These and other changes represent useful improvements, and are to be welcomed. I commend the order to the House as a useful step in the creation of a system of judicial co-operation not only within the Community, but throughout western Europe.

10.22 pm

Mr. John Fraser (Norwood): This may not particularly interesting order, but it is a remarkab to the civilised way in which Europe now deals w matters. Fifty years ago, it would have been impo contemplate a common code of jurisdicti enforcement of judgments throughout western referring specifically to the internal jurisdiction country. These are lawyers' matters, but we shoul the order pass without paying tribute to those w contributed to the convention, because it is a s civilised society that such matters can be dealt wi same basis throughout western Europe.

I have two questions. The first is about access Lugano arrangements are in force when one accedes to them. Is it intended that the whol European Community should accede as of on Brussels convention, rather than acceding na nation? Secondly, to what extent are these arrange be extended to countries that are neither in the E Free Trade Association nor the European Con but are full associates of the Community? One ex Turkey, and clearly, if possible, the same arran should apply to such countries.

10.23 pm

The Solicitor-General: With the leave of the shall reply. It is not intended that we should wait member states are in a position to accede. They ca one by one, and it is hoped to make progress soo extension would require further international agr and does not follow from the Brussels and conventions in themselves. One very much hopes sort of international agreement, so rightly comme the hon. Member for Norwood (Mr. Fraser), extended further in due course throughout the world.

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That the draft Civil Jurisdiction and Judgments (Amendment) Order 1990, which was laid before th on 7th November, be approved.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Audit Practice

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pur Standing Order No. 101(5) (Standing Comm Statutory Instruments, &c.).

That the draft Code of Audit Practice for Engl Wales, which was laid before this House on 15th Oc the last Session of Parliament, be approved Sackville.]

Question agreed to.

International Monetary Fund

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pur Standing Order No. 101(5) (Standing Comm Statutory Instruments, &c.).

That the draft International Monetary Fund (In Subscription) Order 1990, which was laid before th on 15th October, in the last Session of Parlian approved.—[Mr. Sackville.]

Question agreed to.

Criminal Justice (Northern Ireland)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(5) (Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.).

That the draft Criminal Justice (Confiscation) (Northern Ireland) Order 1990, which was laid before this House on 15th October, in the last Session of Parliament, be approved.—[Mr. Sackville.]

Question agreed to.

Asylum Seekers

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Sackville.]

10.25 pm

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I am pleased that I have been able to secure an Adjournment debate on the treatment of asylum seekers when they arrive in the United Kingdom. This extremely important matter is not necessarily overwhelmingly popular and does not always grasp front-page headlines daily. The principles involved must be addressed, partly because Britain has not been invaded over the past 1,000 years and partly because few people from this country have ever sought political asylum abroad—as far as I am aware, not since the days of religious persecution hundreds of years ago. However, there is a popular understanding of the need for people to be able to seek political asylum when their survival is in danger. The most recent examples relate to the horrors faced by the Jewish people who fled from the Nazi regime in Germany in the 1930s and sought asylum. Some succeeded in getting asylum in this country, but tragically many found that the doors of the rest of the world were barred in their search for safety.

I have introduced the debate at this time because of a series of extremely disturbing reports in the press at the end of October and at the beginning of this month that the United Kingdom Government were undertaking a review of their procedures to deal with asylum seekers. I read those reports with some disquiet. Since I have become a Member, I have spent a lot of time dealing with the problems of asylum seekers from many countries, including Iran, Iraq, Chile, Colombia and a number of Asian countries, particularly Sri Lanka and China. Many of the people involved went through horrific experiences to get to safety.

The 1951 Geneva convention, which is the major article of faith dealing with asylum seekers, was signed after the war to cover the large numbers who sought political asylum from Nazi Germany before the war and immediately after it because of all the disruptions throughout Europe. The convention states that people seeking political asylum must have a well-founded fear of being persecuted. Obviously, that is open to wide definition. It does not have to mean that people were politically active before a hostile regime took over. It could mean that they were in danger of being persecuted by association. Many of the people with whom I have dealt and who came from Chile after the fascist regime took over in 1973 were politically active in socialist, communist or other parties and were in danger of persecution if they returned to Chile, as were their relatives and friends. The same applies to Kurdish people from several countries. The definition must be drawn fairly widely.

The British Government have claimed that many people seek political asylum in Britain. According to a parliamentary answer by the Home Office at columns 452-53 of Hansard of 30 October, 27,170 people are seeking political asylum. Of the European countries, the largest number comes from Turkey, with 1,690; of the African countries, the largest number come from Somalia, with 2,990; and of the Asian countries, the largest number come from Sri Lanka, with 4,950.

Those people have come to this country because they believe themselves to be in some danger. It is important that someone who arrives in this country seeking political asylum should be sure, first, that his application will be properly received at the port of entry; secondly, that he will be interviewed in his own language; and, thirdly, that he will not be removed from this country until the application has been properly assessed and a decision taken.

There have been criticisms of the Government's system for many years. When I first came to the House, the Government used to use, as a defence for the lack of an appeals system against refusals of political asylum, the fact that Members of Parliament could raise cases directly with the Home Office Minister. That right was taken from us when the immigration rules were changed. Now, Members of Parliament have to have new and compelling evidence.

In 1987, an especially disgraceful piece of legislation passed through the House—the Immigration (Carriers' Liability) Act. Under that Act, a carrier—an airline or a shipping company—can be fined if it brings here someone from a visa country who is not subsequently admitted. The number of visa countries has increased dramatically during the past few years. Sri Lanka, India, Pakistan, Bangladesh, Nigeria and Ghana were added as, later, were the Maghreb countries. The citizens of many countries now require visas for entry to this country. Of course, a visa does not guarantee admission. If a person is not admitted, the carrier not only has to take him back, but has to pay a fine of £1,000. More than £18 million has been collected in fines since the Act came into operation.

I find the operation of the Act disturbing. It is a charter for those who wish to exploit the horror of people seeking asylum. I know of cases of Kurdish people fleeing from Turkey and seeking asylum in this country who have paid £1,500 for a one-way air ticket when the normal one-way fare is less than £100. That means that the airline can cover its costs if it is fined.

The Amnesty International report cites examples of people not being allowed off an aircraft to make applications for political asylum and then being removed from this country. Amnesty International presented to the Government 33 recommendations for changes in the treatment of asylum applications. It is concerned that people have been wrongly expelled, and gives a figure of 100. It is interesting that in his reply to that, the Home Office Minister admitted that a number of Kurdish asylum seekers from Turkey had been wrongly deported in 1989 and that Sri Lankan Tamils had been deported.

There are a number of recommendations in the report, but the most important is the right of appeal for an asylum seeker. Under the current arrangements, someone arrives in this country having fled the horrors of a civil war and persecution—for example, the civil wars in Somalia and Ethiopia. It is a major and traumatic move to seek asylum abroad. None of us would ever want to have to do it, but it is happening to many people. Their application is processed, but there is no right of appeal other than seeking a judicial review under the rules of natural justice. That is a major error in our procedure. Other countries have an appeals system, and we should also have one.

I am concerned that the current Home Office review on asylum seeking is designed not to improve the system in line with the spirit of the 1951 Geneva convention, but to make the position worse. I noted that in his letter to The Guardian, and in his speech at the time of the Amnesty International report, the Minister kept saying that there was a link between economic migrants and people seeking political asylum. It is a little unwise of the Minister to take such a broad-brush approach to the serious problem of people seeking asylum. Cases must be dealt with individually, with great care and in great detail.

Often, people seeking political asylum are from areas of great conflict in which the British Government themselves are not exactly uninvolved. The continuous supply of arms to the Gulf and to Sri Lanka fuelled the problems in those places, and in many others. We look to the British Government not to tighten up on political asylum but to understand its causes, and for some co-ordination of departmental responses, which are currently totally insufficient.

There is no proper appeals system, and there should be. The refugee arrivals project does its best, but it is understaffed and has great difficulty providing an adequate service. Time and time again, I and other hon. Members have had to intervene to ensure that a case is properly dealt with and heard.

I ask the Government to consider a number of other factors. When people seeking political asylum are admitted to this country and leave the airport, or are finally granted right of asylum or exceptional leave to remain here, they need a roof over their head and their children require education. Kurdish asylum seekers arrived here is considerable numbers from Turkey in 1989, because of the persecution that they were suffering, and others were the victims of gas attacks in Iraq, when Saddam Hussein decided to use that form of warfare against the Kurds in northern Iraq. They all arrived here with absolutely nothing, and needed support and help.

Local authorities are obliged by law, rightly, to house those people whom they consider to be vulnerable. It is expensive to do that, and central Government resources should be made available to assist local authorities in meeting their responsibilities. Government money has been made available in small measure in respect of Kurdish asylum seekers, but under the Bellwin top-up scheme, insufficient resources are available because the local authority must make the initial input.

There are also a disturbing number of cases of unaccompanied children arriving in this country, mainly from East Africa—Eritrea and Somalia. Those children come here because their parents have gone missing or have been killed in the civil war, and clearly they are very disturbed. In the name of humanity, those poor children should be given the best possible help and support after the horror that they have been through.

We find instead that some borough councils refuse to deal with those cases under the Children Act 1989, and the children are passed from one place to another in a disturbing and awful way. The Churches and voluntary organisation have done a great deal of work, but responsibility for providing the necessary assistance remains with central Government. It is very expensive to keep children in care. It is not the ideal way of looking after them, but they should receive that immediate initial support.

Mr. Keith Vaz (Leicester, East): The House is indebted to my hon. Friend for raising this matter, but does he agree that it is only one of the issues affecting the immigration and nationality department under the present Government? Did he read the report published last week, which showed that Lunar house is dealing with naturalisation cases at the rate of only 28 a month? If that trend continues, it will clear the backlog only by the end of the next century. Does my hon. Friend agree that there should not only be an inquiry into the way in which Lunar house is currently operating, but a full debate in Government time on that very important issue?

[Mr. Keith Vaz]

Mr. Corbyn: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for raising that matter because it is important.

I have been trying to describe the problems of those who seek political asylum, the emotional trauma and disturbance that leads up to their search for asylum, and the problems when they arrive. We are not dealing with a group of people who are not highly motivated—quite the contrary. Often people who seek political asylum are extremely highly motivated, and they find it distressing that, having arrived here and made an application for political asylum, it takes a long time to determine the outcome.

Usually the terms of temporary admission or exceptional leave to remain in this country preclude those people from following any gainful employment, and often any form of education. They are in a different limbo land. Understandably they are very upset about it. The last thing that they want is to be a burden upon the rest of the community. They want to make the most positive contribution. Therefore, the speed of the decision is extremely important. My hon. Friend the Member for Leicester, East (Mr. Vaz) is quite right to draw attention to that fact. I understand that he has been to Lunar house, and has examined the piles of mail sacks that are waiting to be opened there.

There is a social security element to the problem. For some reason that no Minister has ever been able to explain to me or convince me of, people seeking political asylum are eligible for only 90 per cent. of income support. That is blatantly discriminatory. If someone is entitled to income support, he should get 100 per cent. and not 90 per cent. Likewise, the social fund should operate evenly, whether for people seeking asylum or for those who are entitled to access to it under the normal procedure. People seeking political asylum are increasingly being forced to fall back upon those from their own country who have already gained residence or asylum here. That is not a sensible or fair way to carry on.

There is also a European dimension to the problem, because in 1992 the relationship between Britain and the Common Market countries will change. Various groups —the Trevi group, of which Britain is a member, and the Schengen group, are meeting in secret and, as I understand it, are not reporting to anybody. They are coming to all sorts of conclusions and decisions about asylum seekers and about the attitude and policy that will be taken throughout Europe. I understand that, from 1992 onwards, far from a social Europe that is concerned with people seeking political asylum from tensions, dramas and wars, there will be a fortress Europe approach with insufficient recognition and support being given to such people.

I raised this subject because it is very serious. People in this country often find it hard to understand trauma suffered by those fleeing from civil commotion and disturbance. I spend a lot of time talking to those who have sought political asylum. To understand, one must try to put oneself in the place of someone who is living a normal life—reaching middle age, with both children in school and both partners have a reasonable job. Suddenly, everything goes. The Government change. Those people become the focus of persecution, and have to leave the country that they have lived in all their lives. They have to seek a new life abroad. It is a frightening experience for them. Many of them do not wish to do it.

First, it is important that we recognise the causes of inhuman government and regimes, which allow persecution of people for their religious beliefs, social customs, languages or political views. Secondly, we must recognise that, as signatories of the 1951 Geneva convention, we have a very important role to play.

I hope that in the Government's review of that policy, they will not narrow the focus and curtail the rights of asylum seekers. I hope that instead they will recognise that there is a need for the right of appeal against the refusal of political asylum, and that there is a need for co-ordination among Government Departments, so that housing, education and children's needs are considered and so that we have a civilised policy for the future, rather than the extremely mean policy at the moment, which seeks to put the blame on the asylum seeker, rather than on the regime that has forced those poor people to seek ayslum in the first place.

10.43 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Peter Lloyd): The hon. Member for Islington, North (Mr. Corbyn) spoke with considerable feeling. No one who knows him doubts his commitment to the cause of refugees. I certainly do not. The difference between us lies in our analysis of the present problems and the nature of some, although not all, of the solutions required.

The United Kingdom has international humanitarian obligations, which have been recognised by all Governments since the war, both Labour and Conservative—not least our obligations under the 1951 United Nations convention. We take them very seriously and alas, there are many people who have only too genuine a reason to fear persecution. However, many people who do not hold such fears claim asylum in the United Kingdom, so it is necessary to distinguish between them.

This year, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Overseas Development will devote £60 million to international humanitarian aid, most of which will be of direct benefit to refugees. She will provide £20 million for the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees—the highest ever United Kingdom contribution and one of the three or four highest of all nations. She will devote a further £40 million in other direct forms of aid, including £2·5 million channelled through British voluntary organisations abroad for grass roots projects helping refugees in Africa; £5 million to the United Nations refugee relief agency; and £5 million to the Red Cross. We shall provide nearly £500,000 for immediate reception arrangements for asylum seekers on the first day or two after they arrive here. The purpose of those funds is not only to provide immediate relief where that is needed, but to address the long-term root causes that create migratory pressures.

The Government's record on the treatment of asylum seekers has been generous. Of 55,000 people who claimed asylum in the United Kingdom between 1979 and 1989, the Government permitted 87 per cent. to stay here. In the same period, we also accepted 21,000 Indo-Chinese refugees.

The hon. Member for Islington, North signally failed to address the dramatic change in the nature of asylum seeking in the past few years that has taken place throughout the western world. Since 1983, when 70,000 applied for asylum in Europe, the number of asylum claimants in Europe has doubled every three years and this year will reach 500,000. In the United Kingdom, the rise has been even more dramatic: the numbers have risen fivefold in two years, from 5,000 a year to 25,000 this year. That is the cause of the present problems and surely all those who comment on those matters should attempt at least to analyse what is happening, and why, before offering solutions.

Migratory pressures have increased for a variety of reasons in recent years, not least because of the cheapness and ease of international air travel. Unsurprisingly, those pressures have searched out the weak points in immigration control, particularly that the lengthy and painstaking procedures for dealing with asylum seekers provide a fairly certain route through the barriers. The result is that as the number of asylum seekers in Europe has risen, the proportion found to be genuinely fleeing persecution has dropped. Last year, it was estimated that 70 per cent. of those seeking asylum in Europe and north America were not refugees within the sense of the United Nations convention, nor had a claim to other humanitarian status. That is not a matter of the Government erecting a higher threshold: the trend has been the same in all countries, even those where there is a right of appeal to an independent body.

As the determination of asylum claims is so lengthy and time-consuming and most people are able to stay on, it is bound to attract some abuse. How else does one explain why the number of asylum seekers from the new democracies of eastern Europe has not diminished or shrunk, but doubled this year? If the hon. Member for Islington, North can explain that in terms of increased persecution, I should be glad to hear it.

Mr. Corbyn: I cannot explain why the number of asylum seekers has increased, but does the Minister accept that sometimes the problem has been that asylum was granted by an old regime but withdrawn by the new regime? For example, the German Democratic Republic, which no longer exists, granted residence to people from third countries—not asylum, but a sort of laissez passer —which has been withdrawn by the united Germany.

Mr. Lloyd: That may be so, but that does not answer the question why the number of asylum seekers from eastern European countries that have become more respectful of human rights in recent years has increased. It is an unpalatable fact, to which the hon. Gentleman referred, that there is an organised international business; middlemen charge high prices for forged papers and brief applicants on how to submit their claims. Over 60 per cent. of applicants arrive on forged papers, or without papers, having passed them back to middlemen on the aircraft, or having destroyed them.

The simple fact is that asylum seeking has become the main source of primary immigration in Europe during the last two or three years and will account for nearly 500,000 new immigrants this year. Last year, it was some 435,000.

We have, quite rightly, an obligation to give entry to anyone who claims asylum until his or her claim has been established, and it is no surprise that there are consequential problems. We are acutely aware of the increased pressure. The hon. Gentleman mentioned the increased pressure on London local authorities in particular. He will also recognise the increased pressure on the refugee section of the Home Office's immigration and nationality department. He calls for two conflicting steps to be taken at a time of increased pressure: that each case should be looked at thoroughly and individually and that the examination of each case should be speeded up. We are determined to maintain our obligation to look at each case thoroughly and individually, but when the numbers increase fivefold, it is not surprising that the queues lengthen.

We are acutely aware of the increased pressure on the statutory services and voluntary organisations and understand the calls for more resources, particularly in London. We are already providing extra funds to enable the refugee arrivals project and the Refugee Council to give immediate help to asylum seekers who need it until the statutory services take over. I am grateful for the work that they are doing.

We have also agreed to consider whether provision could be made for a short-stay reception centre. Last year, the Department of the Environment made special arrangements for those authorities which received the influx of asylum seekers from Turkey, and last week the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment, my hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key) met representatives of the Association of London Authorities about these questions. He awaits further information from them.

The hon. Member for Islington, North also attended that meeting, at which the ALA put forward a plan to buy 1,250 homes for asylum seekers at a capital cost of £100 million. It argued that that was preferable to the £56 million a year that it now spends on bed-and-breakfast accommodation. I see the logic of that argument.

I make no comment on the proposals, which will be examined by my ministerial colleagues in the Department of the Environment, except to draw one comparison. The cost of £100 million, which the ALA proposes for buying 1,250 homes, is rather more than a quarter of the entire budget of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees to help the plight of the 14 to 15 million refugees and displaced persons worldwide. The contrast illustrates the strong belief of the Government, which is precisely in line with that of the UNHCR, that the solution to refugee problems cannot lie in encouraging refugees and asylum seekers to come to the west. It is estimated that $5 billion is now being spent on supporting asylum seekers in the west, the majority of whom are not fleeing persecution.

I see that my time is drawing rapidly to a close. The hon. Gentleman raised a number of points, to which I should like to respond. The best course to take is to write to him. I shall also put the answer that the Home Secretary sent to Amnesty International in reply to the 33 important recommendations that it made, but which we feel are somewhat offbeam, or misunderstand the position, or are part of our policy anyway, in the Library, so that both the hon. Gentleman and other hon. Members can read it.

To return to the point about the imbalance between what is spent on processing asylum seekers who have the resources to arrive in the west and the many millions of displaced people in the rest of the world, I do not believe that that imbalance can make sense as a global strategy for tackling refugee problems. To encourage asiyum seekers to come to the west diverts funding and good will and means that those fleeing persecution find themselves at the ba of the queue for determination of their claims for housi and other support. It can only be to the disadvantage real refugees that we should allow the present misuse asylum seeking to continue.

[Mr. Lloyd]

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at five minutes to Eleven o'clo

House of Commons

Tuesday 27 November 1990

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PRIVATE BUSINESS

LONDON DOCKLANDS RAILWAY BILL
Read the Third time, and passed.

MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BILL [Lords]

NORTH YORKSHIRE COUNTY COUNCIL BILL [Lords]
Read a Second time, and committed.

Oral Answers to Questions

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Education Expenditure

1. Mr. Hague: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what has been the increase in absolute spending on education, in total and per pupil, since 1979.

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): Direct spending on nursery, primary and secondary schools in England rose from some £4·2 billion in 1979-80 to some £9·2 billion in the latest outturn year, 1988-89. This represents an increase in spending per pupil from some £515 in 1979-80 to £1,360 in 1988-89. That is a real-terms increase over and above inflation of more than 40 per cent.

Mr. Hague: Does my right hon. and learned Friend agree that the figures given in his answer, even when adjusted for inflation, help to explain why most schools are far better equipped for a modern education than they were 10 years ago and have a much better pupil-teacher relationship than they had 10 years ago? Does he also agree that high-quality education does not depend solely on a massive increase in resources, as some Opposition Members sometimes seem to believe?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I agree with him. The figures that I gave refer to the latest outturn year. The settlement for next year takes standard spending assessments up by 16 per cent., which is a further 10 per cent. ahead of inflation. I strongly agreee with my hon. Friend that with this growth of resources must come ever-better targeting and ever-better measurement of the standards being achieved in our schools through the use of those resources.

Mr. Grocott: The Government's policy of expenditure on city technology colleges means that they are treating pupils unfairly. How can the Secretary of State possibly justify spending £8·5 million of taxpayers' money on one school—the city technology college in Telford—when less than £8 million is being spent on all the other schools in the county? Is not it time the right hon. and learned Gentleman listened to the overwhelming representations that he has had from all sections of the community and scrapped this unfair concept?

Mr. Clarke: I think that the hon. Gentleman's perception is mistaken. The money spent on city technology colleges is not spent at the expense of other schools—it is money which would not otherwise have been spent on education. It is a policy of envy to say that Telford should not have a city technology college unless all pupils can go to it. The CTC is an attractive addition to education facilities in Telford and as the Member representing that town the hon. Gentleman should support it.

Mr. Hunter: I welcome and applaud the increase in absolute spending. Will my right hon. and learned Friend take note that in Hampshire too much money is being held back by the education authority? Will he intensify his approaches to Hampshire education authority to ensure that money is passed on to the schools?

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. We are looking at that very important point and will shortly issue a circular indicating the minimum amount of the total available that should be distributed to schools and the minimum amount within that total which should be based on the number of pupils in each school. That should bring each county and each education authority into line with best practice, which is exactly what my hon. Friend would wish.

Qualifications

2. Mr. Turner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what proposals he has to reform qualifications for 16 to 19-year-olds; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mr. Tim Eggar): We are considering proposals for the reform both of academic and of vocational qualifications for 16 to 19-year-olds.

Mr. Turner: I thank the Minister for that answer. I think that he will agree that education provision for 16 to 19-year-olds is rather a shambles. The Minister's answer does not reflect the views about A-levels expressed by his party in the last three to four weeks. When do the Government intend to put forward firm proposals for reforming A-levels and bringing this country into the 1990s?

Mr. Eggar: I am surprised at the hon. Gentleman. He should know perfectly well that we are awaiting proposals from the School Examinations and Assessment Council. Having considered the council's views, we shall then take into account the views of other organisations. I am also surprised at the hon. Gentleman because I should have thought that he would concentrate on the 70 per cent. of 16 to 19-year-olds for whom A-levels are not important, and especially on the need for the reform of vocational qualifications and the need to raise the esteem in which they are held compared with A-levels.

Mr. Michael Morris: As my hon. Friend knows, more than 25 per cent. of A-level pupils come from Headmasters Conference and Headmistresses Conference schools. Will he ensure that there is full consultation with such schools before any decisions are made about a replacement for A-levels?

Mr. Eggar: Yes, the HMC has made known its views on the SEAC principles document. My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State has already met it to discuss its views.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: Given what the Minister has said about the need to raise the standing of vocational qualifications, with which I agree, does he accept that the best way to do that would be to bring together vocational and academic qualifications in one broader modular system so that the subjects that pupils choose have equal standing and pupils can study a mixture of the two?

Mr. Eggar: If the hon. Gentleman is saying that there is a case for some form of credit transfer between vocational and academic qualifications, we shall certainly consider that. It will be important to ensure that appropriate standards are maintained for both academic and vocational streams.

Local Management of Schools

3. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what measures he is considering to encourage local authorities to delegate more control of money to schools.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Michael Fallon): My right hon. and learned Friend and I intend to ensure that as much as is reasonably possible of the schools budget of local authorities should be delegated to schools to manage themselves. We shall be publishing a draft circular next month, which will consult on proposals to that end.

Mr. Coombs: In illustrating the benefits of local management of schools, is my hon. Friend aware that the school of which I am chairman of governors is two teachers better off and plans next year to raise its resources by 50 per cent. as a result of LMS? Given that the proportion of non-teaching staff to total teaching staff is 35 per cent. in some authorities, such as my own, while in some Labour-controlled authorities, such as Coventry, the proportion is as high as 53 per cent., what action is my hon. Friend planning to take to ensure that resources are spent where they should be spent—in the classroom?

Mr. Fallon: Councils are holding back between 17 and 29 per cent. of their schools budget, or between £65,000 and £228,000 per school. Those variations are huge and unacceptable. We shall be proposing a tougher limit to get more money through to the schools.

Mr. Vaz: Does the Minister accept that in certain local authorities, such as Leicestershire, there is insufficient money in the proposed budget to pay for items such as outstanding repairs? Will he give the House the assurance that where there is a strong case for repairs to be carried out before delegation, the Government will come up with the necessary resources before the budgets are delegated?

Mr. Fallon: Councils have substantial resource they are holding back at the centre. In many cases, spending on unnecessary bureaucracy and on administration resources which have been siphe from the schools and could have been spent year repairs and maintenance.

Mr. Pawsey: Does my hon. Friend agree that method of delegating greater financial control fr education authorities to schools would be to local education authorities to go down the maintained schools route because that would ens schools have a better opportunity of decid themselves exactly where their money should be

Mr. Fallon: Yes, a grant-maintained school about 95 per cent. of its schools budget direct, whi then allocate according to its own priorities. Wh councils continue to hold back so much money, a grant-maintained status means a vote for subs more resources.

Ms. Armstrong: Will the Minister confirm th local authority budget was individually approve Department and that what he is actually doing is those local authorities that have substantial resp ties for spending on school transport and school m have held special needs provision centrally?

Mr. Fallon: All the schemes were approved in by my Department, but it was only this autumn saw the precise figures for each of the individu within the budgets. The problem applies metropolitan authorities. For example, New holding back £199,000 per school, and the controlled metropolitan authority of Leeds is hold more than £100,000. Unlike the Opposition, we ca those differences and we intend to do somethi them.

Mr. Franks: My hon. Friend is aware of the record of Cumbria local education authority delegation of funds. Will he make the representations to that authority? Is he awar welcome our right hon. and learned Friend the of State's statement earlier that he intends minimum level of delegation?

Mr. Fallon: Sadly, I have to tell my hon. Fri Cumbria is by far the worst performer in the co that respect, holding back some 28 per cent. of th allocated, which therefore does not get throug schools. We shall certainly ensure that the toug that we propose will apply to Cumbria so that mo goes to the classrooms.

Distance Learning

5. Mr. Wallace: To ask the Secretary of Education and Science whether he has any further to promote distance learning in rural ar

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of S Education and Science (Mr. Alan Howart Government recognise that distance learning me an efficient and effective means of expanding the opportunities available to students living in ru

The Government support the Open university, and are also providing special support for the further development of open and distance learning by local authorities.

Mr. Wallace: I welcome the Minister's positive reply. Is he aware of the whiteboard techniques adopted in Orkney in my constituency, which allow teaching from central point to be disseminated to a number of points? Does he agree that that offers opportunities to keep open schools that might otherwise be closed as well as opportunities for adult education and training? Will the Department carry out a study of what is happening in Orkney and its possible application to other rural and dispersed parts of the country?

Mr. Howarth: I understand that not only the hon. Gentleman, but his right hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown), recently had the benefit of an electronic whiteboard tutorial in Orkney. I share the hon. Gentleman's view that that technology may well open up useful possibilities for students in remote areas, which could be of great benefit. The Training Agency has sponsored two pilot projects in the highlands and islands, and I look forward with interest to its evaluation of them.

Dr. Thomas: The Minister has already mentioned the Open university. Can he confirm that the Government intend to maintain and, indeed, enhance its level of funding relative to the rest of higher education so that it can maintain its initiative in distance learning throughout the United Kingdom?

Mr. Howarth: The capital and recurrent grants for the Open university total £79·5 million in the current year, and its block recurrent grant will rise by 8·3 per cent. in 1991. That is clear evidence of the Department's firm support for the Open university. As the hon. Gentleman knows, a review is taking place, and the Open university is playing its full part in that. The review is continuing, and conclusions will be reached in due course. Our expectation is that the Open university will find ways to develop its mission, rather than to curtail it.

Mr. Andrew Smith: Does the Minister accept that increasing fees for courses are a deterrent for many people who would like to take the opportunity of studying with the Open university? What is the Government's specific policy on the future level of fees and on support for part-time and distance learning students? Does the Minister accept that they need better support, and what does he intend to do about it?

Mr. Howarth: From the impressive history of the Open university in recent years, it is clear that a large number of people want to study with it and that they have not been deterred by the fees regime. The review is under way, and the issues that the hon. Gentleman raised form part of it.

School Administration (Lancashire)

6. Mr. Hind: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he has any plans to meet the chief education officer of Lancashire county council to discuss the contraction of central administration and transfer of resources to schools for local management; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Fallon: My right hon. and learned Friend has no plans at present to meet the chief education officer of Lancashire county council. However, we have made clear our general view that local education authorities should streamline their central administration so that more resources can get down to schools.

Mr. Hind: Is my hon. Friend aware that the county council is holding back £130 million—one third of its revenue budget—for a number of items, particularly central administration? Will he join me in urging the county to spread down much of its central administration costs to schools administered by local management, where funds are much needed and would benefit the children in the classroom?

Mr. Fallon: Yes. Lancashire's central administration alone amounts to £11·5 million. In total, Lancashire holds back 23 per cent. of its school budget—an average of £110,000 per school. Lancashire county council has much to do in releasing funds to its schools.

Mr. Pike: Why does the Minister not meet the head teachers of Lancashire schools, when he would find out that their real complaint is not about the county council's actions but about those of the Government in not providing sufficient funds to make local management schools work, in encouraging bureaucracy, and in making it difficult for head teachers to remain educationists? Is it not time the Government did more to ensure that teachers can get on with their real job of teaching?

Mr. Fallon: The teachers, governors and parents whom I meet are increasingly angry at the amount of money allocated to their schools being siphoned off by county hall. We are determined to do something about that.

Mr. Favell: Should not central administration in Lancashire and in nearby Stockport be largely contracted out?

Mr. Fallon: We believe that the schools themselves should decide on the support services that they need and the scale on which those services should be provided. Only by delegating budgets to schools can those decisions rest in the hands of head teachers and governors.

City Technology Colleges

8. Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science when he next plans to visit the city technology college in Nottingham to discuss the funding of city technology colleges

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I hope to arrange a visit to the city technology college in Nottingham early in the new year, as soon as my diary commitments permit.

Mr. Allen: Is the Secretary of State aware that the amount of money spent on one city technology college in Nottingham is greater than the amount needed to repair all the other schools in Nottingham? Had that money been reallocated, it could have met the cost of building eight new schools in the Nottinghamshire area. As it is the right hon. and learned Gentleman's own education authority, will he do something about that problem and end the ridiculous and elitist CTC system?

Mr. Clarke: That money has provided an extremely well-equipped, brand new school in a depressed part of Nottingham inner city. The college is popular with parents and with those who teach there and it makes a valuable addition to the city's education facilities. The money for it was not provided at the expense of other Nottinghamshire schools and the whole project will bring in £2 million of private sector investment in education which would not otherwise have been available to pupils in that city. Given the range of issues confronting Nottinghamshire's education authority, it is absurd for the hon. Gentleman to raise only the question of trying to close down or get rid of one of the city's finest new features.

Mr. Andy Stewart: Is my right hon. and learned Friend aware that before Nottingham city technology college was opened, the county council was asked whether there was scope for any closures and replied that there was not, yet immediately the college was opened the authority announced the closure of three schools when it could have sold one to the CTC and received £3 million to spend on other education provision?

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) both know as well as I do that Nottinghamshire county council has a long history of such actions, refusing to sell derelict flats for rebuilding, to sell old people's homes to private companies which would refurbish them, or to make premises available for the city technology college, preferring to lose money, incur expenditure, and make cuts in services—cuts which would otherwise be unnecessary. The county council's attitude to the CTC has been churlish from the beginning and flies totally in the face of the opinions of very many people in Nottingham.

Mr. Straw: Is the Secretary of State aware that when commenting on the withdrawal of support for a proposed city technology college in the Prime Minister's borough of Barnet—[HON. MEMBERS: "Not in Nottingham".]—Sir Cyril Taylor, the chairman of the CTC trust, said:

"It is madness to go on spending money on the original type of college"—

the original concept of the CTC—[Interruption.]——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Let us get back to Nottingham.

Mr. Straw: When the Secretary of State goes to Nottingham—notwithstanding that the Minister described that as a misplaced leak, Sir Cyril Taylor has not denied the veracity of those words—will he agree that if it is madness as far as the chairman of the CTC trust is concerned, it ought to be madness as far as he is concerned?

Mr. Clarke: I am glad to say that nowadays the Labour party is totally outgunned in Nottingham and Nottinghamshire and the hon. Gentleman's intervention in our local controversies is not too welcome. We are on course for 15 city technology colleges, of which seven are already under way. If there is doubt about the future, it is caused in part by the Labour party's threat not to continue with the programme, a threat which has an obvious deterrent effect on sponsors. I invite the hon. Gentleman to come to Nottingham to visit the city technology college and to see for himself what a valuable addition it is to education facilities for children in Nottinghamshire.

LEA Capital Expenditure

9. Ms. Walley: To ask the Secretary of Education and Science when he expects to ann response to the bids from local education auth capital expenditure; and if he will make a state

Mr. Fallon: My right hon. and learned Frien to be able to announce the annual capital guid capital expenditure on education in 1991-92 education authorities shortly before the Christm

Ms. Walley: Does the announcement in Oct there would be extra money for education mean really will be extra money to spend on the buildings? Will the Minister give all parents th the country, and especially those in Stafford assurance that the quality of children's work will be affected by outside toilets, leaking roofs an homes which have long outlived their useful life

Mr. Fallon: The annual capital guidelines authority schools next year will be increased cent. above the guidelines for this year. A tota £472 million will be available. The criteria for ap under the guidelines are well known to local auth is up to the authorities to rank their projects in need.

Mr. Dunn: Does my hon. Friend agree that m authorities suffer from poor physical stock, larg the political motivations and actions of the O who starved local authorities that refuse comprehensive at the time of the last Labour Go Should not the Labour party take a large sha blame in the light of its responsibilities at that

Mr. Fallon: My hon. Friend, who knows a these matters, is certainly right in that respec capital guidelines have been increased substa next year over this year and it is open to local c top up the guidelines from receipts, from incor greater flexibility in the disposal of land.

Mr. Straw: Is the Secretary of State aware Majesty's inspectors reported that a third of chil learning in accommodation so substandard th badly affecting the quality of their education, th a £4 billion backlog of repairs has built up in t years and that it is a sign of the Gov complacency and neglect that in every yea Administration, including next year, less will b real terms on improving schools than in the last Labour Government?

Mr. Fallon: I am glad that the hon. Gentlema to do his homework for this question. The increa capital expenditure per pupil in maintained sc about 16 per cent. in real terms between 19 1988-89, and I have announced a substantial in next year.

A-level Examinations

10. Mr. Evennett: To ask the Secretary of Education and Science what recent representati received on the future of GCE A-level examin

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Some respondents to t Examinations and Assessment Council's co exercise on draft principles to govern A and AS examinations have copied their views to me. I have also received some views directly.

Mr. Evennett: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for his reply. We believe in high academic standards. Will he confirm that his aim is to maintain the high academic standard of the GCE A-level examinations that employers, universities and the professions require?

Mr. Clarke: I can certainly confirm that. Also, employers are looking to us to do something about those who ought to stay on after 16 but for whom A-levels are not suitable. The answer lies not in making A-levels easier for more people to pass, but in the arguments put by my hon. Friend the Minister of State. We must have other qualifications, including vocational qualifications, that are of high status and of a good standard and can exist as an alternative alongside A-levels.

Mr. Cousins: Will the Secretary of State ensure that the young men and women who are at present subjected to the narrow, stuffy and repetitive routines of A-level can feel the benefit of the much more open and lively courses that are going on, such as on the certificate of pre-vocational education? That has many young men and women in the west end of Newcastle in my constituency buzzing with commitment and enthusiasm. Will he please ensure that A-level students benefit from such activity?

Mr. Clarke: I share the hon. Gentleman's enthusiasm for the development of a better system of vocational qualifications. However, it is unnecessary to attack A-levels as he did because they are two separate things. People can take a mixture of both if they wish. It is getting hold of the wrong end of the stick to attack A-levels before going on to commend, sensibly, the development of better and more attractive vocational qualifications.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: In considering the future of A-levels, will my right hon. and learned Friend ensure that science subjects continue to be taught as individual subjects and examined individually? Does he agree that that is necessary if we are to continue the high academic standards in Britain?

Mr. Clarke: We have to ensure that science subjects can be taught separately to their present standards where the school and pupils want that and where it is suitable. If we are to have broader science teaching, it must be of the same quality as individual science subjects. Room must be kept in the curriculum and scope must be given to pupils to have separate science subjects if that is what they prefer.

Mr. Fatchett: At a time when university vice-chancellors, polytechnic directors, the Confederation of British Industry, all the teachers' organisations and the Government's Higginson report demand reform of A-levels, why do the Government still resist? Now that the Prime Minister has gone and the fear of her ideological commitment to A-levels is out of the way, why does not the Secretary of State announce that A-level reform is necessary and that we need an integrated modern system of post-16 education and training qualifications?

Mr. Clarke: I am all in favour of broadening the range of the curriculum and the education and training provided for people after the age of 16. The A-level part of that is not the problem. It serves its purpose extremely well for the moment in providing a route to our excellent three-year degree courses. The other part of the picture needs to be addressed first. It is no good putting attacks on A-levels at the top of the agenda when considering how best to improve opportunities for post-16 education.

School Buildings, Devon

11. Mr. Steen: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what capital allowances were made available to Devon county council in each of the last three years for replacing old school buildings with new ones.

Mr. Fallon: Devon received capital allocations of £8·434 million in 1988-89, £14·177 million in 1989-90 and an annual capital guideline of £12·984 million in 1990-91. It is up to Devon to decide how much to spend on replacing old school buildings out of all the capital resources available to it, of which the education annual capital guideline is only a part.

Mr. Steen: Does my hon. Friend the Minister agree that there is little point in funding half a dozen or so new buildings a year when 536 existing schools are not properly maintained under the Government's guidelines for the community charge? Would not it be better to allow Devon the discretion to decide whether to build half a dozen new buildings or to maintain some of the 536 buildings that are deteriorating rapidly?

Mr. Fallon: Devon has done relatively well, not just in the current year's allocation but in the allocation for the previous two years. The annual capital guideline for this year amounts to 45 per cent. of Devon's submitted plans, whereas the national average is only 35 per cent. It is for Devon to rank its priorities under our criteria and for my right hon. and learned Friend and me then to allocate the available sums. However, I shall reflect on my hon. Friend's point.

Mr. Allason: Will my hon. Friend bear in mind the large number of Victorian and other primary schools that were built in the last century in Devon? When the bids come in from Devon county council, will he bear in mind that very large number and give the bids his sympathetic consideration?

Mr. Fallon: My hon. Friend puts his case well at almost exactly the right time of year.

Nursery Education, Normanton

12. Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what assistance he intends to offer to help nursery education in the Normanton constituency; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: It is up to Leeds and Wakefield local education authorities to decide the resources that they wish to devote to nursery education within the hon. Gentleman's constituency.

Mr. O'Brien: Is the Minister aware of the effect of the standard spending assessment on nursery education in Wakefield, which forms part of my constituency? Is he further aware that the rate support grant cuts of the past 10 years, the dreaded poll tax and the lack of teacher training and of a proper wages structure are having an effect on nursery provision in the Normanton constituency? When will the Minister stand up for nursery education and give children in families who are suffering from stress, because of unemployment and high mortgage and interest rates, the chance of early entry to the education system?

Mr. Eggar: Now, Sir. Seventy per cent. of three and four-year-olds attend nursery education in the Wakefield local education authority area. Indeed, 150,000 more children throughout the country now receive nursery education, compared with 1979. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to listen, please, to Education questions in silence.

Education Vouchers

13. Mr. David Evans: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what consideration he is giving to the use of education vouchers as a means of extending choice to parents.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: We have no plans to introduce a voucher scheme for schools. We have already extended parental choice through our policies of ensuring that schools admit pupils up to the limit of the schools' physical capacity.

Mr. Evans: I thank my right hon. and learned Friend for his reply. I presume that he remains loyal to his beliefs when it comes to choice. Does he agree that had he remained loyal last Wednesday, Back Benchers would have had the freedom to choose the leader whom they wanted—the Prime Minister?

Mr. Speaker: Order. That has nothing to do with the question on the Order Paper.

Hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Clarke: First, the Prime Minister and I and my hon. Friend are all agreed that the purpose of education policy is to extend parental choice and then to make sure that taxpayers' money follows that choice into the schools. We have achieved that aim in the policy of education reform on which we have embarked. It makes the need to introduce vouchers—once considered—redundant. I certainly voted for the Prime Minister last Tuesday when a large number of my colleagues did not. I have absolutely no doubt that whoever succeeds the Prime Minister will adhere to the policy of improving choice in schools, putting better resources into our schools, following parental choice and raising education standards.

Mr. Nellist: Of what benefit would education vouchers be to parents who face teacher shortages, particularly in London? Did the Secretary of State see last night's television report or read in this lunchtime's Evening Standard that 1,600 teachers in London have left schools in the past two months, which has affected the education of tens of thousands of pupils? Is not it a fact that it is not education vouchers but poor pay and low morale that are the real reason why parents, pupils and teachers get a rotten deal from the Government?

Mr. Clarke: There are particular problems in London, but we shall shortly be discussing teachers' pay when we debate the Bill that is on the Order Paper for today. During the debate I shall reveal that not so many people have entered initial teacher training for the fi the late 1970s. The vacancy level in our scho down sharply this autumn and the teacher w very low. Therefore, we are introducing the Bi still further the attractiveness of teaching as to get teachers of the quality that we require. the hon. Gentleman about one thing only: t have no relevance whatever to the import raising the morale of our teachers and gettin the quality that we need.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: Will my right hon. Friend consider vouchers for nursery educ income and one-parent families experience finding kindergarten and nursery schools, b of choice could be achieved by a voucher sc

Mr. Clarke: I shall consider my h suggestion, with others made about nurse provision for the under-fives. We have ruled for statutory schooling between the ages of because of our excellent system of reform, w all the purposes for which vouchers were origi by the inventor of that notion.

Teacher Vacancies

14. Mr. Haynes: To ask the Secretary Education and Science what is his most rece teacher vacancies; and if he will make a stat

Mr. Fallon: My right hon. Friend the then State published on 5 October the res Department's survey of teacher vacancies con beginning of September, a copy of which is i On 3 September, local education authorities over 1,400 unfilled posts—very many fe vacancies reported in January. Those encouraging and show that our measures teacher recruitment and retention are being

Mr. Haynes: That is a terrible rec Government. I want to know whether every c a fully trained teacher. Come on, let us hav

Mr. Fallon rose——

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. There are four m before Prime Minister's Question Time.

Mr. Fallon: The hon. Gentleman's educat of Nottinghamshire had 138 vacancies last September, it had only five.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Will my hon. Fri constant attacks of the Labour party and its teaching profession and accept that teachers good as they have ever been and that they g service to our children, despite the Labour pa

Mr. Fallon: It is important that the L should cease to denigrate the profession. The is 1·8 per cent., which is one of the lo profession.

University Teachers (Morale)

15. Mr. Kirkwood: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what representations he has had from university teachers about their current state of morale.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. Friend the then Secretary of State received from the Association of University Teachers a copy of its autumn 1990 publication, "Goodwill Under Stress". I met a delegation from the AUT on 20 November. We had a friendly and useful discussions about a range of issues. I pay tribute to the staff of the universities for the quality of tutorial and pastoral care that they give students in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Kirkwood: Does the Minister accept that the AUT document clearly shows that in the past 10 years university teachers have been overworked, undervalued and underpaid? Is not it highly significant that when Sir Edward Parkes, the chairman of the Committee of Vice-Chancellors and Principals, was asked to comment on the resignation of the Prime Minister, he said that in the past 10 years too much of the energy of academic staff had been devoted to damage limitation? He further said that universities would regard the demise of the Thatcher years without regret.

Mr. Howarth: I know of no one who denigrates university teachers or who holds them in less than full respect. I very much hope that the hon. Gentleman does not disregard them. In the period during which my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has held office, there has been an increase of no less than 40 per cent. in the number of young people who have had the opportunity to participate in higher education. That is only one of the remarkable achievements under the inspired leadership of my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister.

Mr. Dickens: Would not morale in the teaching profession be greatly improved if we identified weaknesses in teachers so that they could be given more training in that direction? Would not a good appraisal system produce those goods? We need to appraise teachers, weed out bad ones and help the good teachers more.

Mr. Howarth: As my hon. Friend knows, appraisal schemes are under active consideration by local education authorities all over the country and our policy is moving forward in that regard. Equally, higher education institutions are introducing their own appraisal systems. Of course, it is right that those who are performing outstanding work should have their performance recognised and that should be reflected in pay scales.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Haselhurst: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 27 November.

The Prime Minister (Mrs. Margaret Thatcher): Mr. Speaker—[HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Mr. Speaker, this morning I had a number of meetings. After my duties in this House, I shall continue to reply to some of the 30,000 letters that have so far been delivered to Downing street in the past few days.

Mr. Haselhurst: If this is to be the last occasion on which my right hon. Friend answers questions from the Dispatch Box, may I express the appreciation of Conservative Members—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."]—and, I hope, of the whole House, for the skill, command and courtesy with which she has dealt with questions over the past 11 years?

Is my right hon. Friend aware that Stansted airport's new terminal is to open in March next year, that the main roads serving it will not be available until 1995 and that the rail links serving it will not be of adequate capacity until that same year? Does my right hon. Friend agree that, if we are to get more public acceptance among communities that have major developments thrust upon them, it would be better if essential infrastructure came sooner rather than later?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to my hon. Friend for his kind words. Stansted airport is close to the M11. I understand that the British Airways Authority is building a dual carriageway to connect the new terminal to the M11 and that it should be ready by March next year. I understand that British Rail is building a track to connect the terminal to the Liverpool Street station line and has already ordered rolling stock. That, too, should be ready by March next year. I hope that that will satisfy the last question by my hon. Friend that I shall answer.

Mr. Kinnock: Would the Prime Minister be good enough to tell us which of the policies that she leaves to her successor she now thinks should be scrapped?

The Prime Minister: I am happy that my successor will carry on the excellent policies that have finished with the decline of socialism, brought great prosperity to this country, raised Britain's standing in the world and brought about a truly capital-owning democracy.

Mr. Kinnock: If the Prime Minister thinks that nothing should be changed, can she tell us why on earth all those now competing for her job are desperately wriggling around trying to find a way out of the poll tax trap?

The Prime Minister: On the contrary, I really rather thought that they were keeping the poll—the community charge—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh."]—the community charge or community policy and, whatever review they have, the result will be infinitely better than going back to the rates, which of course would be the worst of all worlds.

Mr. Kinnock: As this may conceivably be the last time that the Prime Minister answers, may I say to her that her honest approach to the poll tax is commendable? She is demonstrating that there are two, and only two, honest approaches: one is to keep the poll tax intact, as she wants, and the other is to abolish it entirely, as we shall do.

The Prime Minister: No, that is not correct. As with any new tax, one always both reviews it and continually amends it. I should have thought that the right hon. Gentleman would know that after all this time.

Dame Jill Knight: May I voice the profound regret felt by millions in this country, and thousands of millions outside, that my right hon. Friend is not to continue in her high office? Is she aware of their acknowledgement of her unrivalled service in turning back the tide of socialism, ending the brutal tyranny of the militants in the trade unions and re-establishing Britain as a great power? Finally, may I ask my right hon. Friend to reflect——

Hon. Members: Too long.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Lady is coming to an end.

Dame Jill Knight: Finally, may I ask my right hon. Friend to reflect with pride that a thousand years from now, when every other Member of the House is dead dust, she alone will have a hallowed place in the history books?

The Prime Minister: I am very grateful to my hon. Friend for her generous tributes I am certain that the Conservative constructive policies will continue, and that they will lead to a fourth election victory.

Mr. Molyneaux: Does the Prime Minister recall an important debate in November 1985, when relations between us were a little strained? Does she recall my addressing her thus:

"Millions of our fellow British citizens throughout this nation feel that the Prime Minister has a lasting contribution to make to the destiny of the nation."?—[Official Report, 26 November 1985; Vol. 87, c. 768.]

Is the Prime Minister now aware that the vast majority of those people wish that contribution to continue?

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman is very generous indeed. I think that it will continue from the Back Benches, as it has from the Front Bench.

Mrs. Maureen Hicks: Is my right hon. Friend aware that it was as a result of her unique vision at the helm that the voters in my constituency, after 40 years, rejected Labour—in her words, rejecting "windy rhetoric" from the Leader of the Opposition—because they saw in her unique qualities of leadership? May I please take this opportunity—on behalf of my constituents, who feel a tremendous sense of loss—to convey my sincere best wishes, and to extend a very warm invitation to Denis and herself to come and see us in Wolverhampton any time?

The Prime Minister: I thank my hon. Friend very much. I think that our policies since 1979 have built a new opportunity Britain, which can hold its head high in the world of international affairs. I am sure that those policies will continue, and we shall all pull together to ensure that they do.

Mr. Speaker: I call Mrs. Rosie Barnes.—[Interruption.]

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: All right, all right, all right.

Mr. Cryer: Can't you read?

Mr. Speaker: That is very impertinent of the hon. Gentleman.

I should have called Mrs. Mahon first.

Q2. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 27 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Lady to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Mahon: Does the Prime Minister agree with her right hon. Friend the Member for Circencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley), who said i Thursday that her forced resignation about by an act of treachery by some

The Prime Minister: I have resigned a be a successor. I wish him well. I am continue the policies that have been Britain and that he will continue to de

Mr. Donald Thompson: Will my right very soon to Calder Valley, where industrious, prosperous and happy people there will say to her what they weekend—"She's been a good 'un."

The Prime Minister: I think that, af to Calder Valley and I shall look forw

Q4. Mrs. Rosie Barnes: To ask the she will list her official engagements November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Barnes: May I pay a warm tr Minister for her courage and dignity days? Given that the leadership of the decided by a third ballot and by u transferable second preference votes, Minister reconsider the merits of that s elections?

The Prime Minister: I am sure that understand that I am all for first past

Q5. Mr. Wilshire: To ask the Prime list her official engagements for Tuesd

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Wilshire: As this may be one questions from a Conservative Membe Friend, may I take the opportunity to a knows how many questions she has capacity as Prime Minister. Will she thanks of all her many friends insid House, and especially of all her friends of Spelthorne? May I express to her good wish for the future, and God bl

The Prime Minister: First, this will Time at which I shall answer; I do no a career of positively last appearance Friend for his kind words, especiall husband, and I also thank him for givi question as I might not otherwise have His question is the 7,498th oral questi replied in 698 Question Times.

Q6. Mr. Winnick: To ask the Prime list her official engagements for Tuesd

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Winnick: Does not the Prime M nauseating and hypocritical to be——

Hon. Members: You are.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Come along.

Mr. Winnick: Does not the Prime Minister find it the height of hypocrisy and nauseating to be so highly praised by Tory Members when, last week, 152 of them stabbed her in the back?

The Prime Minister: The hon. Gentleman was not exactly complimentary on my last appearance, was he? I do not find it nauseating; I find it very refreshing.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Will my right hon. Friend, while she is still Prime Minister, write and leave signed by her a minute of the proceedings of the Heads of Government within the European Economic Community so that her successor can endeavour to protect Britain's long-term interests in the valiant and effective manner in which she has always done?

The Prime Minister: I can assure my hon. Friend that all the proceedings are well minuted and documented, and I most earnestly hope that the traditions of this House, which is the oldest democratic Parliament in the Community, will be fully upheld, because they ensure accountability to the people.

Q7. Mr. Strang: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list her official engagements for Tuesday 27 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Strang: When the Prime Minister recalls the day when she quoted St. Francis of Assisi on the steps of Downing street, will she contemplate the increase in family poverty that resulted from her repeated refusal to increase child benefit? Will she recall the increased hardship that resulted from the 1988 social security changes? Will she think about the homeless, whose numbers have doubled since she came to power? Is she aware that Opposition Members represent communities some of which have not recovered from the unprecedented rates of unemp ment that she inflicted on them in the early 1980s? T are some of the reasons why she will go down in histor the Prime Minister who rewarded the rich and puni the poor.

The Prime Minister: Perhaps the hon. Gentleman also recall that Scotland is enjoying greater prosperity t it has ever known under any previous Government; there are now 2 million more jobs than there were wh took over; and that, remembering the situation wh took office in 1979, there is much more peace in the industry now than there was then. We have much m peace in the coal industry, and we fought off some of most difficult and vicious attacks, during the coal st that this country has ever seen. He should also recall we have had the lowest number of strikes this year in whole post-war period.

BILL PRESENTED

Severn Bridges

Mr. Secretary Parkinson, supported by Mr. Secre Waddington, Mr. Secretary Wakeham, Mr. Secre Patten, Mr. John Selwyn Gummer, Mr. Norman Lam Mr. Secretary Hunt, Mr. Secretary Lilley and Mr. R Freeman, presented a Bill to provide for the construc of a new bridge over the Severn Estuary between Engl and Wales and roads leading to the new bridge associated works; to make provision for the levying of in respect of use of the existing Severn bridge and the bridge; to make other provision for and in connection the operation of the bridges; and for connected purpo And the same was read the First time; and ordered t read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill

Orders of the Day

School Teachers' Pay and Conditions Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

3.31 pm

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, of which I have given you notice. This Bill was published a political lifetime ago, on 15 November. Since then, the Prime Minister has resigned and each of the candidates for the Conservative party leadership has announced policies, including the central funding of teachers' pay, that are wholly inconsistent with the scheme of this Bill.

Is it in the interests of the good administration of Bills in this House for the House to proceed with this Bill when there is no guarantee that the policies contained in it will not be overturned by a new Administration?

Mr. Graham Allen (Nottingham, North): Further to that point of order——

Mr. Speaker: Order. it is not a point of order at all —[Interruption.] It is very much a point of argument. I must tell the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) that he has tabled a reasoned amendment to the Bill. Had he wanted to do so, he could have put down an amendment in the terms of the argument that he has advanced—but his point of order to me now is not a point of order at all.

Mr. Allen: Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Leader of the House is with us. Can he be prevailed upon to make a brief statement, given that none of the potential Prime Ministers will support the provisions of the Bill and that in four hours' time——

Mr. Speaker: Order. All these are matters of argument which can be advanced during the debate. They are not points of order for me.

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): Further to that point of order——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I hope that it is not the same one.

Mr. Taylor: On a different point related to the point of order, Mr. Speaker. There is an amendment on the Order Paper in the terms that have just been discussed. Will it be possible for the House to vote on the amendment tabled in the name of my right hon. Friend the Member for Yeovil (Mr. Ashdown) and his hon. Friends?

Mr. Speaker: I have selected one amendment, in the name of the leader of the Opposition—I have not yet had an opportunity to say that—but I cannot select two. I have not selected the amendment in the name of the Liberal Democrats.

Mr. Geoffrey Dickens (Littleborough and Saddleworth): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Has it not been nice to read the Prime Minister's obituary while she is still alive?

Mr. Speaker: Can I have a real point of order, please?

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): On a real point of order, Mr. Speaker. Have you observed that, in this week's business, two days are devoted to an entirely non-controversial Bill which affects Wales and that there will be further consideration of the Statutory Sick Pay Bill which both sides of the House had difficulty in finding speakers to speak to last night? Because of the light load of this week's business, will you give further reconsideration to your decision yesterday on the bid by my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) for a debate on the all-important, crucial issue of the Gulf war?

Mr. Speaker: That is hypothetical at the moment. I give consideration to important matters every day.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. I call Mr. Flannery although I think we should get on with the debate.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) is seeking to speak in the debate, so I will hear his point of order.

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): My hon. Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) raised a point of order about the School Teachers' Pay and Conditions Bill, and I want to raise a completely different point of order about it. This Bill has been condemned as a violation of international law with regard to the teaching profession by the International Labour Organisation of the United Nations. During the debate, it will emerge that the Bill is not lawful in accord with international law and it is time——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Those are matters which the hon. Gentleman can rightly advance during the debate. If it is of any comfort to him, I propose to call him very early.

Mr. Flannery: Sir, I will shut up immediately.

Ms. Dawn Primarolo (Bristol, South): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday, in reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) and his application under Standing Order No. 20, you said in column 620——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That was yesterday.

Ms. Primarolo: In replying to my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow about this very important debate about the possibility of war in the Gulf, Mr. Speaker, you said:

"I cannot therefore today submit his application to the House."—[Official Report, 26 November 1990; Vol. 181, c. 620.]

Can you indicate whether the Foreign Secretary intends to make an emergency statement to the House before the United Nations meets on Thursday about the likelihood of war in the Gulf?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Lady correctly quotes me from Hansard. I certainly said that. However, I have not had an application today under Standing Order No. 20 on that matter, and I have no knowledge of whether the Government propose to make a statement about it. I hope perhaps they may.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. The Opposition are amazed that the Foreign Secretary is not offering to make a statement, given that the five permanent members of the Security Council are to set a date for war. Surely it is more important to talk about that than for the Foreign Secretary to worry about a career as Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: That is not a matter for me. We will get on with the debate. I must announce to the House that I have selected the reasoned amendment in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

3.38 pm

The Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Kenneth Clarke): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second Time.

The Bill contains the agreed policy of this Government. I can certainly speak for two of the candidates for the position of Prime Minister who are committed to the Bill, and I believe that I know the third candidate well enough and have followed his proposals rather more carefully to know that he will endorse it and will probably vote for the Bill's provisions this evening.

The Bill comes before the House in a very different climate from that which surrounded the Teachers' Pay and Conditions Act 1987, which it is intended to replace. The House will recall that, before the 1987 Act, there was a history of progressive breakdown in the so-called Burnham machinery and increasing disruption and bitterness in our schools, which had come to a very bad head shortly before the Bill.

Since we passed the 1987 Act, there have been four years of industrial peace in our schools, and a succession of fair settlements for teachers on the basis of the excellent and well received reports produced by the interim advisory committee have served teachers well. That committee has clearly demonstrated its independence and fitness for the job. As a result, over the past few years teachers have had a clear framework for pay, duties and working time. Employers and governing bodies have been able to reward good performance and the acceptance of responsibility. That has coincided with the Government's education reforms, which are giving a much clearer focus and direction to the work of teaching.

If one looks back to 1987, one can see that the result has been four years of achievement in our schools and real improvements in the way in which children are being educated. I recognise the amount of hard work that the teachers, whose pay is the subject of the Bill, have put into what is happening in schools today. I applaud the professionalism of teachers and the achievements of the teaching profession. I believe that teachers' status is well on the way to recovery from the damage done to it during that unfortunate period in the mid-1980s. As we proceed to implement our reforms, parents will gain a greater understanding of what teachers are trying to do and regain their trust in teachers' professional commitment to the education of their children.

The 1987 Act was always recognised as a short-term solution to immediate and pressing problems. As I have said, it has fulfilled its purpose admirably, but it is time now to put more permanent arrangements into place. That is what this Bill is designed to do. It gives effect to the decisions which my predecessor, now sitting beside me in his capacity as Leader of the House, announced in the House on 23 July when he was Secretary of State for Education and Science.

The decisions that my right hon. Friend and the Government took followed prolonged and careful consultations with all the interested parties. I am afraid that it was always clear that it would not be easy to reach agreement on difficulty and sensitive issues on which widely differing views were held. Nobody regretted the demise of the Burnham committee, which was soon behind us, but it was difficult to achieve consensus on what should follow. Different and incompatible views were expressed during the consultations—most favouring the restoration of negotiating rights for teachers, while others preferred some kind of independent review. It became clear that it was not possible to find an acceptable solution which commanded universal agreement. The Government's decision has been to restore teachers' negotiating rights. That has been welcomed by the employers and most of the major teacher unions.

The main features of the new machinery which the Bill will establish are very different from the ill-fated Burnham machinery. First, the Bill provides for direct national negotiations between employers and unions. There will be a separate sub-committee for heads and deputies. The Bill brings together in one negotiating forum both pay and conditions. It has a deadline for the completion of negotiations and provides a clear means of resolving deadlock. It also provides reserve powers for the Government to refer back to the negotiating body, with reasons, any aspect of agreed settlements with which they are unhappy and, in the last resort, to impose their own views.

The Bill also provides for reference of matters to an advisory committee if the negotiating body fails to reach agreement by the deadline and for individual local education authorities and grant-maintained schools to opt out of the national arrangements and determine the pay and conditions of their teachers locally. That is the Bill's outline, and I shall deal with each feature, but first I give way to my hon. Friend.

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): I am grateful to my right hon. and learned Friend—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Greenway: All teachers are crucial, but heads and deputies are centrally crucial in schools. Therefore, will my right hon. and learned Friend consider the worries of heads and deputies that their sub-committee on pay and conditions is to report to the main committee and, presumably, will be subject to overruling by it? Can my right hon. and learned Friend reassure me that safeguards exist to ensure that the sub-committee will not be overruled, save in the most serious circumstances?

Mr. Clarke: The Bill provides just such safeguards—it is not possible for the main committee so to override the sub-committee's recommendations that it makes it impossible for the Secretary of State to allow the head teachers and deputies to have what they want. I assure my hon. Friend that the Bill provides for the problem that he fears might otherwise arise.

The Bill's first clause, together with schedule 1, provides for the establishment of the new national negotiating committee and a separate sub-committee to take the initiative on matters involving heads and deputies. It also distinguishes between the statutory and non-statutory conditions of employment: it is only the former, the statutory conditions—pay, duties and teachers' working time—that will be dealt with under the procedures set out in the rest of the Bill. On other matters, the committee will be able to strike such agreements as it wishes, subject only to a requirement in clause 6 to notify me of what it has agreed.

[Mr. Clarke]

Clause 2 is concerned with how negotiations get started, what the negotiating deadline will be, and what recommendations can be made as a result of different negotiations. Clause 3 and schedule 2 establish the procedures to be followed when negotiations result in recommendations, and clause 4 establishes what should happen if there are no recommendations by the relevant deadline.

I should say a little more about these provisions. First, negotiations—the initiative for negotiations will rest with the committees, not with the Secretary of State. The committees will be able to give themselves as long as they like to negotiate, the only constraint being that they must finish on time because teachers' negotiations have a history of being far too protracted. There will be no constraints on the negotiations and, in particular, no pre-set financial limits. The main aim of the negotiations will be a return to normal working, and it will be for the local authority employers to decide what they can afford and to reflect that in their negotiations.

Secondly, I referred briefly to the Government's powers to refer back and to override. I hope that we will not hear sanctimonious humbug about this because the need for the Government to have such powers is perfectly obvious and has always been accepted. Since 1944, Governments of all parties have been able to influence teachers' pay structure and contain pay costs. Only a particularly irresponsible Labour Government would not feel obliged to exercise an influence on teachers' pay structure and the total pay bill.

I should like to quote from one of my distinguished predecessors. During the passage of the Remuneration of Teachers Act 1965, the late Lord Stewart of Fulham, then Michael Stewart, the Secretary of State for Education and Science said:

> "I doubt whether any Government in any set of circumstances could put itself in a position where it could hand over the power on the global sum to someone other than itself."—[Official Report, Standing Committee B, 1 December 1964; c. 20.]

From 1965, the Government's interests were secured by a concordat that operated alongside the legal provisions of the 1965 Act. I shall not go back over the full 20 years——

Mr. Straw: Why not? We have lots of time.

Mr. Clarke: I suspect that the number of hon. Members who will wish to speak in the debate will be smaller than might have been the case on another day.

As I say I shall not go back over the full 20 years, but most people are agreed that the concordat worked reasonably satisfactorily. It provided the Government with a weighted vote inside the management panel and a veto over proposed offers on grounds of total cost. That veto was conceded by the local authority employers and was not backed by any statutory provision. In 1985, the employers' side, the local authority side, then led by the Labour party, unilaterally scrapped the concordat, leaving the Government with a much diminished and quite inadequate influence on the outcome of the negotiations. That could not be tolerated by any Government.

The Government provide about two thirds of th money that is necessary to pay the teachers as a result o any settlement. There is room for argument, and I am sur that there will be much debate in Committee about th precise form of negotiations, but all negotiations mus have reflected on one side of the table the legitimat interests of employees, and on the other side the legitimat interests of the employers and those who will be calle upon to finance them.

Negotiations are between the recipients of finance an those who provide that finance. It would be quite absur to devise a system whereby the local authority employe who provide the minority of the money for the settlemer could reach whatever settlement they pleased without th Government, who have to use taxpayers' money and th business rate to provide the bulk of the finance, having an say and influence. In the consultations that proceeded m right hon. Friend's statement to the House in July, bot employers and trade unions agreed that the Governmer must be able to have the last word on affordability in an new permanent machinery. The Bill therefore gives th Government a sensible and necessary role in determinin teachers' statutory conditions of employment.

Mr. Straw: As will emerge in greater detail in m speech, I broadly accept what the Secretary of State h said about the Government's position. However, may press him on the accountability of the Government an Ministers to Parliament, because one important defect this Bill, as compared even with the Teachers Pay an Conditions Act 1987, is that decisions which the Secreta of State may make under his reserved powers under th Bill can be checked by this House only under the negati resolution procedure even when those decisions a contrary to the recommendations of the teachers' pa committee, whereas decisions under the 1987 Act had to subject to the affirmative resolution procedure, which w beneficial, certainly for accountability?

Mr. Clarke: I shall look at that point again, but the are precedents for the negative resolution procedure, as s out in the Bill. My right hon. and learned Friend the Hon Secretary has similar override powers in respect of certa pay settlements, which are also covered by negati resolution. If the Government were in conflict with t negotiated solution that they were overriding, a Pray would be tabled, which the House would expect to deba In practice, however, that is unlikely to be a matter of gre significance to the House.

One snag with using the positive procedure is that t House of Lords would also have a vote and there are tho with reservations about whether their Lordships shou have the power to take decisions involving large sums public expenditure. I cannot believe that this House wou lose the opportunity of having a vote on the expenditu and on the Secretary of State's use of the override teachers' pay settlements. There would be adequa opportunities for the House to have such a vote under t negative resolution procedure.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: We are given to understand th where the settlements are within the inter-quartile ran they will not normally be referred back on the basis of t cost of the settlement. Why is it only "normally"? Sur that provision in itself would allow the Secretary of St to say that, for financial reasons, the Government would never refer back a settlement that was within the inter-quartile range, where it has been agreed.

Mr. Clarke: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for referring to the undertaking that was given by my predecessor. The Government do not intend to act unfairly or arbitrarily.

Before turning to the basis on which the Government would not normally seek to exercise the override, I should first explain that the Bill provides some statutory procedures that would stop any Secretary of State of any Government behaving in an unfair or arbitrary fashion. Where the Secretary of State is unhappy with what has been proposed, he does not immediately move and refer that matter to the advisory committee. The Secretary of State's first step would be to refer that matter back to the negotiators for their reconsideration, stating his reasons for asking them to look at it again. Only if that process has been exhausted, if the two sides are still at loggerheads and differences remain, would the question of overriding the negotiators' recommendations arise.

When it comes to exercising those powers as a member of the Government, my predecessor gave the undertaking to which the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) has just referred, which is that normally the Government would not intend to refer back recommendations on cost grounds if the overall cost was within the inter-quartile range of the private sector settlements for non-manual employees. That does not mean that we will always refer back settlements that fall outside that range, but we shall expect the negotiators to justify them and to explain how they intend to afford the settlements without having adverse effects on other schools' expenditure if such settlements are reached. That means that teachers can be confident of fair treatment compared with the work force in general, and that they will have scope to improve their pay relative to others over time. The inter-quartile range is also the range that we have chosen for civil service pay, and it has greatly improved the arrangements for civil servants.

Having got to that point, the hon. Member for Truro may ask why we do not make the provisions absolutely clear. He may even want to put them on the face of the Bill. The Government will remain bound by the undertaking that was given by my right hon. Friend the former Secretary of State for Education and Science, and which has been repeated by me today on behalf of the Government. The only reason for not making that undertaking statutory is that if, in future—perhaps by general consent—the Government were to give a different guideline which gave flexibility, it would be a pity if that required primary legislation.

The teaching profession may welcome the possibility of seeing what happens in the next few years, given the Government's commitment that we shall not normally interfere with settlements that fall within the inter-quartile range. The House should not make it too difficult for a Secretary of State to suggest a different Government guideline. Our policy is one that I think the hon. Gentleman would want, and we would not usually interfere provided that a settlement was within the inter-quartile range.

The Government's objectives for teachers' pay have been stated clearly on many occasions, and I am glad to repeat them today. We want teachers' pay to be sufficient to recruit, retain and motivate enough teachers of the right quality within what can reasonably be afforded. Having set down that principle, it is important that the pay arrangements should contain sufficient flexibility. I want there to be many well-paid, successful, professional teachers, but it is right that the money and any improved payments should go where they are needed most. Pay and negotiations should be used by employers, in this case influenced by the Government, in ways that serve managerial purposes and, in this service, that above all serve educational purposes.

Money should be used especially to reward excellence in performance, to recognise responsibility and to tackle recruitment problems. I and the Government would prefer the large sums of money involved in teachers' pay settlements to be used in that way rather than in the undifferentiated way of agreeing on one settlement figure for the profession as a whole.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley): Last weekend, I visited the South Beach first school in my constituency. I was given a copy of an assessment form covering science, English and arithmetic. The chart must be filled in because of the new assessment procedure. It takes a school teacher at least three quarters of an hour to do that for each child, and there are at least 30 pupils in each class. It is obvious that teachers cannot both be filling in forms and teaching their pupils, so they must take the forms home. Will the Government pay teachers extra money for taking home that work? I shall give the Minister the assessment form, as he may like to look at it.

Mr. Clarke: I thank the hon. Gentleman for handing me the assessment form for levels one and two used by South Beach school. I shall put myself to the test later and I hope that I can reach the necessary attainment level. However, the form was not created by the Government. South Beach school is under no legal obligation to use such a form and it is not part of the present reforms. I have not seen such a form previously, but it is possible that it relates to some earlier pilot projects on the tests that we propose to introduce in schools. The testing system for seven, 11, 14 and 16-year-olds is not yet legally in force, and it certainly will not follow the format of the hon. Gentleman's assessment form. We are contemplating a very much simpler form for seven-year-old tests. Of course, I am interested to know that an assessment form is being used sensibly, but I am sure that the Government can devise a simpler one.

It is important to have an assessment system for pupils and also to ensure that it is set out in a way that can be readily understood by parents. That is our aim. I think that most teachers accept that assessment of pupils and reporting the results to parents are an ordinary part of a teacher's occupation. Most teachers will welcome the framework that we will provide for them to do that. We held pilot projects in English schools last July on a particular method of testing seven-year-olds. A number of its features were not satisfactory and we have withdrawn that proposal. We are now working on what will be the statutory procedures for testing the English, maths and basic scientific knowledge of seven-year-olds in the summer of next year.

As I said, I believe that teachers' pay should be used to reward excellence of performance, to attract particular skills, and to be flexible in other ways. If negotiations fail to reach a conclusion on either that or any other basis when the deadline is reached, the Bill provides for what will then happen. It would be unsatisfactory if a deadlock were reached in the main annual negotiations and teachers were then left for a year without a settlement.

[Mr. Clarke]

Clause 4 provides for the Secretary of State automatically to seek recommendations from the advisory committee to be established under clause 5 and schedule 3. I make no apology for the fact that that committee is closely modelled on the interim advisory committee. It has operated successfully over the past three years, and it has earned general respect for its independence and the quality of its reports. It will not provide arbitration, but will work to a clear Government remit. However, I stress that that body will only come into play where negotiations end in disagreement. It is plainly necessary that, if the parties to the new negotiations fail to agree, the Secretary of State must look to other means of resolving them.

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): Over the weekend, the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to commit himself to a review of teachers' pay. If one takes place, how does the Secretary of State envisage that it will fit into the appropriate machinery? Would such a review be the responsibility of the interim advisory committee or of a separate, ad hoc committee? Will it supplement negotiations, and has the right hon. and learned Gentleman discussed that idea with the Chancellor?

Mr. Clarke: As an elector in the leadership contest, I am following the statements of the three candidates with interest. I do not believe that my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has committed himself, as a putative Prime Minister, to a review of teachers' pay. However, the hon. Gentleman will find that all three contenders for the premiership are united in a desire to see the status of teachers restored to the level of a few years ago. We all want to see their self-esteem restored, and have in place proper provisions for negotiating sensible pay arrangements.

My right hon. Friend the Chancellor has expressed his concerns about the status of teachers in this country, and I share his views. However, I do not believe that we shall embark on a fresh review of pay arrangements, when the Bill contains excellent arrangements that should be enacted and put into force.

Mr. Fatchett: The Chancellor was talking not about detailed arrangements and machinery but of improving teachers' salaries and conditions. If the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) came along in the new capacity of Prime Minister, would the Secretary of State agree to a new review of pay and conditions? Would he think that was a worthwhile step forward?

Mr. Clarke: So far, at this late stage in the contest, my right hon. Friend the Chancellor has not committed himself to any specific enhancements in teachers' pay and conditions. Like me, my right hon. Friend has served as a member of a Government who have seen a steady improvement in pay and conditions. Teachers are on average 30 per cent. better off in real terms—that is, their spending power has increased by 30 per cent. over the past 10 years. Today's teachers are much better off than previous generations.

We are devising machinery—my right hon. Friend Chancellor and I will vote for it this evening—th designed to pave the way for negotiations, which wi doubt continue to be funded in such a way that teac pay will certainly keep in line with movements elsew We have said that we will not interfere if the settlen are within the inter-quartile range. In that way, teac pay will keep in step with that of other professions might even improve by comparison with them. Pe those of my right hon. and hon. Friends who are closely allied with my right hon. Friend the Chan than I am at this time in the leadership contest, and are present in the Chamber, know otherwise—but I d believe that he has committed a Government unde leadership to a specific review of teachers' pay conditions—[Interruption.] I believe that authorit comments are being offered from the Benches behin

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that, such has bee improvement in teachers' pay, the hon. Membe Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) might be e back into the profession?

Mr. Clarke: Many right hon. and hon. Members want the hon. Gentleman to return to his fo profession, but I am not sure that would be in line wi Government's policy of enhancing standards in schools. In case that remark is taken literally outs would not dream of traducing the hon. Gentle professional status as a teacher. However, there are when I wish that he were back in the classroom.

Mr. Gerry Steinberg (City of Birmingham): Secretary of State claims that teachers are 30 per better off in real terms than they have ever been. Hov he explain the fact that, in the four years since the in advisory committee has been in operation, teacher has not even kept up with inflation?

Mr. Clarke: It may not have done so every year, has over the whole four years. The IAC was establish the back of a very large settlement. It is true thereafter, the settlement did not keep in line with inf every year. That is no answer to the basic point that I —the intervention by the hon. Member for C Durham (Mr. Steinberg) is no answer to that, ei which was that, during the period that the Gover have been in office, they have shown that they rec the need for the real income of teachers to rise in lin the improved prosperity of the country. Today's te have 30 per cent. more purchasing power than they h years ago, when the Conservative Government ca power.

This is a good day for talking about the achieve of the past 11 years. Teachers who have been profession throughout the 11 years of my right Friend's premiership will find that they are much be today than they were when she came to office.

Mr. Alistair Burt (Bury, North): Could my righ and learned Friend remind the House—Oppo Members sometimes seem to be suffering from col amnesia—that teachers' pay rose by 6 per cent during their term of office? I wonder why they se forget that, when they put so many questions to him teachers' pay?

Mr. Clarke: That is certainly the case. It is an irony that, under the last Labour Government, the pay of white collar workers, those in the professions and in the public services hardly improved at all. Blue collar industrial workers appeared to do much better than them but, in the end, no one thrived—especially in the face of the inflation over which the last Labour Government presided.

For a long time, our record on teachers' pay has been much better than that of the Government from which we took over. That record gives credibility to the Bill.

Mr. Steinberg rose——

Mr. Clarke: Hon. Members are encouraging me to give way because we have a lot of time. I shall give way once more, and then we shall have a change of subject.

Mr. Steinberg: I appreciate the fact that the right hon. and learned Gentleman is giving way. Rather than teachers being 30 per cent. better off in real terms, since 1974 and the Houghton award, teachers are 40 per cent. worse off. So the right hon. Gentleman's figures are not accurate. In the past 16 years, teachers have generally had a bad deal, and they are now a lot worse off than they ever were.

Mr. Clarke: Houghton was one of those sudden peaks. Thereafter, teachers' pay sharply declined.

Mr. Steinberg: No.

Mr. Clarke: Yes, it was. The then Labour Government, implemented Houghton to win an election, and thereafter, teachers' pay dropped away. Returning to the present, I believe that the hon. Gentleman is wrong. I shall check, but it is my belief that, in real terms, teachers' incomes today are higher than they were at the time of the Houghton report recommendations.

Mr. Steinberg indicated dissent.

Mr. Clarke: The hon. Member for City of Durham shakes his head. No doubt, if I am wrong, my hon. Friend will be able to correct me when he replies to the debate.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Speaking as one who received the Houghton award of 34 per cent. in 1974, I think that the House should remember that there was 27 per cent. inflation a year later—[HON. MEMBERS: "There was not."] Yes—in 1976, there was. The value of Houghton's award was totally eroded by 1979. When the Labour Government left office, we were worse off than when we were paid the Houghton award.

Mr. Clarke: We are reminiscing. I fought the 1974 election. The then Labour party bought the teachers by promising to implement Houghton, and bought nurses by promising to implement Halsbury. Once they got into office, the value of those awards in real terms was allowed to erode almost immediately.

The Bill is a much more sensible way to proceed. I am advised that, in the opinion of those who advise me, I was correct in our recent exchanges. Teachers are now 12 per cent. better off in real terms than they were after the Houghton settlement.

Let us return to the new arrangements. Clause 7 of the Bill provides for the making of orders to give effect to the changes in teachers' pay, duties and working time which emerge from the various processes that I was describing a few moments ago.

Clauses 8 and 9 provide for local education authorities and governing bodies of grant-maintained schools—who judged that they could respond better to local needs and circumstances by themselves settling the pay and conditions of their teachers—to apply to be allowed to opt out of the nationally determined framework. That builds upon the local flexibility which we have already achieved in the national arrangements in the past three years, and in my opinion is a natural extension of it.

I strongly approve of the development of more local pay bargaining and more local settlements on terms and conditions in the great public services. It would be especially advantageous for the teaching profession, many local education authorities and many grant-maintained schools.

I do not envisage that huge variations from national rates will be introduced rapidly, or at all in many cases, but the ability to tackle particular problems of local recruitment, to recognise particular skills that a school needs to offer, to reward particular performance, and to enter into agreements between the school and its staff, or the local education authority and its staff, about changes that staff want and agree to deliver in their part of the service, should all be permitted. I believe firmly that, steadily over the years, more and more local education authorities and schools and those who represent the teachers in those authorities and schools will see the advantages of moving out of national negotiating machinery and towards local pay bargaining.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: On the basis of his comments, will the Secretary of State clarify whether he believes that it is preferable for most local authorities and schools to opt out of the national arrangements that he has been describing? Is it his desire that most should opt out? Can he elaborate a little on whether any research has been undertaken within the Department to assess the likely impact of such opting out? He has suggested that the impact might not be very great. What research has taken place, and will it be presented to the House.?

Mr. Clarke: As a matter of broad principle but not immediate policy, I would welcome it if the majority of local education authorities and grant-maintained schools were operating some degree of local pay bargaining. That is not an imminent possibility, and it might be undesirable to move to that quite so quickly. When local pay bargaining begins to be developed within a giant service that is accustomed to only national pay bargaining, it is wise for all parties to proceed cautiously. People become accustomed to their pay, terms and conditions being handed down from on high by the Burnham committee or, in this case, its successor, and the skills do not always exist locally to move straight to local pay bargaining. It is not as easy as it sounds or looks to start negotiating as a county with all the staff outside the national limits, or for a grant-maintained school to start negotiating with its staff.

There is scope for some research and for people to develop the skills they require. I believe that, as the opportunity is provided by the Bill for employers to leave the national negotiating arrangements, some will take advantage of it. People will get used to the new arrangements and I should like to see it become much more the norm inside the education service. As I have said, people should move slowly, because negotiations at local level are difficult when nobody locally has experience of pay bargaining.

[Mr. Clarke]

Mr. Matthew Taylor: I agree with the Secretary of State about the need to move slowly. He said that there is scope for some research. I asked what research the Department has undertaken into the likely impact of opting out. We have not seen any. If there has been research, will it be made available to hon. Members during the debates on the Bill?

Mr. Clarke: I do not think that we have had any and, without prejudging it, I do not think that I would take much notice of it if we had. Hypothetical research about the impact of local pay bargaining in a service that has not had any is not, in my experience, very valuable. The main thing is not to have research into what might happen but to ensure that sufficient guidance and advice is available so, that what does happen is in the interests of the local education service and those who work for it. I shall inquire as to whether there has been research, but I am not instantly converted to the desirability of too much of it.

Mr. Straw: One of the unquestioned consequences of dismembering a national pay arrangement and handing it over to local negotiations is wage drift. What view does the Treasury take of the prospect of 75 per cent. of local authorities running their own negotiations?

Mr. Clarke: Under this Government, the Treasury has always been supportive of moves towards local pay bargaining and greater pay flexibility, because it means that the management have the ability to get more out of the work force and to use the increased expenditure on its payroll in a way that produces improvements in service. There has been no resistance from my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer or his predecessors to moving towards local pay bargaining.

It is true that there is a danger of pay drift in just moving towards local pay bargaining. A relaxed employer may decide that he will show what an enlightened local authority he represents by paying 20 per cent. more to all the teachers and that authority is then quoted by all the other authorities involved in pay bargaining. I see that Opposition Front-Bench Members are nodding enthusiastically at that. I am sorry that they share the low opinion of local government as employers that is sometimes held by Conservative Members. That is the danger, but it is up to employers to be more sophisticated and to guard against it. The pay argument could be applied to many other industries—to every company in the engineering industry and to all other large employers.

The Opposition have to consider whether they really fear the fact that employers should be allowed to opt out. They say that they do not see much more scope for variations to reflect the local pay market, or different skills, or agreements between governors, headmasters and headmistresses and staff about enhanced payment for recognisable and measurable improvements in performance. The Opposition take too nervous a view. Pay drift is a danger, but it can be avoided by sensible managers.

Local authorities must remember, especially now that their negotiating powers are being returned to them, that everything they do must be within the limit of what is reasonably affordable. If they do not agree on will simply pay the teachers more and at the damage other parts of the education service.

Mr. Steve Norris (Epping Forest): My righ learned Friend is right to say that progress o steady rather than hasty in this important area, that he will accept that clauses 8 and 9 are look to by those of us who represent extremely high such as the county of Essex, with much greater than any other part of the Bill. It is a breakthrough for us. It will allow us to o considerable problem, upon which I hope later to expand.

Caution is no doubt desirable, but no messa go out from the House today that respon authorities should not take full advantage of cla there is a demonstrable need, as there is in wes improve teachers' pay, whatever the absol throughout the country. Housing in west E expensive that teachers' pay must be improved

Mr. Clarke: My hon. Friend will be reassu that clause 8 does not inhibit the right of Es council to enter into local negotiations, if it so personal advice, however, is that Essex ought t how it proceeds. Nevertheless, Essex knows ex it wishes to do. I know that there are very real Essex that must be addressed. They can be add by the county council entering into proper bargaining arrangements.

Mr. Harry Greenway: Did my right hon. Friend have the pleasure of reading the mino that I appended to the Select Committee's Apr the pay and remuneration of teachers? If he di whether he saw that I suggested that teachers paid on an individual basis. That could be bro by means of the Bill. If that were done, teacher much happier. They would see that their cont the school—the task of teaching their subject ar other responsibilities they may have—had beer account by the school authorities. If teachers fe services were more valued, they would be mu and would feel more settled.

Mr. Clarke: At that time, I was reading Committee reports, but I remember reading reports about the minority report that my hon. appended to the Select Committee's report. I hon. Friend that a great deal of flexibility has a result of the advisory committee's recomme Individual rewards for teachers are already of a possibility as a result of what has been n local authorities have ideas of their own, clause them to decide what, for them, are better arran the individual reward of teachers. The mor there is in the system, the more people will see a valuable way to improve rewards to the pro thereby to raise teaching standards.

The new negotiating machinery to which t effect amounts to a carefully balanced packag proper recognition to the legitimate interests their employers and the Government. It is fair parents, taxpayers and community charge pay best proposition available at a time when we to restoring negotiating machinery. It will be addition to present efforts to recruit teachers and will, I hope, lead to further improvement in the good level of recruitment and retention in the teaching profession.

The Department carries out a survey every October of recruitment to teacher training courses in all universities, polytechnics and colleges in England and Wales. The figures are much better this year than last year. Nearly 24,000 students started initial teacher training this year. That is a quite spectacular increase of more than 2,000 compared with last year. Recruitment to primary courses is nearly 12 per cent. higher than a year ago, which is a spectacular increase. Recruitment to secondary courses is nearly 6 per cent. higher. Recruitment to the main secondary shortage subjects, except mathematics, was higher than last year. There has been an increase of 30 per cent. in the intake of modern language specialists.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Michael Fallon): Hear, hear.

Mr. Clarke: I repeat that, as I got a "Hear, hear". There has been an increase of almost a third in the recruitment of modern language specialists. Overall, recruitment was almost half as high again as in 1983, and was the highest since 1977. The House must agree that that is good news. It shows how effective our programme of action on teacher supply measures has been and that, contrary to all the myths, teaching is an attractive career and is becoming increasingly so. But we cannot rest on that—we must do better still.

Not only is recruitment suddenly up, but retention is satisfactory as well. I have been considering, for the first time, wastage in the profession. Wastage—people leaving teaching for other occupations—runs at only about 1 per cent. per year. That is a spectacularly low figure and reflects job satisfaction as well as satisfaction with pay. The general vacancy rate in our schools, contrary to constant campaigning, has not risen in the past 10 years, but I accept that there are problems in one or two places. My Department's survey earlier this year showed that vacancies this year were particularly down in September, compared with a year ago.

Recruitment and retention is satisfactory, and the new machinery will have a good starting point in the current teachers' pay and conditions document. That already covers pay, duties and working time; it provides attractive pay levels and scope for desirable differentiation; and it provides wide-ranging local flexibility.

That is the background on which we must build. I share the views which I think my right hon. Friend the Chancellor was expressing at the weekend—that we should build on it by putting the machinery in place for the proper negotiation of pay and by continuing to build up the morale of the profession yet further. It is the key deliverer of the service, and as we restore its self-esteem and job satisfaction, the beneficiaries will be pupils, who will find a motivated teaching force applying themselves with even more dedication to teaching them.

Mrs. Sylvia Heal (Mid-Staffordshire): Despite what the Minister has said, the view from the chalk face is different. Staff do not agree with his interpretation of recruitment and retention. Teachers in my constituency, with whom I have been speaking in the past few weeks, believe that only an attractive increase in salaries will recruit and retain teachers.

Mr. Clarke: I am sure that teachers always aspire to higher pay and, quite properly, they always have a pay claim in prospect. As I have said in repeated exchanges, not only is their pay much better but we are attracting more people to the profession, the wastage rate is low and vacancies are down.

Mr. Straw: Not true.

Mr. Clarke: It is true. I quite understand why unions keep up a constant stream of propaganda that seeks to undermine that position. The Labour party should occasionally, as a responsible Opposition, address itself to the facts which I described.

Mr. Norris: Will my right hon. and learned Friend give way?

Mr. Clarke: I have given way for the last time. I apologise to my hon. Friend, but I am in danger of talking out my own Bill if I give way more frequently.

The machinery can only be as good as the people who operate it. If those who are negotiating are not prepared to operate the new machinery sensibly and are not prepared to recognise realities, no machinery will be able to compensate for that. If the leaders of the teachers' unions are genuine in their claims to have the interests of education at heart—I have no reason to doubt it—and demonstrate that by approaching negotiations responsibly, I believe that the new machinery set up by the Bill will serve them well. If they return to the unrealistic claims backed up by irresponsible actions against the pupils which we have seen in the past, they are doomed to disappointment. Most importantly, they will do the education service and the teaching profession no good by returning to such an approach. I hope that they will not do that and that they will be attracted by the working of the new arrangements. I therefore commend the Bill to the House.

4.25 pm

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn): I beg to move,

That this House declines to give a Second Reading to a Bill which, by undermining national pay arrangements, will divide and further weaken the education service, place standards at risk, is based on no coherent strategy to improve teacher recruitment, retention and morale, and which gives powers to the Secretary of State for which he will not properly be accountable.

As our reasoned amendment makes clear, we decline to give the Bill our endorsement. In our view, it has three major defects. First, it establishes a complex scheme for settling teachers' pay, with too much power being given to the Secretary of State for which he is not properly accountable to Parliament. Secondly, the provisions for local education authorities and for grant-maintained schools to opt out of a national pay framework will, in our judgment, still further divide the education service, to the detriment of our children's education. Thirdly, we believe that the Government have no clear strategy for dealing with the serious and increasing problems of teacher shortages, the difficulty of recruitment and retention and the problems of low morale.

The Secretary of State spoke of "sanctimonious humbug". Over the past couple of weeks, we have seen some fine examples of sanctimonious humbug among Conservative Members—[Interruption.] I am glad that Conservative Members appreciate that that certainly occurred.

Mr. James Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): We have not said anything.

Mr. Straw: The hon. Gentleman does not need to say anything—one has only to look at him.

All three candidates for the Conservative leadership have suddenly discovered that morale in the teaching service is low and that education matters and should be improved. That tells us principally two things about those candidates—that they can read opinion polls and that they have no shame. The polls show that there has been rising discontent with the Government's education policies, dating almost exactly from the introduction nearly three years ago of the Education Reform Bill and, coinciding with that discontent, rising and positive support for Labour's alternatives.

The responsibility for this sorry state is shared by the whole Government, not just the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher). Each candidate for the Conservative leadership voted for the Education Reform Act 1988 and the Teachers' Pay and Conditions Act 1987. That legislation removed all negotiating rights from teachers and instead left teachers, alone among any pay bargaining group, with their pay subject to imposition by fiat of the Secretary of State.

On Sunday, I read in The Observer a statement made by the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) as part of his platform to obtain the votes of Conservative Members. It is notable that he has failed to obtain the support or vote of any of the Education Ministers—they are backing the gentlemen's candidate. The right hon. Gentleman said:

"we cannot guarantee better results in the classroom until we restore teacher's self respect, authority and respect in the community."

We would all drink to that. Why is there now a problem after 11 years of Conservative Administration? Why do teachers' self-respect, authority and respect in the community need to be restored? Teachers' morale is certainly not what it should be.

That point was made powerfully in the excellent last report, published in January this year, by the Interim Advisory Committee on School Teachers' Pay and Conditions. The committee said:

"We are in no doubt at all that teacher morale is lower than in our first two years, and that a number of factors are contributing to this."

One of the factors, the committee said, was identified by Her Majesty's senior chief inspector of schools, who said that teachers felt that they were not properly valued, and were used as

"convenient scapegoats for all society's problems."

The senior inspector is a courageous man, whom I applaud. He did not say precisely who he thought was treating teachers in that way, but the message in the report was clear—that among those who had misused and mistreated teachers were a succession of Conservative Ministers and Back Benchers who, in the early and mid-1980s, dined out on abuse of what teachers were seeking to do.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Who and when?

Mr. Straw: If the Secretary of State goes to the Library and looks up a certain speech made by the present Secretary of State for the Environment—the right hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Patten)—he will find, put together very cleverly, the insinuation that teachers' current attitudes would lead to the creation of a yob so right hon. and learned Gentleman then loo cuttings relating to that speech, he will disco right hon. Friend achieved exactly what he achieve: he managed to imply that teachers, those with a great deal more power—n

Government—were to blame for the creatio society.

Mr. Pawsey: I am certain that that accusati levelled across the Chamber before. Last ti refuted by my right hon. Friend the present S

State for the Environment. Incidentally, the from my right hon. Friend which sticks in m very simple one—his observation that the nea a magic wand in education is a head teacher.

Mr. Straw: I know that the hon. Gentlem these matters with care. I am happy to send hi

the speech made by the current Secretary of S

Environment—who then held the post of State, Department of Education and Science, w held by the hon. Member for Enfield, North —and the cuttings associated with it. The Gentleman wrote to me about the speech, a back; but I never received a reply, which I thin point. I sent him the cuttings too.

One of the reasons for teachers' low morale suggestion that they are responsible for the ill

The second reason——

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: This is preposterou want to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, bu teachers' morale to be told so often by Labour that they are being abused by Conservative M seriously suggested that one unremembered s

by my right hon. Friend the Member for Bath —and the hon. Gentleman's interpretation o strongly disputed by my hon. Friend the Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey)—is res

the present low morale? It is absurd to sugges the Government's responsibility. What di teaching profession was the public's reactio protracted industrial dispute. Unfortunately, party gave mindless support to that action, a played its part in the lowering of the esteem profession was held by the general public.

Mr. Straw: I am not surprised that the State does not remember what happened—at was engaged full time in lowering the morale of the health professions.

Of course, one Minister alone was not re succession of Ministers were responsible. The State should read all the speeches made to party conferences by the right hon. Memb

Valley (Mr. Baker) when he was Secretary particularly his 1986 speech, which took a sid section of the teaching profession. He should report of his own senior chief inspector. I qu report at greater length:

"But of great importance to most teachers, is they do is seen to be valued and rated highly by its difficulties are understood; and that teachers are not used as convenient scapegoats for problems. Currently, too many teachers fe profession and its work are misjudged a undervalued."

The reason why teachers' morale fell so greatly was partly the abuse that was heaped on them, but it was also the continuous round of change upon change which was imposed on teachers as a consequence of the ill-thought-out agenda in the Education Reform Act 1988. Conservative Members cannot gainsay that because they know that much of that agenda was badly thought out and has subsequently had to be unpicked and changed.

Thirdly, teachers' self-respect and authority was greatly undermined by the removal of negotiating rights. Fourthly, as the Secretary of State must acknowledge, teachers' pay—especially since the settlement in 1986—has lagged behind that of comparable pay groups. The Secretary of State swapped statistics about what had happened to teachers' pay in the past 15 years. Over 15 years of any Government—even the present Government, who have a lower record of growth year on year than previous Governments—real living standards are likely to rise. The graph in the Select Committee report makes it clear that there has been a real rise in teachers' pay since 1974. I am not arguing about that and it is sensible that we should agree on known facts.

However, teachers' pay—this point is of critical importance—has lagged behind that of comparable groups. That is shown clearly by the other graph in the Select Committee report.

Mr. Pawsey indicated assent.

Mr. Straw: I am glad to see that the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) acknowledges that fact on this occasion. The slide down from the high point of Houghton has been great relative to other non-manual earnings. Conservative Members believe, more than we do, in untrammelled markets. Whether people take a job depends partly on the relative pay available for that job compared with other jobs. It is not surprising that teacher shortages have arisen, given that the pay of teachers has so declined relative to that of other groups.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield): My hon. Friend will be aware—the Secretary of State will also be aware because I shall tell him—that I have two daughters and a son-in-law in teaching. I get my ear bashed regularly about how the Government have treated the teaching profession. Whenever I have had the opportunity, I have asked the Government to get their noses out of negotiations between the employers and the trade unions on wage increases for the teaching profession. Let there be no mistake about it—the present Secretary of State will poke his nose in, too. He upset the health service and he will do the same with education.

Mr. Straw: I do not wish to comment on the personal anatomy of the Secretary of State, which is actually rather fine, but I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) that the Secretary of State will seek unnecessarily to interfere in the outcome of the negotiations. Like my hon. Friend, I have many family members who are teachers and I know just how difficult it is—

Mr. Pawsey: It cannot be so bad then, can it?

Mr. Straw: It is bad. I know just how difficult it is for those members of my family to make ends meet.

The Library briefing document which, as ever, is extremely helpful, contains on its penultimate page information on what has happened to the salaries graduate teachers. It shows that, in real, terms the start salary of graduate teachers will have gone down fr £10,330 in October 1987 to £9,990 at the beginning of n year. The final salary that a career classroom gradu teacher with incentive allowance B can expect has g down by even more—from £17,390 to £16,660. That i significant drop, so it is not surprising to learn of the gr difficulties that many authorities have had not only recruiting teachers, but in retaining them.

We must also take into account the fact that Government, through all the reports of the inte advisory committee, have consistently failed fully to fu any of the awards. I pay tribute to the IAC because reports have been good, but I cannot pay tribute to Government, who have failed at any stage to back recommendations fully with cash. As a consequence that, since the 1986 award, teachers' pay has decli rather than increased in real terms. That was made clea the charter on pay of the latest interim advisory commit report, which states of inflation in paragraph 4.3:

"Even if it falls back to 7·5 per cent. at the end of financial year, as forecast by the Government, the majority teachers will be worse off than a year previously, whate then happens during 1990-91."

Inflation has been higher than anticipated. Teachers worse off than they were a year ago——

Mr. Norris: Since we are discussing members of hon. Gentleman's family, he will know that I have honour to represent his mother, who ploughs a lon furrow as a Labour councillor in my constituency. T hon. Gentleman will therefore know from perso experience that, if the public are asked to judge betw the words of my right hon. and learned Friend Secretary of State and the hon. Gentleman on recruitme they will know whom to believe.

In my constituency, a dreadful letter promising consequences for September 1989 was issued to parent the beginning of the summer term of that ye Understandably, it worried them and many of them wr to me. In fact, at the beginning of September, all bu handful of posts were filled and that handful represen no more posts than are usually vacant at any time of ye This year, the same process was repeated—the sa scaremongering, the same stories and the same anxi among parents—following which exactly the sa happened in September. All vacancies were filled, barr a mere half dozen which represented the usual vaca factor. Does that not show that my right hon. and lear Friend's statistics are much more valid than the h Gentleman's qualitative observations?

Mr. Straw: I am glad to know that the hon. Member Epping Forest (Mr. Norris) is accusing Mr. Paul Wh the Conservative chairman of Essex county council, scaremongering. Mr. White is also chairman of Conservative group on the Association of Cou Councils, and now chairman of the Convention of Lo Education Authorities. He is a responsible man, and has said what everyone involved in education knows—t there are increasing difficulties in recruiting and retain teachers.

It is perfectly likely that there are people in front classes, but the hon. Gentleman should know that proportion of people who are not qualified to teach subjects that they are having to teach increased betw

[Mr. Straw]

1984 and 1988 and in certain subjects now stands at more than 50 per cent. If the hon. Gentleman were to speak to anyone running a school in his constituency or elsewhere, he would find that the numbers of recruits for any vacancy and the quality of recruits for that vacancy are lower and will get worse.

Mr. Steinberg: In the north, where I come from, there is a phrase known as "arguing the cheat". I am afraid that the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris) is arguing the cheat now. He said earlier that he was delighted that his local authority would be able to opt out and negotiate privately, because of the problems that it faced in recruiting teachers. He now says that there are no problems in Essexs and no vacancies—teachers are easy to come by. He cannot argue both ends of the stick.

Mr. Norris: Yes, I can.

Mr. Straw: Knowing the hon. Gentleman's previous occupation, I am sure that he will argue each end of the stick. If he cannot find the engine in the front, he will tell us that it is in the back. But he serves neither himself nor his constituents well if he goes on peddling this sort of nonsense. He should go around a few schools. I know the position in west Essex rather better than he does; teacher shortages there are as severe now as in the early 1960s.

Opening the debate, the Secretary of State said that two of the candidates in the leadership struggle were behind the policies in the Bill. He suggested that the other candidate, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), might also be behind them, with the implication that he might not be.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The other two were in the Government who devised the Bill. The right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) is not in the Government, but so far as I am aware he intends to vote for the Bill.

Mr. Straw: It is useful to know that the right hon. Member for Henley will not be in the Government. I advise the Secretary of State to keep his options open.

The right hon. Member for Henley said two weekends ago that he wanted to move towards central payment of teachers' salaries by the Exchequer. When that was put to the Prime Minister by the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor), the Prime Minister replied on 13 November that the effect would be to add 4p or 5p to income tax. That is the calculation arrived at, taking account of the present local authority contribution to teachers' salaries.

Yesterday, I asked the Secretary of State and the Chancellor of the Exchequer what the impact of such a move would be. I appreciate that both have other things on their minds, but I am sorry to say that the Secretary of State dodged the question and refused to tell me the present size of the local authority contribution to teachers' pay. I have yet to receive an answer from the Chancellor. May we take it that what the Prime Minister said on 13 November was correct—that if, as the right hon. Member for Henley suggested, we move to full payment of teachers' salaries by the Exchequer, it would add 4p or 5p to income tax?

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: If that was all no money was clawed back from local would indeed be true.

Mr. Straw: That is a useful point of discussions.

Mr. Clarke: Is such a move Oppositi think that any Conservatives have sug that.

Mr. Straw: The right hon. Membe suggested it. He has also suggested that it without raising income tax. He e prospect of cuts in income tax—Cons with a late vote to cast may wish to take The right hon. Gentleman certainly did anyone else. It is not the policy of the will not be the policy of the Labour Go in that direction.

It is always my belief that the forma negotiating arrangements should as far the reality of the interests involved. The employment and pay is that there ar interests—teachers and head teachers w by six associations, the employers who local authority associations, and the important to be clear as to how and why interest arises. As with any public secto this size, it arises partly out of the Gov in the total size of public spending an ensure that inflation is kept as low as po the whole of the Government's interest could be coped with through the us relating to the revenue support grant s the only mechanism for registering interest in, say, local authority man settlements and the APC and T settlem satisfactorily.

It has long been accepted, ho Government have a wider interest in tea from the Secretary of State's statutory the supply and training of teachers and f the education service, and from the polit any Government will be held partly r performance of the education service.

With that in mind, there are three wa the Government's interest—directly in n was the approach taken by Burnham; b to which the Government give evidence caveat that they will accept its conclusio are clear and compelling reasons for ch the review body; and thirdly, the Gove final arbiter and take reserve powers o

The Bill reflects the third approa powers to the Secretary of State to ove of negotiations and to establish a teache when negotiations have failed or when unsatisfactory to the Secretary of State conclusions can then be overriden by the and his overriding of its conclusions or l them would not be the subject of autom approval by the House under the affi procedure. The Secretary of State is unnecessary powers, for which he is no the by, in taking those powers, he is als International Labour Organisation con

As I read the Bill, and having listened to the Secretary of State, there seems to be no stage until the completion of negotiations or their breakdown at which the Secretary of State is obliged to state his priorities and constraints for the teachers' pay settlement for the following year. If that is so, it injects a wholly unnecessary element of chance into the negotiations. The Secretary of State may well have a bottom line—for example, on the global sum available or on something that he regards as very important in terms of the structure of salary scales or conditions. If he keeps quiet, the local authorities and trade unions could enter into negotiations in good faith, reach an agreement which was outwith the Secretary of State's view and only then would the negotiators discover that what they had negotiated in good faith and without notice to the contrary from the Secretary of State was actually unacceptable to him.

If the Secretary of State believes that certain issues are important, it is far better that the negotiators are aware of those interests at an early stage. The Secretary of State should not be able at a later stage to raise issues which require him to overturn the outcome of negotiations if he has not given notice of those issues. I am not claiming that the Secretary of State should be a secret party to the negotiations or that he must dot every last comma——

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: The committee can refer back.

Mr. Straw: —but it seems to me that the negotiators should have a rough idea of the global sum available or of the likely ball park in terms of finance. That is covered by what the Secretary of State said about inter-quartile settlements.

If the Secretary of State had a particular view about the need to retain new teachers in the service—something that I believe is important—and regarded that as a sticking point in the outcome of negotiations, it would be important for the negotiators to be aware of that. It should not be an imposition on the negotiators, but they should have notice of the Secretary of State's opinion. It would be open to the negotiators to negotiate knowing the Secretary of State's view, or for them to try to change the Secretary of State's mind. I hope that the Secretary of State will take that point on board.

I said a moment ago that the Bill's provisions appear to be in breach of the requirements of the International Labour Organisation, a point that was made powerfully by my hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery). In the Select Committee on Education, Science and Arts, the Secretary of State was scornful of the ILO. That is part of his stock in trade when he is in difficulty, but the ILO needs to be treated with more respect because we are a signatory to it and at no stage have the Government sought to resile from their commitment to it.

The ILO's comments about the structure are serious. It has stated that the Government, through > "the Secretary of State appears to have an absolute discretion to disregard any recommendations with which it disagrees, even if that recommendation has the full support of all parties to the negotiating process. This does not leave the 'final decision' with 'the parties'. The Government has not attempted to justify its proposals on the basis of 'compelling reasons of national economic interest'."

I have spelt out what I believe to be the entirely legitimate interests of any Government in teachers' pay. We all accept that there must be a final arbiter in what can sometimes be difficult negotiations, but there is that these arrangements go too far and are in bre ILO convention.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: I believe that the hon. G has quoted the opinion of a committee of layn ILO. It is not a legal opinion. That committee re representations from the Government about bre convention, so it cannot be said at the moment authoritative view of the ILO. If the ILO is n come to that opinion, that is because it has understand that teachers in this country are emp a basis whereby although the employer is authority, central Government provide about t of the cost.

I can well understand that that rather unusual is not replicated in most ILO member states. Mos states would recognise the Government's determine the level of a pay settlement for civi where that is paid in full and they would Government to keep out of negotiations in v Government were not the employer. That is the in this country. The problem is that the ILO cottoned on to the fact that although we are not s employer, central Government provide two thir cost. That is why, as we all agree, the Governme legitimate interest in the outcome of negotiations be allowed to bring their influence to bear.

Mr. Straw: There were some worried look officials' Box as the Secretary of State said that committee had not considered the Government The committee received the Government's reply October 1990. In its preamble to the conclusions in great detail exactly what the Government had will lend the Secretary of State my copy, but he do something about his briefing. A committee c the matter, but it had full notice of the Gove position.

I wish to refer briefly to the opt-out arran Most of us had hopes that the end of the Tha would lead to an end to the paranoia w unfortunately characterised much of the Gove approach to local authorities and trade unions. S looking at the Bill, the chance of that habit of th years being changed seems slim.

The United Kingdom is a very large country of people in it—[Laughter.] Small countries do to have their administration divided regionally an

The size of this country means that any nation must have its administration split, regionally an The choice is either to have a service administered authorities which are locally elected and accounta with the national health service, to have regional administration by appointed, unaccountable boc packed with partisan appointments with w Secretary of State is all too familiar.

I believe that we are better off with a model unc local authorities run the education service, produces better administration, better value fo and is also better politics for the governing something that the present Government alway because responsibility can be shared for the kind that is produced. Allowing local authorities to o pay negotiations, as with permitting schools to o local authority control, is not a clearly thought policy, but a piece of guerrilla warfare against the established position of local authorities. As policy, it is inherently irresponsible.

[Mr. Straw]

The test of any policy is what happens if it works. The previous Secretary of State for Education and Science was frightened about the kind of conclusion that would occur if the policy of schools opting out actually worked. On 13 October, he told the Financial Times:

"if a majority of the nation's schools did opt out, the result could be an administrative nightmare for central government, which would have to supervise and fund thousands of schools."

That is exactly the case. Opting out may be able to work administratively for a handful of schools, but if a large number of schools opt out, that will replicate all the problems which occur in administering the health service and a parallel system of administration would have to be set up.

Exactly the same thing would happen if a large number of local authorities opt out of pay negotiations. The Secretary of State said that he anticipated 75 per cent. of local authorities opting out of pay negotiations. Where does that leave the Government's legitimate interest in the outcome of those negotiations? If they all opt out, the Government cannot take any interest in the outcome of the negotiations. The Secretary of State blithely says that he is perfectly willing to anticipate that, but is he willing to anticipate a situation in which the only constraint that the Government can exercise over teachers' pay is through the revenue support grant mechanism which has no control over or say in the conditions or structure of teachers' pay? Is that the conclusion at which the Secretary of State wishes to arrive?

Mr. Clarke: Those that opt out would be making a comparison between the national arrangements in which the Government were engaged and having their own local arrangements where they would have to decide what policies they could afford. I described the circumstances in which I thought that local education authorities would make their own arrangements where they had specific management objectives—for example, particular recruitment problems which the local authority in Essex could not overcome without using that option. I do not think that that policy poses a threat and I am not altogether sure whether the hon. Member for Blackburn is against it.

Mr. Straw: Either the Secretary of State has not understood my question or, more likely, he has decided not to answer it, for reasons that I well understand. There is a fatal contradiction between the position that he took 10 minutes ago, when he not only argued strongly for the Government to maintain a financial interest in the settlement and pay two thirds of the money but said that the Government have a major interest in the nature of the education service.

Mr. Clarke: I did not.

Mr. Straw: With great respect, the Secretary of State did say that, as the record will show. He now says that the Government's only interest is in the overall pay bill, not the structure of the teaching profession. I believe—I think that the Secretary of State believes in truth—that the Government have an interest in the structure of the profession, the conditions of employment, and whether heads and deputies should be paid more, relative to other groups. The Secretary of State must consider that issue before allowing individual authorities to opt out of a national pay framework by picking up notes on the back of an envelope written by the Adam Smith Institute without any clear thought about the final conclusion.

We accept the need for local authorities and governors of voluntary-aided schools to have a wide measure of discretion over teachers' pay. It is our judgment that the framework established by the interim advisory committee secures a good balance between the need for a national framework and the need for local discretion. It would be unwise, even for the present Government, to begin to dismantle or stage guerrilla attacks on the framework before it has had a chance to settle properly.

What will the consequence be of allowing individual local authorities or grant-maintained schools to opt out of a national framework, especially when the Government do not intend to give those authorities any more money? The consequence will be that some local authorities, those which can command the greatest increase in resources, and some schools, those that can raise cash from parents, will pay more. At a time of teacher shortages—they do exist—the consequence will be that the richer, wealthier authorities will pay teachers more at the expense of the poor authorities with the greatest problems. Precisely that consequence has flown as a consequence of city technology colleges paying their teachers more than the scales that authorities in surrounding districts are able to pay their teachers.

How on earth can the opting-out procedure improve the standards of the one third of children who are getting a raw deal, usually to be found in those local authorities with the least resources? What will the balkanisation of a national pay framework do for teachers' mobility? It is important that teachers are mobile.

Under the provisions for a local authority to opt out of national pay negotiations, at least that local authority has to apply to the Secretary of State, who then makes a decision about the arrangements. Under the proposals for a grant-maintained school to opt out, under the arrangements announced in April, there was an obligation on the governors of a grant-maintained school to consult with staff. That proposal was contained in the Department of Education and Science press notice of 26 April. The Bill, however, contains no obligation for the governors to consult anybody. In addition, once an application has been made by the governors, the Secretary of State has no discretion to refuse the application. If the Secretary of State has discretion to judge whether the arrangements are appropriate in respect of a local authority, why can he not exercise his discretion in respect of a grant-maintained school?

Mr. Clarke: Because the governors of a grant-maintained school have a discrete budget and have responsibility for keeping the school solvent, and are bound to operate within those confines. A local education authority has a much bigger budget and the scale is quite different. It is conceivable that the local education authority might be pursuing a policy of confronting the Government on their financial contribution, which the Government would like to approve. At the national level, where we are agreed that the Government must have an interest, the contribution has a direct bearing on the Government's issuing of revenue support grant.

If a local authority seeks to leave the system, or a grant-maintained school breaks out of its own violition, they do so knowing that the Government's national obligation has already been defined and they are constrained by what they know to be the available resources. That system is not anarchic and does not constitute balkanisation—it merely allows a further logical extension of the local flexibility that we already have, and which I was pleased to hear the hon. Gentleman welcome a few moments ago.

Mr. Straw: The policy is quite different from local flexibility and will lead to a two-tier service, particularly in the context in which the Government seek to bribe schools to opt out of local authority control by giving them money that they could not otherwise have. It does not seem sensible for the Secretary of State to have some sort of reserve power over the applications from grant-maintained schools. What happens if Stratford school, which has been allowed to opt out and is now losing most of its pupils, suddenly decides to pay its teachers on a different scale? That could have a further serious and damaging effect on the education of the children in that school.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett (Pembroke): Why?

Mr. Straw: Because it could lead to a further loss of teachers—children have to be taught by someone. The opting-out system is destroying that school. Given the Secretary of State's responsibility for the education of those children, he should have reserve powers over what may happen—[Interruption.] What did the Secretary of State say?

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order.

Mr. Straw: The Secretary of State raised the issue of teacher shortages. The new arrangements are set against a background of serious teacher shortages. The Secretary of State is a fool to himself if he believes that teacher recruitment, retention and morale are under control, because they are not. A major survey conducted by his own Department this January showed that there had been a 50 per cent. increase in the number of teacher vacancies over a two-year period. The Secretary of State should look at that survey. I know that he has a reputation for liking neither statistics nor statisticians, but he should look more fully at the data.

The Secretary of State spoke of recruitment to teacher training courses, which is welcome, but there are two factors that the Secretary of State should consider. First, recruitment in the sectors of most extreme shortage is down again this year. Figures for today, given to me by the Graduate Teacher Training Registry, show that maths applicants are down 760 against a target of 1,170, religious education applicants are down 219 against a target of 328, home economics applicants are down 60 against a target of 120 and craft design and technology applicants are down 240 against a target of 400. Those problems of under-recruitment now are built on year-by-year problems of under-recruitment.

Secondly, the Secretary of State should bear in mind that of every three people who enter teacher training, only one is left in teaching five years after qualification. It is no good the Secretary of State merely reading out his brief about low levels of wastage. There are terrifying levels of wastage through teacher training courses, between qualification and entry to the profession, and from the profession, especially in the first five years. It is because of those wastage levels that there are as many people with teaching qualifications outside the school system as within the school system—even the Secretary of State's officials confirm that. If it were all so wonderful, we should not be in that position.

The long title of the Bill refers to making arrangements for teachers' pay and connected purposes. In the Bill, the Government have missed a great opportunity to embark on a programme to re-establish teachers' professionalism and sense of pride. The Bill should contain measures properly to increase the recruitment, retention and morale of teachers and should establish a general teachers council. That was recommended by the all-party Select Committee on Education, Science and Arts, it would cost little and it would dramatically improve teachers' sense of professionalism and self-esteem.

We need a reform of teacher training with much better induction and support, and the Government must tackle the problem of the many people who train to teach and either do not enter the profession or drop out in the first two or three years. We need a national core curriculum for teacher training to provide many different entry routes but only one exit level—that of graduate qualification. We need to pilot teacher training schools so that the burden of inducting new young teachers does not continue to fall on those schools with a large number of vacancies and, therefore, the greatest amount of stress.

We must have real programmes for career development for teachers. That includes appraisal. I read an interesting interview in The Times on Monday, given by the Secretary of State. As part of the general November approach of Ministers, he seems to be dumping the policy of his predecessors. Speaking of teacher appraisal and his predecessor, he said:

"Things have changed since John made his decision, and it is apparent that it is not working on a voluntary basis."

What has changed is that the Government realise that the previous Secretary of State made a major error by not implementing the approach for national appraisal agreed by all parties to the scheme. The Secretary of State said that the £45 million required to implement that scheme is ludicrous, and that it was the estimate of the trade unions. He should do his homework before he comes to the House.

The estimate of £45 million in "School Teacher Appraisal: a National Framework" is not the trade union estimate but that of the working party on which two of his very senior officials sat and to which the Government are committed. The sum of £45 million is 0·5 per cent. of the teachers' pay bill. That is a small price to pay for giving the profession a proper system of career development. If such a system can be put in place, there will be much less chance of the sort of wastage that occurs at present.

In addition to teacher appraisal, we need systems which will reward new teachers and encourage them to stay in the profession and will better reward the career classroom teacher. The speed with which Conservative Members and leadership candidates are jettisoning so much of what they previously stood for, as we have discovered in the debate, is proof—if any were needed—of the failure of the past 11 years. It also proves that the Conservative party has few coherent policies, no principles and no shame.

The Bill is based on the tired and failed agenda of the past 11 years, on exactly that bizarre combination of over-centralisation and near anarchy which was the hallmark of the 1987 Act. It will give unnecessary power to the Secretary of State for which he will not be properly accountable. It will divide and weaken the profession, and that will place at risk better standards of education. We shall oppose it in the Lobby.

[Mr. Straw]

5.12 pm

Mr. Bob Dunn (Dartford): I apologise in advance to the House because I shall not be able to remain for the whole of the debate owing to a long-standing and important commitment in another part of the Palace of Westminster.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: My hon. Friend is the returning officer.

Mr. Dunn: I am not the returning officer, but one day I hope to be.

I have known the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) for 11 years, and I know of him for many years before our election to the House in 1979. I can go back the best part of a quarter of a century to the time when the hon. Gentleman was a student leader and I was a student. I remember him coming to address a student body in Manchester, when he was described as shallow, devious and vituperative. I am glad to say that he has remained true to the promise of his youth. His recent comments about my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister were disgraceful. He reached a new low in vituperation. I have heard it said of the hon. Gentleman, "Show him a belt and he has to hit below it."

On 18 July, I asked the Labour party to make plain its intentions about the future of selective education in north-west Kent. The hon. Member for Durham, North-West (Ms. Armstrong) promised to send me a copy of the Labour party's review. I still await that document. A few days ago, the hon. Member for Blackburn rather churlishly refused to let me intervene, and at that time the hon. Lady again said that she would send me a copy of the review. I am still waiting.

The hon. Member for Blackburn spoke about re-creating the old coalition of vested interests. There was nothing new or special in his speech. I was an Under-Secretary at the Department of Education and Science for five years, from 1983 to 1988. During that time, in 1985 and 1986, the Burnham arrangements collapsed. Those arrangements worked to a degree for almost 70 years and were based on consensus, the coming together of the various interests to decide on teachers' pay but not on conditions of service. Percentage or cash increases reflected the needs of the local authority, the schools and the Government.

Unfortunately, that consensus was destroyed by the coming together and working together of left-wing local education authority leaders and left-wing trade unionists. When that consensus was destroyed—I am sure that hon. Members will agree that it was destroyed—it created an inevitable vacuum in the arrangements by which teachers' pay was settled. Burnham was finished.

I welcome the attempts by successive Secretaries of State to make the interim arrangements work. Clearly, those arrangements were conceived as only temporary. Something had to be arranged which would reflect the genuine and decent interests of the various parties. I totally support the Bill, because it does much to square the circle of the difficulties that we have inherited.

I should like to deal with an issue in which I have taken a special interest in recent years—the differences in teachers' pay, recruitment and retention between the south-east and the rest of the country. My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister started her political career in my Kent constituency 40 years ago. In that constituency, there are some difficulties in arranging an adequate and varied short list for senior teacher posts. My hon. Friend the Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris) spoke about that. In view of the national pay scale, no ambitious teacher is prepared to forego the quality of life and living standards that obtain in the north-west and propose to give up his home by applying for a job in London or the Home Counties. Those areas have a higher cost of living and certainly a higher cost of housing.

On many occasions in the House and to different Secretaries of State, I have advocated the need for regional pay and for schools to become cost-centred pay bargaining units. Therefore, I welcome the part of the Bill that provides for local education authorities or grant-maintained schools to opt out of national pay bargaining arrangements. If the local education authority or the grant-maintained schools that I currently have and that I will have decide to adopt a degree of local flexibility and to pay the market rate, that would be good for the schools in my constituency.

If this debate is to be genuine, we must recognise that one of our problems is that a science or chemistry graduate with a good degree could expect a salary of between £10,000 and £14,000 on leaving university if starting at a pharmaceutical plant somewhere in London, but if he or she started teacher training or began probationary work in a school, the salary would be much lower.

We need the flexibility to recruit staff if we are to bring teachers back into teaching. Many graduates who leave teacher training colleges or university with bachelor of educaiton degrees do not even step inside a school. Those are the men and women whom we need to bring back into our schools so that we can give variety and choice to those who govern our schools when they are recruiting. Therefore, I welcome the opt-out arrangement, because it will give schools flexibility when determining their recruitment arrangements.

More importantly, however, it will show school governors the realism that they must adopt in their day-to-day and month-to-month running of our schools. There is no doubt among my hon. Friends—or, I am sure, among Opposition Members—that the arrangements for the local financial management of schools has opened the eyes of many school governors as never before.

School governors, who often used to be ciphers who sat on the platform at speech day or prize day and went to the annual cheese and wine party given by the parent teachers association, often had no concept of the problems facing the local education authorities. If a window was broken in the school, a docket was sent to county hall or to the local education office nearby and, about a week later, someone from direct labour would turn up to repair the window at great cost. Giving school governing bodies control over the budget has led to the inevitable realisation that the administration's life is not always as easy as they have thought. Governing bodies have started to realise that those who run our education authorities have to decide their priorities.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Sevenoaks (Mr. Wolfson) can confirm, my county of Kent has suffered in the past 10 years. We were starved of financial support by the last Labour Government because our county would not go down the comprehensive route. When there is talk about "evil women"—I deprecate such talk in public life—the person who should stand at the Bar to apologise to my hon. Friends and to me is the right hon. Shirley Williams, for the great damage that she did to our schools when she was Secretary of State for Education and Science. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] There is rare unanimity in the Chamber, except for the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor). However, I know that he knows that, when the right hon. Lady was doing that demolition work, she was a member of the Labour party and acted with the full authority of the Labour Government of the day. We know jolly well that, given the opportunity—which, of course, they will not be—Opposition Members would tread the same path as before.

Opting out will become not only fashionable but the norm. The relative advantages of such flexibility will be seen by teachers, unions and school governors alike as an enormous benefit to those who maintain our schools. If there is a problem in recruiting a science, physics or history teacher to fill a vacancy, the governors will have to take whatever decision they think fit in the light of the priorities set by the school governing body.

I gather that The Independent was very much in favour of such flexibility on 23 July, which it described as "a simple and beneficial reform".

It continued:

"This is clearly the right thing to do . . . National bargaining has a number of drawbacks. It enhances the importance of the teachers' unions, whose concern for the well-being of the children is, to put it charitably, well concealed . . . It is one of many forms of central control that British schools would be better off without".

The Daily Telegraph, which is a well-known paper of the centre—[Laughter.]—well, I regard it as being in the centre—also stated on 23 July that the proposals are "constructive and long overdue . . . Local bargaining would not only help to address teacher shortages, it would also show how State-run concerns need not be bound by the model of the socialist command economy".

I am sure that no hon. Member would disagree with that.

I hope to alert the country—there is a lot of alerting going on at the moment—to the fact that the Labour party has adopted its traditional servility to the teacher unions. Nothing has changed. It is said of the Opposition's education team: "Show me a vested interest and I will kneel before it."

The hon. Member for Blackburn has talked about his plans for the future. In the final sentences of his speech, he said that he would like this and that. I, too, would like something and it is only a small request. I hope——

Mr. Straw: For a job.

Mr. Dunn: In the handing out of jobs, all hon. Members know that a tyre is never recycled twice.

The hon. Member for Blackburn said what he would like. I make a plea to my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State. I hope that, in the fulness of time, he will abolish Her Majesty's inspectorate of schools and replace it with an educational audit commission, which will have the responsibility for ensuring that the reforms that we have set in place are measured and evaluated and that there are also value-for-money assessments——

Mr. Straw rose——

Mr. Dunn: The hon. Gentleman knows me too well. Last time we met, he did not do me the courtesy of giving way, and I shall not give way to him now.

Before I was so rudely interrupted, I was saying that the abolition of HMI would be welcome, as would the establishment of an educational audit commission, which could evaluate the educational reforms and give value-for-money assessments, and which should be essential and integral parts of our plans for the future.

In conclusion, I read the reasoned amendment of the Leader of the Opposition and his supporters with great interest and a little amusement. It states:

"That this House declines to give a Second Reading to a Bill which, by undermining national pay arrangements, will divide and further weaken the education service".

By their very nature, national pay arrangements divide and weaken the education service. That is why the Bill must be supported. The amendment then refers to placing "standards at risk". That is an element of cant beyond even the scope of the hon. Member for Blackburn. Time and time again in the past year, the hon. Gentleman has been challenged to make his position clear to the people of Dartford. I am the hon. Member for Dartford, and I have a responsibility to the people of Dartford. I ask the hon. Member for Blackburn whether I can now say to the people of Dartford that it is Labour party policy to abolish our grammar schools? The answer is yes, is it not?

Mr. Straw rose——

Mr. Dunn: No, the hon. Gentleman can act like a nodding dog. He has only to nod in answer to my questions. Can I say to the people of Dartford that the Labour party would take into local authority control the New Leigh city technology college? The answer is yes, by the nodding dog's consent. Can I say to the people of Dartford that the Labour party will take into local authority control the grant-maintained grammar school for girls at Wilmington? The nodding dog is saying, "Yes, yes, yes." Can I say to the people of Dartford that all the systems will be abolished and all that they will be permitted is a comprehensive system and no choice? The nodding dog is saying, "Yes, yes, yes."

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: What about the assisted places scheme?

Mr. Dunn: I shall come to that in a minute. Perhaps my hon. Friend will contain his fervour.

The Opposition's amendment claims that the Bill will "place standards at risk". High standards are achieved only through competition, the ability to choose, and parental pressure. When there is only one system in a community, which permits no choice, how can there be standards?

Mr. Burt: Does my hon. Friend agree that it is possible that the standards of the Leader of the Opposition could be raised if there was a little competition on the Opposition Benches?

Mr. Dunn: I would not want to intrude into that debate. As one who has gone through the past few weeks with some trepidation and concern, I think that it would be better if the Labour party held its leadership election in the near future——

[Mr. Dunn]

Mr. Patrick Cormack (Staffordshire, South): The Labour party is facing a crisis.

Mr. Dunn: My hon. Friend is right. However, I do not want to stray from the essential theme of my speech. I hope that my hon. Friends will be quiet so that I can go down my chosen route.

Choice means standards. Variety and a range of provision lead to an improvement in standards, not the attitude, "You can have any colour of car you want, as long as it is black." That is Labour party policy, and that is why it is ashamed to state its true policy.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) said, not only does the Opposition's policy mean the end of all those provisions, and the imposition of one system; it also means the abolition of the assisted places scheme. I served as a Back Bencher on the Committee that considered the Bill that introduced that scheme, and the introduction of city technology colleges was my idea. I can truly tell my constituents that the Labour party would do all the things I have mentioned because there is an amity of interest—[HON. MEMBERS: "A what?"]—an amity of interest on the Opposition Front Bench.

Mr. Fatchett: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Dunn: No.

The Opposition's amendment states that the Bill

"is based on no coherent strategy to improve teacher recruitment, retention and morale".

The Government have a strategy for the raising of standards, for the improvement of parental choice, for variety, and for the accountability of governors and schools to the consumer. There is nothing wrong with that.

There is a noticeable absence of any coherent strategy from the Opposition. Why? It is because nothing is said by Opposition Members unless Mr. Mandelson allows it to be said. Every Opposition speech must be stamped with the approval not of the Egg Marketing Board but of Mr. Mandelson.

Mr. Fatchett: The latter part of the hon. Gentleman's remarks shows that he has little regard for standards. He should update the information that he gives to the House. Peter Mandelson is no longer in the employ of the Labour party.

The hon. Gentleman made a number of points about standards. Could he explain why, when Martin Turner published figures in the summer that showed a decline in reading standards, the Government had no answer and had no figures to show what was happening to reading standards in our schools?

Mr. Dunn: The hon. Gentleman's intervention was both sketchy and shaky. Although Mr. Mandelson is no longer in the direct employ of the Labour party, I suspect that the aroma lingers on. Somewhere in the office of the Leader of the Opposition, there is a little gnome in the image of the hon. Member for Blackburn. It sits there and says, "No, you can't say that. Yes, you can say that." That is dangerous for an Opposition who seek to expose our difficulties. We have a strategy and a commitment.

I will read the speeches of Opposition Membe especially those of the hon. Member for Sheffi Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery), the grandfather of Labour party. I know that he will make a robust telling speech, and I am sure that he will be the first to that his party has no policy. In the light of what was s today, it has not, it will not, and it cannot.

5.36 pm

Mr. Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough): hon. Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) can be delightf droll. During the 300 and more hours that we faced e other across the Committee Room when we were debat the so-called reform Bill—I would call it a deformed —he enlightened many a 30 seconds with lovely stories. came out with the most reactionary thoughts in the m charmingly acceptable language, as he has just done ag I pay him a tribute, because after he was a junior Mini there must have been a time when he went to see the Pr Minister and said to her, "Yes, yes, yes," but she s "No, no, no," and threw him out. Indeed, she did that v many Conservative Members, one or two of whom here today. She was merciless, but they have had t revenge. The daggers came out and they threw her The hon. Gentleman may even be invited back into Government.

I want to talk about the reality of the Bill, someth that the hon. Gentleman avoided with some skill. I sorry that the Secretary of State is not in the Chamb have known him for quite a long time. Last week, he c to the Select Committee with a couple of officials from Department. I have served on that Select Commi almost from the beginning. It is customary for Ministe come to the Committee with the serried ranks of inspectors who know about education and who car appealed to about education. Instead, during the whol the research into teacher shortages, one of the two offi was the only person who told us that he had n encountered low teacher morale. He was at the Sc Committee last week, and when he was asked a quest he answered it typically with a monosyllable. I think he said, "No." The other official said practically noth

There is a qualitative change in the approach education. Instead of the inspectors who know understand education, we had a couple of departme bureaucrats who wanted to talk only about money bec money is the key to what is happening.

When I heard the Secretary of State waxing ly about the high salaries that teachers are supposed to er I thought that he should contact Andrew Lloyd Webb agent, to see whether his words could be set to musi could be called, "Kenneth Clarke Superstar" or somet like that. Elaine Page could pay the role of a prima do schoolteacher, singing how joyous it is to teach 40 and how lovely to get a miserable wage and practically no morale. That is the true posiition, but Government refuse to face up to it at any cost. That be a great part of their undoing in what I hope will b not-too-distant future.

I refer now to the terms in which the Internati Labour Organisation report talks about the Bill. It pr that the Government broke international law with Teachers' Pay and Conditions Act 1987. It is no use Secretary of State arguing that the report was produce only a minor committee, because it is one of the m committees of the ILO, which itself is affiliated to the United Nations Organisation—and the report has its agreement too. It is not just a piece of paper, but a major report.

Paragraph 72 of the report states:

"The arrangements described by the Government in its communication of 4 October 1990"— yet the Secretary of State said that there had been no communication—

"do not appear to be compatible with these principles. The Government, through the Secretary of State, appears to have an absolute discretion to disregard any recommendation with which it disagrees, even if the recommendation has the full support of all parties to the negotiating process. This does not leave the 'final decision' with 'the parties'. The Government has not attempted to justify its proposals on the basis of 'compelling reasons of national economic interest.' Like the provisions of the 1987 Act, the new arrangements cannot be regarded as 'exceptional' in character or as operating only for a 'reasonable period.' Nor do they appear to provide 'adequate safeguards' to protect workers' living standards."

The following paragraph states that the Bill is really only about consultation and has nothing to do with negotiation, because whatever negotiations have taken place through whatever parties were involved, they would be disregarded, and could be disregarded, by the Secretary of State, who can then decide what the salaries of teachers should be, in his opinion.

The hon. Member for Dartford spoke about rubber stamping, but we have seen 11 years of the Conservative party being terrified by the local headmistress. Conservative Members did not dare say a word wrong, because the Prime Minister would have thrown them out. The hon. Gentleman accuses us of rubber stamping, but we saw Conservative Members crawling and grovelling to the nearly ex-Prime Minister. I emphasise that not all Conservative Members did that. Some noble souls did not grovel, but they paid the price.

The ILO points out that the Bill contravenes article 4 of convention 98, which was ratified by the present Government. The principles enunciated by the ILO are among those to which the Government are party, yet the Government are violating a convention to which they are a signatory. Despite that, the Secretary of State makes empty arguments in trying to prove that the ILO does not represent the organisation that it does. He will not go along with the convention but means to have his own way.

The Bill is really saying, "No negotiation about teachers' wages—only dictatorship." That is extremely sad for everyone connected with education—including parents, children and governors—many of whom are being given all sorts of new duties that will frighten them away. Governors will be lost, because much of the work now undertaken by local education authorities will have to be done by governors.

The Secretary of State spoke about the individual deciding his own wage, but there are no negotiations under the present system. Instead, a head can tell a teacher the wage that he will receive. Heads will be able to offer inducements—some have already done so—for teachers to opt out of national negotiations in favour of personal and private negotiations. There will then be no need for trade unions or local education authorities. in their place will be something in which the Conservative party profoundly believes—a system whereby a big stick is waved in the faces of ordinary working people, who will be told that they will receive a wage that has already been decided, with no question of any negotiation.

The ILO points out that three major aspects of the Bill violate the convention agreed by the United Nations and to which the Government were a signatory. First is the Secretary of State's power to reject any negotiated settlement with which he disagrees and to impose his own. Secondly, there is the proposal to establish a permanent body similar to the existing interim advisory committee. The third violation is the provision enabling individual LEAs and grant-maintained schools to opt out of national negotiations without establishing local negotiating machinery. Teaching staff will be left to negotiate for themselves, without any strength behind them.

This is the second time that the ILO has found the Government in breach of international law. The Government mean to force through their legislation, knowing that it violates the rules by which every other European nation abides. It is diktat rather than negotiation, which violates not only the convention that has the support of the ILO and the United Nations but the beliefs of every other European nation.

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: One of the claims often made by teachers' unions is that their members earn less than a London secretary. If there is one group of employees who are not unionised it is London secretaries, who are in a free market in negotiating their salaries. Does not the hon. Gentleman see a contradiction in the unions saying that teachers do not earn as much as London secretaries, when the latter are not unionised?

Mr. Flannery: The hon. Gentleman has some kind of vendetta against unions. That is nothing strange, because I see in their places a number of Conservative Members who share that view. However, when a complaint about the Bill was lodged with the ILO, it came not just from a union but from the World Confederation of Organs of the Teaching Profession throughout the World. The hon. Member for Pembroke (Mr. Bennett) might try to laugh that out of existence, but the Government refuse to acknowledge that education is steadily moving into crisis. That will undoubtedly help to defeat the Government, but our children are suffering in the process.

Schools are tumbling down around our ears for lack of money, and parents are worried sick about their children's education. Meanwhile, the Government have siphoned off more than £400 million this year to private education, and they will give another £200 million over the next couple of years—making a total of about £625 million of public money going into the assisted places scheme and city technology colleges.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): Does my hon. Friend agree that, although the Tories were jeering about the International Labour Organisation—which is affiliated to the United Nations, as he said—they have a different view when the Prime Minister supports the UN's attitude towards Iraq? Then they display complete and almost abject loyalty to it. However, if it does not suit them—almost within the same breath—they sneer at the UN and its affiliated bodies, as they have done tonight.

Mr. Flannery: I think that every hon. Member in the Chamber will recognise the truth of what my hon. Friend has just said. Tory Members choose what is acceptable to them about the United Nations and UNESCO, but are against anything they do with which they disagree, or which costs money. At the same time, they are taking money from our children and giving it to private education. As they know, our children are suffering. Teachers are working harder than ever and are maligned by the Conservative party, and it is no use Tory Members denying it.

[Mr. Flannery]

The convention which I mentioned and to which the Government have agreed, was formulated to protect citizens from abuse of power. Conservative Members are against UN conventions, signed by the Conservative party, which aim to protect citizens from the abuse of power.

The Government will give the Secretary of State the right arbitrarily to abuse power and to breach an international law that the Government have already signed, by passing the Bill. I do not think that any Conservative Members realise that.

I bet that no Conservative Member has the ILO report on the Bill, which is fundamental, or has read it. [Interruption.] The hon. Member for Pembroke is muttering something—if only I could hear it.

The ILO refers to the legislation as "fatally flawed because . . . the parties lack the freedom to strike their own bargain on their own terms".

It also points out that local authorities and schools that opt out of national negotiations would be obliged only to consult, rather than to negotiate with, their teachers. The ILO report continues by telling the Government to frame their legislation differently, so that it

"respects the right of the parties to the collective bargaining process to conclude, and to implement, their own agreement, and (ii) encourages and promotes the development and utilisation of collective bargaining machinery, in the manner envisaged by Article 4 of Convention No. 98"— which they have signed. That is the problem that we now face.

The Opposition think that this faulty legislation will further disrupt our educational system in many ways—God knows, it is on the verge of major disruption and none of us wants that. We want harmony in schools. We want our children to be in smaller classes. We want teachers to have reasonable wages, to be well trained and we want plenty of them. Practically all of that is non-existent in Britain at the moment.

Teachers' morale will sink even lower as a result of the Bill. Numerically, we are powerless to stop it and we can only argue against it to the best of our ability. Teachers will see through the trickery and the sleight of hand embodied in the Bill.

Conservative Members do not even seem to have read the Bill, never mind the report on it. With blind loyalty to their party, Conservative Members are pushing our children into large classes. State education is in the hands of people who do not send their children to state schools—most of them do not. I see that the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) is in the Chamber; I know that he sends his children to state schools, as he always boasts about it.

Conservative Members do not understand state education. They want to make money out of education. They are masters and mistresses of the tawdry philosophy of the market, and they want to bring it into the classroom. Our children will be in bigger classes and will not have enough teachers. Conservative Members will then start to tell us all sorts of fables about the situation and will say that it does not exist.

The Secretary of State knows very little education. I know that he is new. He is like a freshe job. He proved very clever at ruining the nationa service—wards have been closed. Now it will be no a case of wards and hospitals closing. In addition, will close and classrooms will have far too many in them. The competition that Conservatives w mean that a school in an area where working pe doing the best for their children will not come up expectations, another school in a posher area will to expectations and the first school will close.

What will the Conservatives do with all the schools, when the schools that they make into com successes are full? We have experienced this——

Mr. Nicholas Bennett rose——

Mr. Flannery: Not again, please. God bless yo honour, you are very kind.

Conservative Members do not understand wh are doing with our education system, which has be up during the best part of 150 years—[Laughter.] good laughing about it.

Whoever becomes the Tory leader—we bothered who—will have to face the cold grey political dawn, a languishing education system, a health service that is in great difficulties, and all t things that Conservative Members laugh about bu know about.

More and more teachers will opt out of the pro The Secretary of State told us that the number o applying to become teachers had increased. H Madam Deputy Speaker, when he opens his practically anything can come out—he says anyth tries to make the situation look beautiful but anyo visits schools or who talks to parents or governor that they are at their wits' end to know what to do Government's depredations on the education Children will suffer, schools will suffer, and we s even further behind competing nations.

What should the Government do? I would te but they do not need telling. They know what the to do, but are consciously refusing to do it. T answer is to restore free negotiating rights—six teachers' unions negotiating with their employers they have come to an agreement, they will be able the Secretary of State knowing that, more than will be ratified. If he does not want to ratify it, discuss with them what he thinks is wrong.

What is fundamental—this is what mak Conservatives choke on what they ought to do—i more money to education. It is the only way. Mor means more teachers, smaller classes, better schoo equipment and more books. It means all the things now need in our education system. Conservative M call it throwing money at a problem, as if they ev money at our problems. They throw money only own problems, such as Guinness. I have just outl only answer. There is no other way. This tawdr another statement to the general public t Conservatives will not change one iota, but will in the wretched manner in which they have co themselves thus far.

5.58 pm

Mr. James Pawsey (Rugby and Kenilworth): Towards the end of his speech, the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) referred to the need for more money. I wonder if he has noted an interesting omission from the list of supporters of the Opposition amendment. If he looks at the Order Paper, he will see that there is no shadow Treasury spokesman in the list. That is a clear sign of just how much Opposition Members care about our children's education. Opposition Members say that they will make improvements only as resources allow, as we have heard on so many occasions. It is clear from that omission that resources will not be allowed.

The hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) said that, during a five-year period, one in three teachers leaves the profession. At first sight that seems a fairly damning statistic, but one must understand that there are many women in the teaching profession who will get married and have children. Therefore, it is natural that a number of people should leave the profession. As we all know, they will return when their families start to grow up. Therefore, I do not share the hon. Gentleman's feelings of gloom.

I welcome the Bill, because I believe that, over time, it will help to raise teacher morale. For some years, teachers have, with some strength, complained about the loss of their negotiating rights. The Bill remedies that and, after a reasonable period of reflection, it will be welcomed by teachers, heads and others in the profession. There have been substantial consultations between the Government and teacher unions as well as with the employers—the local education authorities.

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): Consultation is not simply a matter of arranging to hear the views of another party. Consultation fails miserably when Governments fail to listen. I hope that the hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) agrees that consultation should be meaningful and should result in a recognition of real concerns and some effort being made to meet them.

Mr. Pawsey: I am pleased that I gave way to the hon. Gentleman, because I can tell him that the Government do listen. We take on board the recommendations that are made to us by various professional bodies. One can see improvements and modifications that have taken place in various Bills as a result of some of the points made to us. For example, in the Education Reform Act 1988, we adjusted the testing of seven-year-olds. Teachers said to us, quite properly, that the testing arrangements were far too bureaucratic. We took on board the points made, and we have eased the testing requirements. That is an example of how we listen.

The Bill avoids the trap of creating son of Burnham or Burnham mark 2. It does not restore the old discredited machinery which did so much to cause dissent and divide the profession. The Bill provides for negotiations between employers and teachers under an independent chairman. The Government will not be a party to those negotiations. There will be no pre-set financial limit to the negotiations.

I acknowledge quite readily that employers will be aware of the aggregate external finance that the Government will make available for local authority expenditure, and no doubt they will reach decisions in the light of those figures. A time limit, quite properly, will be set upon the negotations and in the event of no agreement being reached by the end of the time limit, something similar to the existing independent advisory committee will come into play and the Government will receive recommendations from that body.

I have made it clear in the House over a number of years that teaching is an important and honourable profession. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] I am pleased that my hon. Friends acknowledge that. Perhaps there is some significance in the fact that it was not acknowledged by Opposition Members. Perhaps they do not see the teaching profession in that way. I want teacher remuneration to reflect the true importance of the profession.

As I have said previously, teachers are not always their own best advocates. We can recall the days of action which resulted in the nation's children being sent home from school I think that we all agree that that was disgraceful, and that there can be no justification for such action. Even this year, we saw a leader of a major trade union being shouted down by his own union militants. That is not a good augury. I hope that from the legislation will emerge a better understanding and greater co-operation between teacher and legislator, for the good of the nation's children.

I said earlier that I am anxious to see teachers better remunerated. This measure will be one of the ways in which we might achieve that laudable aim.

An article in the Daily Mail referring to the education service gives the number of teachers and the number in support services. The figures suggest that, out of any 10 people on a local education authority payroll, only about six are teaching children. If that figure is true, the profession is out of balance. This matter has considerable relevance to the debate. It is a truism that one can only spend a pound once. One may spend it on either support staff or teachers. I should like to see much greater funding being made available for teachers and less for support staff. Funding for pay increases exists but it needs to find its way to the teachers in the classroom.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: There are many different sorts of non-teaching staff. Some of them within classrooms provide support for those with special needs or help the teachers when they have to cover other work in the classroom. I assume that the hon. Member does not think that such special support should be cut.

Mr. Pawsey: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman, because that enables me to refer in greater detail to the article in the Daily Mail. The article divides non-teaching staff, saying that 10 per cent. are involved in central administration, 20 per cent. in schools administration and 10 per cent. in miscellaneous duties.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): rose——

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. Does the hon. Gentleman wish to raise a point with me?

Mr. Douglas: The hon. Member for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) is reading figures from a newspaper. Is that in order?

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is perfectly in order for the hon. Gentleman to quote from any publication, and that is what he is doing.

Mr. Pawsey: I had finished the quotation. I believe that it provides the answer for the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor). It underlines my point that we should be making resources available for those who teach. Teachers require the extra money, not the bureaucrats or the others in shire hall or wherever. The money should find its way to those who teach; I hope that hon. Members will not disagree with that.

[Mr. Pawsey]

Ms. Hilary Armstrong (Durham, North-West) rose——

Mr. Pawsey: Perhaps the hon. Lady disagrees.

Ms. Armstrong: I wonder whether the hon. Gentleman would care to turn his attention to the increased number of bureaucrats at the Department of Education and Science. My understanding is that, in the past two years, that number has risen considerably, far more than in any other section of education.

Mr. Pawsey: One of the hon. Lady's hon. Friends expressed concern about the likely activities of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State. He said that he would be likely to cut the numbers involved. The hon. Lady cannot have it both ways. Either it is good to reduce numbers or it is not. I think that we have probably got it right at the Department of Education and Science.

It is interesting that the Association of County Councils said that it welcomed the proposals in the Queen's Speech to introduce an early Bill to establish permanent negotiating arrangements covering teachers' pay. It offers a general welcome to the proposed legislation and supports the restoration of direct employer-employee pay bargaining.

That brings me to a point that incurred the displeasure of the hon. Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery). I support the view that local education authorities should be allowed to negotiate rates of pay for their own teaching staff. That point was well made by my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) in his memorable speech. I know that this arrangement is unpopular with the trade unions. Their argument is that it will not increase the number of teachers. That argument was developed by the hon. Member for Blackburn. He said that, if one authority chooses to pay more money, teachers will be attracted to it from neighbouring authorities. I understand the argument, but I do not agree with it. When enacted, the Bill will encourage teachers who have left the profession to return to it.

The National Union of Teachers says that 360,000 teachers have left the teaching profession. That suggests that there is a remarkably large reservoir of teachers whom we might reach. The Bill is one way to do that; it may bring more teachers back into the profession. That would answer the shortage arguments that have been advanced. The Bill may persuade women who have left the profession to have families to return to it.

The effect of this part of the Bill will be to increase the number of teachers. Again I refer to a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford: that it is interesting that there are other professions in which shortages occur. For example, no one seriously argues that there should be a flat rate for accountants. The decision about how much accountants should get paid is left to individual employers. Given their particular conditions, they pay what they think is fair. If that is right for accountants, why is it not right for teachers? If it works for accountants, why should the same argument not apply equally to teachers?

If the Bill leads to additional funds available for teachers, I shall welcome it wi The independents decide what they pay sca They have little difficulty in encouraging tea forward. I support the view that grant-main should be able to negotiate the pay of the would then be able to respond much more weakness in their teaching forces. If that enc schools to apply for grant-maintained stat welcome it absolutely.

I said earlier that one of the effects of the increase the number of teachers. I am a teacher unions believe that the teaching prof of about 10,000 teachers. That conflicts stro Department's vacancy survey in Septembe shows that 24,000 posts were filled during th 3 September, only 1,400 posts were n interesting fact is that only three of the 104 l authorities reported a larger number of September 1990, than in January of this ye

During the past 11 years, this Admini introduced a number of substantial reforms truly effective, however, only if they are sup majority of the nation's teachers. The majo Kingdom teachers are dedicated to their pro the children in their charge. This measure which we can show our support for teach more money towards them.

6.13 pm

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): To ju happened last Thursday, it seems always to of the Liberal Democrats to be interr important announcement. The fact that the leadership ballot is about to be made allows our amendment. We submit that the deba delayed for seven days. Reference has alrea to the impact that a different leader of the party may have on the Bill. All the conte leadership of the Conservative party announcements that could have an impact o of the Bill.

Most significantly, the right hon. Memb (Mr. Heseltine) has suggested that education control should be centralised. If he were to that suggestion, there would be no point negotiating machinery that involves loc authorities and the teacher unions. In tha education authorities would not perform role. It would be more relevant to have a r Government level.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer sugge should be a separate review of teachers' pay. to conflict with the basis of the Bill. All t contenders have suggested that there should local government finance. That would lead over the opting-out proposals. One of the diff the local pay determination proposals put fo Government is that the structure of local finance does not provide the required flexib sense of local pay determination.

The Bill is based on the premise that the local education authority funding. Howev doubt. There appears to be a conflict, becaus on which the Bill has been drafted. There are many reasons, therefore, on that score alone, for saying that the Bill ought not to be debated today.

Another reason has been revealed more fully in the debate than I expected. It has become apparent that insufficient documents have been published dealing with the impact of local pay determination on teachers and on local authority finance. The Government have not explained why they are doing this and why they think that it will work. When I asked the Secretary of State for Education and Science about the Department's research, he told the House that he believed that no research had taken place on the subject. He also said that he did not believe that research would have been valid.

It is extraordinary that the Government should embark on the adventure of local pay determination without having tried to determine what the effect is likely to be on teachers' pay, teacher supply, the interaction between different local authorities and in particular the impact of richer authorities—many of them urban authorities—pushing up teacher pay levels, to the disadvantage of smaller and poorer authorities in rural areas. That is surprising, given the number of Conservative Members who represent, as I do, rural areas. I should have expected them already to be aware of the fear in rural areas about the impact of richer authorities upon smaller ones. For a variety of reasons, it is most disadvantageous that the Bill is being debated today.

Education has been labelled by all parties and all the candidates for the leadership of the Conservative party as a priority for the 1990s. It is a key issue upon which the general election is likely to be fought. It is right that that should be so. Public confidence in the Government's commitment to education is at a very low ebb. The Government's duty is to show that they are prepared to tackle the problem constructively. We have had plenty of legislation from the Government. The problem has been the lack of funding to back it up, the speed of change, poor preparation and an environment in which teachers do not trust the Government and in which schools have not the resources to cope with the demands placed on them.

The Bill cannot be accused of speed of change. We have been waiting far too long for the restoration of proper teacher pay machinery. It was suggested in December 1989 that a new structure would be in place by now but, as Liberal Democrats predicted, the present interim advisory committee has had to be extended for a further year.

Part of the reason for the low morale in the profession must be that continued uncertainty and teachers' lack of involvement in the settlement of pay and conditions. I say that with some knowledge, because I have visited more than 60 schools and talked to teachers, and that was one of the subjects that they raised. Although the Bill is overdue, and although I have considerable concerns about its details, we shall not oppose its Second Reading, not because we believe that it is adequate—we shall be looking for specific changes—but because we do not want to hold up the reintroduction of the pay machinery for teachers. I am sure that the Minister would not expect us to agree with all the Bill's provisions, but we do not believe that there would be any advantage in seeking to throw it out and to hold up for perhaps another year the introduction of negotiating machinery.

The background for my concern is teacher supply and morale. Much reference has been made to supply problems. The May 1990 report of the Select Committee on Education, Science and Arts on teacher su highlighted those problems and called for the restora of negotiating rights as soon as possible. That would to restore the status of teaching as a career, because si putting in place the machinery will not solve the su problem. As the most basic economist knows, part o problem is that pay is not sufficiently high to attrac supply, and that is particularly so in certain areas. figures have been given already, but it is extraordinary that the Government, who claim econ credibility, cannot apparently accept that simple poi

It is extraordinary to listen to Conservative Mem debate that subject. They argue that the teacher sho does not result from pay being too low, but it is also case—[Interruption.] Some news might be coming.

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East): Chancellor missed by two votes—third ballot coming

Mr. Taylor: If that is so, the question of who will b leader of the Conservative party remains unresolved. Chancellor has missed taking the leadership of the p by two votes. There will be a third ballot and the pre uncertainty will continue, not least on the future of Bill.

The point that I was seeking to make is that it is extraordinary—

Mr. Cryer: On a point of order, Madam De Speaker. As you know, a competition has been going this place for some time, in which the right hon. Me for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) got only 131 votes, Chancellor of the Exchequer 185 and the For Secretary 56. My point of order is that technically, understand it, that means a third ballot. Have you rece a statement from the Prime Minister about the candid being prevented from using Government facilities f party political matter? That is very important, because taxpayer does not want to finance these quarrels in Tory party.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I seem to have been this before—rather like last week. The hon. Member Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) is a little late this wee giving us the result, which we already know. I have ha message from the Prime Minister or from any o member of the Government. The hon. Member for T (Mr. Taylor) has the Floor.

Mr. Taylor: I am delighted that I got there first.

The point that I am trying to make is that Conserva Members, having denied the problem, argued that l pay determination, which would allow flexibility increase pay in certain cases, would solve the proble teacher supply. They tried to face both ways at the s time.

I referred in previous debates to the problems Cornwall, which are not typical. In many ways, we ar a better position than many authorities, but there has b a decline in applications for many posts, although qua has not been perceptibly affected. There has been s decline in applications for primary headship. I h quoted previously from local head teachers who wrot me about the problems that they have experienced, suc the work load becoming insurmountable, people be tired, under extreme stress and losing much enthusia One head teacher said:

[Mr. Taylor]

"I have a good many years left to give to education, but my enthusiasm for teaching cannot go on indefinitely".

Another wrote:

"Morale in my school is at an all-time low and deteriorating."

Four teachers wrote to me about the problems of morale in their schools, and subsequent to writing to me, two have withdrawn from the profession. They have acted on the problems that they highlighted. [Interruption.] I want to keep the Chamber informed. I understand that the former Defence Secretary, the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), is not continuing.

Madame Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman might continue with the proposed legislation before us. If hon. Members are interested, the news is awaiting them outside—or they can approach the Chair.

Mr. Brian Wilson (Cunninghame, North): On a point of order, Madam Deputy Speaker. I do not wish to intervene in the debate, but in the light of the developments, is it possible to arrange, at the earlier possible moment, for a statement to be made? We have been clearly led to believe that there is a prospect of change to the poll tax. If there is to be a change of leadership, may we have the earliest possible statement on what one hopes will be plans for the abolition of the poll tax?

Madam Deputy Speaker: If an application for a statement is made to Mr. Speaker, he will ensure that it is dealt with as early as possible.

Mr. Taylor: I hope that you will accept, Madam Deputy Speaker, that this is not the easiest speech to make.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. Gentleman is doing very well in very difficult circumstances. Perhaps the House would show a little tolerance and allow him to make his case.

Mr. Taylor: Naturally, Madam Deputy Speaker, you are allowing me to do so.

The Bill will do little to tackle the morale problem, which is crucial to the supply crisis, not least because teachers are too sceptical about the Conservative party's commitment to teachers to believe that the new pay machinery will lead to better pay. They have reasons for expressing those doubts. First, to correct that problem, the Bill should have included a commitment to a general teaching council, which could do much to put right many of the problems within the profession, not least the recognition of the professionalism of teachers.

Secondly, we cannot talk pay unless we talk quality. Morale would be given a boost if the quality and contribution of good teachers were recognised, and for that, among other things, we need a nationally funded framework of teacher appraisal. I hope that the Minister will explain the Secretary of State's position on appraisal. The previous Secretary of State had decided not to implement it on the grounds of cost. The Times suggested that the present Secretary of State is planning to introduce compulsory teacher appraisal, but without paying the cost. Will the Minister confirm that? It is despicable that that burden should be placed on local authorities.

It is sad for continuity of policy when major decisions such as this appear to be subject not to the advice of those who know but to the whim of passing Secretaries of State for Education and Science. If the Secretary of S on in a subsequent reshuffle, can we expect change of approach on appraisal? The issue is mess. Low morale should come as no surpris

I have some points of specific concern. I h dealt in some measure with the opt-out provisi lack of explanation about their effects. Those are the Bill's major flaw. On the face of it purpose is to establish a national system of nego the opt-out provisions appear to run entirely that. If the Secretary of State was right when he would like all schools ultimately to opt national negotiations, it would appear that w offered a false prospectus and that this is negotiating procedure. It is an interim pay procedure while the Government wait for all t GMSs to opt out.

If the Government provide for LEAs to op does not invite great confidence in the negotiations. As I said, there is no documentat case, the IAC has only just introduced greate for local pay variations within a national Surely that should be given a chance to work that we can gain some idea of its impact before much bigger step.

Opting out appears to result in more proble areas and schools. Deprived areas could suffer it. There will be greater regional variations, at the local government finance system as it no although things would be different if there flexibility. It is peculiar that, on the one Government are trying to continue their reig over teachers' pay and conditions nationally other, they are allowing an under-the-door opt- to operate which could leave Ministers with problems over which they say they now need control. Despite their protestations to the con will not have that control.

The advisory committee could have a stro play, but not if that role is as restricted as Minis Two points stand out. First, if reference i negotiations, even if they were not completed, t be a requirement to start from the stage reach negotiations, rather than from a blank shee Secondly, we are told that the advisory commi will be set entirely by the Secretary of State. that committee be able to look at wider issues, supply of teachers and their pay and condition

The advisory committee could make gene mendations about education problems without having been directed by the Secretary of Stat impossible to imagine that the Secretary of Sta want to hear the kind of advice that is forthco an independent advisory committee, any more wanted to hear some of the IAC's advice. Thi Secretary of State did not accept its recommen full, and implementation was phased in. The sta for this machinery will therefore be substanti than it needs to be.

That is the Liberal Democrats' position on t Government will get our support, albeit reservations. We shall certainly not continue th unless the matters that I have addressed are de Committee and on Report.

Mr. Dick Douglas (Dunfermline, West): On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I waited respectfully until the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) finished his speech rather than interject on a Member as I did last week. Although we have had the result of the ballot for the Conservative party leadership, we may be in a state of suspended animation. My understanding is that we have a Prime Minister-in-waiting and that the Chancellor of the Exchequer will become Prime Minister.

I apologise for intervening. I know that this Bill applies solely to English and Welsh Members, but the impact of what has happened outside the Chamber is of enormous importance to the people of Scotland. More than 1 million warrants have been issued by local authorities, the majority by Labour authorities. We are in the position——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): Order. I find it difficult to know what the point of order for the Chair is.

Mr. Douglas: Let me briefly develop my point of order. Mr. Deputy Speaker. Those warrants were issued by local authorities on the basis of a law, but there is no majority in the House to enforce that law. If the poll tax issue were put before the House, the legislation would not get a vote. People like me are being pursued——

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I cannot allow the hon. Member to make a speech in the middle of a debate. If he has a point of order for the Chair, I shall deal with it.

Mr. Douglas: The Prime Minister-in-waiting should come immediately to the House to explain the position and to state clearly that no one, particularly in Scotland, will be put in jeopardy. That law which is being applied by local authorities has no support anywhere in the House. If it is enforced, the law will be brought into disrepute.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: No doubt the House of Commons will deal with these matters in the coming days in the appropriate manner.

6.36 pm

Mr. John Marshall (Hendon, South): I should like, as one of the Members for Barnet, on behalf of myself, my hon. Friends the Members for Chipping Barnet (Mr. Chapman) and for Hendon, North (Mr. Gorst) and all the people of Barnet, to thank my right hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) for all the work that she did for the London borough of Barnet and for the distinction that she brought to the borough over a long period. We in the borough are glad that my right hon. Friend made it clear this afternoon that she would stay in the House as a Back Bencher, working for the people of Barnet as she has done since 1959. I assure the House that there was great sadness throughout the borough last Thursday. As someone said to me at church on Sunday, it was as if a family funeral had taken place.

As one who voted for my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major), I should like to say how much I welcome the result of the ballot which, I understand, was declared in Room 14 a few minutes ago. My right hon. Friend has a breadth of experience in the Treasury, the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and the Department of Social Security, which will make him an excellent Prime Minister.

I said at the beginning of my speech that I was speaking on behalf of the residents of the London borough of Barnet. Of course, I am proud to represent a Ba constituency. The House must remember that borough has the best examination results of any l authority in England. Every day, 2,000 pupils leave socialist paradise of Brent to be educated in Ba because they recognise that standards in Barnet are superior to those in the neighbouring local authoritie

It was absolute nonsense for the hon. Member Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) to say standards in education are a function of expenditure. spend far less in Barnet than, for example, the unlame Inner London education authority spent, but we get m better results. That is because we do not waste money bureaucracy, or on race advisers or sex advisers; we the emphasis on standards.

I welcome the stress that the Government have lai the pay discussions on the need for more flexibility in salary system. For far too long, education was a victi national pay scales, which ignored huge regi differences in living costs, and also ignored the fact that existence of "shortage subjects" was not an argument raising the pay of, for example, sociology teachers. must recognise that those who can teach moc languages can also become interpreters or translat while those who can teach computing can move to world of industry to work as computer operators. I am sure that there is quite such a long queue of people wan to employ sociologists as there is of people seek potential teachers of modern languages, physics, chemi or computing.

The most important aspect, however, is the h regional variation in house prices. According to Nationwide Anglia building society, the average se detached house in the Greater London area sells £106,421. In the north, the average price is £46,860. Yorkshire and Humberside, it is £54,069; in glorious, le East Anglia it is £56,550; in the north-west, it is £55,1 and in the west midlands it is £56,421.

Mr. Fatchett: What was the London price?

Mr. Marshall: The London price is £106,421. T figures were provided in the Nationwide Anglia's la survey.

Teachers know that, if they move out of London, t can buy much better houses and enjoy a much be standard of living. It is not unknown for teach occupying positions of responsibility in the Lond borough of Barnet to decide to sell up and move to north. They are willing to accept positions that do necessarily carry the same responsibility, and even become supply teachers, because they know that eventual result of the equation will be in their favour.

There is no doubt that the current London weight allowances are entirely inadequate. I am told by Library that the monthly post-tax cost of a £30,0 repayment mortgage is £269·70 a month, while monthly net cost for a London teacher who must take a £60,000 mortgage is £675. That is a monthly difference about £405, or £4,863 annually. The inner Lond weighting allowance is £1,500, with a potential discreti ary addition of £750—perhaps £2,250 a year, or £1,7 after tax. The allowances simply do not take account of huge difference between housing costs in the south-e and those elsewhere, or of the other high costs that involved.

[Mr. Marshall]

There is a further illogicality in the relationship between inner and outer London allowances. Outer London teachers receive allowances of only £984, which is not nearly enough to cover the huge extra housing costs that they incur. Then there is the complete anomaly of teachers in Barnet being paid less than those in Brent, Haringey, Merton and Ealing. How can that encourage recruitment in Barnet? Teachers know that they need only pop over the border to Brent to receive perhaps another £1,266 a year; alternatively, they can go to the people's republic of Haringey—although I can see why some may not wish to do so—and receive the same amount. It is a crazy system, and the sooner that local authorities are allowed to opt out and receive localised pay rates that take account of localised costs and the localised labour market, the better the position will be.

Listening to the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw), one sensed that the gramophone needle had stuck in a groove. The hon. Gentleman ought to be told that a speech need not be interminable to be immortal. He got it entirely wrong when he said that opting out would divide the teaching profession; let me say to him and to the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) that the present system does that. There is a north-south divide, which means that teachers in the north are, in real terms, enjoying much better living standards than those in the south. That can only aggravate the problem in the south, and cause significant localised shortages in the near term, unless the Bill is passed.

Certain individuals have suggested that teachers' salaries should be paid centrally, by the Exchequer—[Interruption.] The notes are here; the speech will be delivered.

I believe that that would be a retrograde step—and I wrote that before the holding of today's ballot. The central payment of teachers' salaries would mean more central control. We cannot operate a system whereby spending decisions are made locally and then financed centrally: that is a recipe for inefficiency and high spending. Central payment must mean central control.

The hon. Member for Durham, North-West (Ms. Armstrong) spoke of the extent of bureaucracy in the DES. Let me warn the House that, if teachers' salaries are ever paid centrally, that bureaucracy will multiply by a factor of four, five or six. I do not want to see the DES telling the London borough of Barnet how many teachers it should have in each school, but that would be the inevitable result of such a system.

Various comments have been made about the status of teachers. I pay tribute to their work, especially in local authority schools: I am sorry that the hon. Member for Hillsborough is not present to hear me say—as I am proud to—that both my children are being educated in such schools. I believe that our schools in Barnet are very good, and I am pleased to be able to send my sons to two of them. I have great admiration for teachers—and, indeed, a great deal of sympathy; anyone who has to look after my sons for eight hours a day is ever deserving of sympathy, and of a good salary.

Status, however, is something that teachers themselves must play a part in achieving. We in Barnet remember all the one-day strikes in the mid-1980s. We remember that the teachers' unions decided to concentrate on the borough because it was represented by the
What a terrible situation: young children as pawns in a political game by a trade u the politics not of a profession, but of a b are more akin to those of Arthur Scargill a profession seeking public recognition.
unions want to be recognised as member they should behave as such, rather than be boys.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: Will the hon. way?

Mr. Marshall: Is the hon. Gentleman t intelligent comment? If so, I shall give w

Mr. Campbell: The Tory party, Government, should let the teachers increase for which they have been asking should treat teachers like professionals, a money that they asking for.

Mr. Marshall: The hon. Gentleman's to be, "Give him the money, Barney," wh of Wilfred Pickles. It is rather rum to representative of a party that, for six teachers' pay to go up by 6 per cen compared with the 30 per cent. rise in real Government. This Government have bee more pay; the previous Labour Governm absurd for the hon. Gentleman to hypocritical comment.

In a debate on teachers' pay, one m quality of teaching in our schools. Opp have made some remarkable comment about the schools that they want to see. T for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) wh has demonstrated his interest in educatio for most of the debate, said that a new college was being set up in Nottingham the Government for setting up that ne would benefit his constitutents. How ma would come to the House to con Government were funding a new constituency? If the hon. Gentleman rea the school, I beseech my hon. Friend the the money away from Nottingham and to where we should say, "Thank you very Opposition Members do not believe diversity and choice in education. They CTCs although they are nice, new sc popular with teachers and with pupils, a education that is relevant to the needs would befall those schools under a Labo Closure.

A Labour Government would get rid grammar schools because it is a long-l Labour party that grammar schools are would get rid of them despite the fact tha excellent academic achievements, and authorities and the parents want to kee regained power, the Labour party would grant-maintained schools, which are d job.

I must tell the Labour party that, wh Friend the Leader of the House, who w of State for Education and Science, visite which was the first grant-maintained school in London, a member of the teaching staff approached him. He said, "Secretary of State, I must say to you that I am a member of the Labour party." I wondered what would happen next. The teacher then said, "I must also tell you, Secretary of State, that the best thing that has happened to this school is it becoming a grant-maintained school." I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister, who has recently visited that school, will confirm that it is a first-rate school. Three years ago, it was heavily undersubscribed; now, as a grant-maintained school, it is fully subscribed. The gauleiters of the Opposition say that such schools should not be allowed to continue.

The Labour party boasts that it would abolish the assisted places scheme. What does the assisted places scheme do? It allows bright children whose parents have a low income to go to independent schools. The Labour party would attack bright children from low-income families, and that is how it would appeal to social groups C2, D and E. The Labour party would tell such families that their children could not go to public schools under the assisted places scheme.

The Labour party wants only to get rid of the schools that are popular and successful, and that have high standards, in the names of mediocrity and of socialism. Labour Members want to become the Henry Fords of education and to be able to say, "You can go to any school provided it is the local area comprehensive school." I believe in parental choice, and in quality and standards in education. The Government and the Bill are the only means by which to ensure that that choice and those standards are maintained.

6.53 pm

Mr. Gerry Steinberg (City of Durham): I will try to keep to the subject of the debate—unlike the previous speaker, the hon. Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall), who has spoken about anything but the Bill.

In this Chamber two weeks ago, I welcomed the Government's proposal for a Bill to give back negotiating rights to teachers. However, I also told the House that I suspected that there would be a sting in the tail, and I think that my hunch was about right. I had hoped that the Bill would finally establish acceptable and permanent negotiating arrangements for teachers' pay, duties and conditions of service. Yet again, the Government have failed to make any significant moves towards the introduction of a system that is satisfactory both to the teachers and to their employers, and which could replace the supposedly temporary system established by the Teachers' Pay and Conditions Act 1987.

There is now an acute shortage of teachers. Despite what the Secretary of State and Conservative Members say, it is a direct result, first, of the erosion of pay caused by the absence of free, national-level collective bargaining since 1987; secondly, of the vastly increased burden of unrewarded work and responsibility, which are the consequences of changes to the teaching service structure; and, thirdly, of low morale among teachers, which is the consequence of the other two factors.

I went for a cup of tea 20 minutes ago, having been here since 2.30 pm, and I picked up the Evening Standard. Lo and behold, the first article in the Evening Standard that I read was headlined, "'1600 teachers leave London'". The article continued:

"London's teacher shortage crisis is getting worse.

A new survey claims nearly 1600 staff have left sc London in the past two months, and the problem is s hitting the education of tens of thousands of pupils.

And according to the Thames TV News repo schools have not had a full-time teacher for up months.

The Department of Education declined to comm this report confirms the survey published by the Standard on 5 November disclosing that Britain's lack 10,105 staff, not the 1400 admitted by the Gov

Fed-up teachers in the survey blame poor pay status for the exodus, despite the Government's mult pound recruitment campaign."

That reiterates what the Labour party has been sa the past two, three or four years.

The proposals for new negotiating machin teachers' pay and conditions of service yet again conform to the requirements of international conv and the breach has now been compounded. Thi second time the International Labour Organisat found the Government to be in breach of internati in their handling of teachers' negotiating right 1987, the Government have imposed amended co of service on teachers, they have put cash limits o increases and they have extended the operation of t Act beyond its expected expiry date.

Teachers' pay has been deliberately depressed i years by the use of cash limits. Restricting th increase to an average for white-collar employees even restore teachers to their position of four years alone produce proper levels of pay for the professi no one say anything other than that pay is cr recruitment and to the retention of teachers, whic most important factor that we are discussing t repeat what I said to the Secretary of State some tw ago. Evidence shows that teachers are now wo compared both with the rate of inflation and wi non-manual counterparts than they were when the advisory committee was established.

In the new proposals, there are three brea conformity, as set out by the ILO. The proposal negotiation of terms and conditions between em and teachers under an independent chairman condition attached to it. The Secretary of State power to reject any negotiated settlement with w disagrees, and to impose an alternative. He has an a power of discretion even though all negotiating may agree with the recommendations.

The Bill makes nonsense of the concept negotiation by retaining almost total powe responsibility with the Secretary of State and by a the negotiating body and even the so-called a committee to be overruled. At a time of severe shortage, whatever the Secretary of State may say recruitment and retention of teachers is crucial, an morale in the profession is at an all-time low, the undermine education even more. The negotiators be left free to finalise and implement their own agre

Secondly, disagreements which are not resolved the prescribed deadline may be referred b Government to a statutory independent a committee. The establishment of a permanent body to the existing interim advisory committee is the breach of conformity. The proposed permanent a committee, like the existing body, will be obli consult the relevant parties and will be empowe make recommendations to the Secretary of State, w retain the right to accept, modify or reject those recommendations as he sees fit. As far as I can see, that is no improvement on the present system.

[Mr. Gerry Steinberg]

Although it is true that reference to the new committee must be preceded by an attempt to resolve differences by collective bargaining, that in itself does not convert the committee phase into a process of collective bargaining. Both the negotiations and the committee phase are, as the ILO said:

"fatally flawed because in both instances the parties lack the freedom to strike their own bargain on their own terms."

It must certainly be possible to impose restrictions on the bargaining process when lengthy deadlocks ensue, but that is not to say that there should be a mechanism to infringe the autonomy of the bargaining process.

While I welcome efforts to restore direct employer-employee bargaining on pay, duties and conditions, the Government have failed to meet the requirement to put collective bargaining arrangements in place. The proposals for time-limited negotiations will serve their purpose only if the limits are not so short as to curtail productive negotiation, since that would allow the Secretary of State to exercise his overriding powers.

The third breach is represented by the provisions enabling education authorities and grant-maintained schools to opt out of national negotiations without establishing local negotiating machinery. Local education authorities or the governing bodies of publicly funded schools would be permitted to apply to the Secretary of State for permission to opt out of the national framework and to determine the pay and conditions of their teachers at a local level and at local rates. Some authorities could then conceivably pay more than others under different conditions of employment. All of this is to be done at a time of grave teacher shortages, and a glorious game of leapfrog would become the order of the day.

Teachers would be attracted to the places where pay and conditions were the best, leaving gaps that could not be filled because there would be no one left to fill them. Authorities whose teachers were attracted away could only react by increasing pay and improving conditions, thus contributing to the spiral.

Before anyone imagines that the opted-out authorities would offer all the prizes, it should be remembered that there is one back in the leapfrog game that will bring everyone down. Local authorities are required by the Government to control their spending. Where are they to raise the cash to make higher settlements than the nationally agreed figure? They will not be able to, so they will not—or, if they do, capping will follow.

The purpose of this Bill must be to keep teachers' pay low and thus continue to contribute to decline in the profession. The freedom to arrive at local settlements can only mean the freedom to arrive at low settlements, and that is not what education needs.

After opting out, all future pay and conditions settlements would be free from any control and subject only to certain restrictions on changes in pay within the first year and to the general obligation on local education authorities to consult governing bodies and teachers before implementing proposals for changes in local pay and conditions. So the Government are proposing not only that employing authorities should opt out of national collective bargaining but that they should opt out of any form of collective bargaining. This free-for-all outside a common framework may lead to overbidding, instability among teaching staff and an avoidable pay inflation, while not profiting the education service in general. That is hardly in line with the Government's obligation to promote voluntary negotiations between employers and employees.

Clause 9 allows grant-maintained schools to do their own thing. That may mean higher settlements by schools which attract additional funds. If so, the best teachers in an area could be enticed into the rich opted-out school, leaving others with the problems of replacing them. That is a device to fool people into thinking that grant-maintained means better when it does not, but we are not fooled—parents will not be fooled, and nor will teachers. The rich will be much richer while the rest will suffer.

The intake to teacher training courses is at an all-time low—[Interruption.]—regardless of the figures that the Department may pass in little notes to the Minister. Resignations from the profession continue in numbers that have a harmful effect on education, and the six teacher associations' survey recently revealed that the number of vacancies was at least double the Government's estimate—and it is even worse this year.

Despite the continuing trend of graduates away from teacher training, the Government persist in doing no more than tinkering at the edges. Other employers try to attract graduates with sensible starting salaries and career development plans. With such opportunities, it is no wonder that graduates are not coming into teaching.

In a profession in which low morale is widespread, the effects of measures perceived as divisive and unfair cannot be underestimated. A free-market auction of teachers held by competing authorities and governing bodies is potentially disastrous. The Government are acting contrary to the conventions that they have agreed. They must not continue to breach conventions that they have ratified and which were designed to promote and encourage voluntary negotiations to bring about mutually accepted agreement.

Without a truly independent negotiating machinery, the teaching profession will continue to degenerate. Without a large increase in salary to make teaching attractive, that degeneration will become indelible. For the sake of all our children we must now deal with the main issues—recruitment and retention of teachers. That would enhance educational standards and recognise that the nation's future is in our schools. We need a commitment to a true negotiating system, in which teachers and their employers can arrive at what is best for education.

7.7 pm

Mr. Steve Norris (Epping Forest): I extend a warm welcome to the Bill, which fulfils the long-standing obligation to replace the Burnham machinery, which was inadequate for the negotiation of teachers' pay. The Government have fulfilled that obligation in a creative way, which will in due course commend itself to the whole House and to the teaching profession. Behind the Bill lies the desire to enhance the status of teachers in the community—a desire that will be shared on both sides of the House. This is the right way to proceed.

Contrary to the opinion expressed by the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw)—I am sorry that he is not in his place now—the Education Reform Act 1988, which was so derided during its passage by all sorts of vested interests and by the Opposition, has become, only two years into its operation, accepted on all sides as having advanced education.

I accept that there are the occasional dinosaurs on the Opposition Benches on whom any development will take a few decades to make an impact. Increasingly, those left of centre in politics in this country are beginning to realise that concepts such as attainment testing, the national curriculum and even grant-maintained schools are the germs of progress in education. I accept that we cannot starve an education service and that it would be rank hypocrisy to hide behind the argument that all was structure and resources were nothing. Neither side of the House has fallen for that argument.

Before the Education Reform Act 1988, a commitment to quality, standards and diversity was missing. Improvements in quality arose as a result of the enhancement of choice that the Education Reform Act made available.

Mr. Fatchett: When the Education Reform Bill was published, the Conservative party had a lead over the Labour party on education issues in virtually all the opinion polls. Why, two years after the enactment of the Bill, does the Labour party have a 30 per cent. lead in all opinion polls on education issues? What is the reason for that difference?

Mr. Norris: Having been told by various pollsters that my party's deficit in the polls has been wiped out by the intervention of my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), who in a week has achieved that as well as the reform of the community charge, I am rather sceptical of reaching any conclusions from polls.

However, when the Education Reform Bill was before the House, many people in education derided the proposals from a sectional standpoint which I did not share. Since then, many of those people, perhaps rather more quietly—we can understand why—have come to recognise how much good the Education Reform Bill contained.

I want to refer to a point raised by my hon. Friends the Members for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) and for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall). They referred to clauses 8 and 9, which throw a lifeline to areas like mine. Such a lifeline has been sorely needed and I have written to my hon. Friend the Minister and many of his predecessors about it.

There is no conflict between the two interventions that I made earlier. In my constituency, the history of vacancies was made much of by Labour party representatives. They sought to fan all sorts of fears among parents, which were subsequently not realised in 1989 or this year. That was a terrible shame for parents, who naturally become disturbed when they are told, apparently by authoritative sources, that there is a prospect that their children will not be able to go to school or will be sent home from school. I received goodness knows how many letters as a result of that scare.

Fortunately, those parents were worried for nothing and they did not have to suffer that experience. That was an incredibly cynical exploitation of the perfectly valid concerns of parents. They were put under pressure in order to make a cheap political point, which frankly did not carry much weight.

In response to the interesting patois intervention by the hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Steinberg), it is true that we do not get enough candidates of quality on our shortlists. We often get only one candidate, and I would be the first to agree with the hon. Gentleman that that is unsatisfactory. Equally, although we have only a handful of unfilled posts, too many have not been filled by permanent staff, and I agree that that is a less than satisfactory way for children to be taught. Clearly we must look at the way in which teachers are attracted to my part of the world.

I have always thought that the logic of differential pay and geographical variations in pay is absolutely irrefutable. My hon. Friend the Member for Dartford referred to what he called a centrist newspaper entitled The Daily Telegraph. I recall an interesting article by Bernard Levin in what must be a left-wing rag called The Times. That article was about a dispute involving Post Office workers, in which local pay bargaining was the central issue.

If I recall correctly, Mr. Allan Tuffin raised that issue after it has been suggested that particular payments were being made to postmen who lived in London. He was concerned that those payments should be made available throughout the country. I recall Bernard Levin writing, in what seemed to be a perfectly logical way, that, although he felt that a trade union leader had a perfectly natural obligation to try to secure the best deal for his members —and if that meant that he could secure money for people living in less expensive parts of the country, why should he not do that?—if a postman in Grimsby was paid the same as a postman in Chelsea, either one was being overpaid, or more likely the other was being underpaid.

In what was always called "the real world"—I hate to use that expression—there cannot be the slightest doubt that living costs differ substantially around the country. It is asinine not to recognise that that will have a huge influence on the attractiveness of public sector posts.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South referred to housing costs. In my constituency, one cannot buy a one-bedroom flat for under £55,000. I was once told that mine is the second most expensive constituency in the country. My hon. Friend the Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), who kindly assisted me in 1988 during my fraught experience of a by-election which is fast becoming a legend in this Parliament because we won it, will recall that it is considered normal that houses in my constituency cost £100,000 a bedroom once we move up the scale to ordinary three and four-bedroom houses.

Unlike many other professions, there is no particular reason why a teacher should wish to come to work in my high-cost area instead of working elsewhere. There is often a distinct reason why people gravitate to London—because that is where their head office is located, and they want promotion and larger salaries. They obviously accept that they will have to pay more for housing. One of the particular features of teaching is that a teacher can get to the top of his or her tree as easily in Northamptonshire, rural Essex or Lancashire as in central London or in the expensive part of Essex that I represent. It is doubly important that we counter a huge natural disincentive to people to come to teach in high-cost areas.

As part of the bedrock of this argument, I want to make an important point. It does not matter what salary we start with or whatever the national salary is—be it adequate or inadequate—there will still be an incentive for people to move to areas where their money buys them a great deal more. We find that problem not only in teaching, but in other public sector appointments in my constituency, and I look forward to clauses 8 and 9 addressing it.

[Mr. Norris]

As I endeavoured to say in an intervention during the speech by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State, I hope that my local education authority will not hesitate to use the provisions of clause 8. I accept that that may mean that community charge payers have to make a greater contribution to teachers' salaries. I believe that my constituents would generally accept that that was the quid pro quo of being fortunate enough to live in one of the most expensive and wealthy districts in the country. I think that they would accept that they can afford to pay teachers enough to attract the quality of teachers that my constituents—and other hon. Members' constituents—deserve.

Mr. Steinberg: I have listened carefully to the hon. Gentleman's argument. Is he trying to say that he believes that, by giving local education authorities the right to negotiate, the difference in pay that teachers will receive will be the same as the cost involved in somebody moving from my district of the country, Durham, to the hon. Gentleman's, Epping Forest? Is he saying that the amount of extra salary they receive will compensate for the move? Does he not feel that it would be better for local authorities to be given the right or the power to finalise a system taking into account housing costs, and so give an incentive? Does the hon. Gentleman believe that local authorities will pay teachers enough to compensate for the huge difference in housing costs?

Mr. Norris: I entirely agree with the hon. Gentleman that all the scales of difference available to us understate the actual difference in housing costs—for example, between his district and mine. I do not disguise the fact that local education authorities in regions such as mine are unlikely to be able to go the whole way to compensate for differences in housing costs. That was a point made by my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall).

Inner London weighting is set at £1,500, which, if one already had a mortgage of £30,000 and so was not eligible for more tax relief would, after tax, amount to an ability to borrow another £10,000 to put towards a more expensive house. If interest rates were at 0·5 per cent., that weighting might give £20,000 but would come nowhere near the £100,000 or so necessary to compensate for moving from the constituency of the hon. Member for City of Durham (Mr. Steinberg) to mine.

I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for his concern on behalf of the electors of Epping Forest, which I shall convey to them. I invite the hon. Gentleman to come with me and see what a delightful place it is—perhaps he might contemplate the economics of such a move.

London allowances are of real concern, not just to my hon. Friend the Member for Hendon, South to whom I am grateful for raising the subject and so allowing my hon. Friend the Minister to see that it is not just a single constituency issue. The fringe allowance to which my constituency teachers are entitled will, from 1 July 1989, be the magnificent sum of £384. The irony is that it is a sum paid regardless of grade; it is almost insignificant in terms of its purchasing power in the context of regional costs. It is particularly galling when compared with an outer London weighting of £984—a full £600 more—and an inner London weighting of £1,500.

The reality is that teachers who live in my constituency can often travel shorter journeys to work when they happen to work in one of the London boroughs and, if that borough adds the London supplement of £750, earn more than £1,000 a year more than in my district. I accept that there will always be boundaries and that, close to metropolitan districts, those boundaries occasionally look a bit capricious. I understand that; such anomalies will always exist. I am sure that all hon. Members with experience of metropolitan constituencies know that.

I am worried that, when calculating the weighting allowance, there is an assumption that cost in a major city such as London is based on the bull's eye principle that costs are highest in the centre and become lower as one goes further out. That may be true between Belgravia and the wilds of the countryside, but it is not true for London, throughout which there are pockets of high and low cost.

When my hon. Friend the Minister considers weighting, I urge him to use a more sophisticated formula than that currently used, so that it allows for a much more general recognition of high cost where that is clearly appropriate, as it obviously is in my constituency. If we received the inner London weighting of £1,500, rather than our fringe allowances of £834, the difference would not go a quarter of the way towards compensating for the differential housing costs to which I referred.

In giving the warmest approval to the measure, I urge my right hon. and learned Friend to look with sympathy at allowances, particularly London allowances. I urge him not to impede the progress of grant-maintained schools or local authorities towards taking control of their local pay arrangements. I believe that clauses 8 and 9 throw my constituents a lifeline which is of considerable importance for the education of children in my constituency.

7.26 pm

Mr. Dennis Turner (Wolverhampton, South-East): I commend to the hon. Member for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris) the Select Committee's report on teacher shortages. It took us more than 12 months to produce the document, within which he will find a list of recommendations dealing with London and outer London allowances, housing costs, additional responsibility allowances and a range of proposals.

The Government do not seem to have taken sufficient account of that report. That certainly appeared to be the case when the Secretary of State advanced the Government's argument earlier and spoke of teacher recruitment, retention and the other major problems identified in the report, on which the ink is still not dry. For the Government to say that there has been so much progress during such a short period leaves a little doubt in my mind as to whether they are using an element of exaggeration and deceit about the present state of education.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): There may well be an element of exaggeration, but if the hon. Gentleman looks at the statistics for Devon he will see that this January there were 166 vacancies for teachers there, and in September the number had been reduced to just 16.

Mr. Turner: I am pleased to hear that information, although the same is not true across the whole country. However, like the hon. Gentleman, I am pleassed if there is an improvement in recruitment in Devon and join him in rejoicing in the fact that progress is being made.

I am saddened by this debate and by the Bill. In the Select Committee we made proposals which we thought that the Secretary of State might reject. Some Government supporters in the Select Committee expended energy on recommendations that they felt should be followed. When we learned that the former Secretary of State for Education and Science was to recommend a new pay and conditions organisation, we made clear recommendations in our Select Committee report.

I was full of hope that the Bill would contain a proper negotiating procedure for teachers. Although the interim advisory committee made sound recommendations on many matters, it has been criticised since 1987 because those recommendations were always curtailed by the Government's cash limits and could not adequately and properly respond to the teachers.

There are four basic objections to the proposed negotiating machinery. First, the proposal allows local education authorities and grant-maintained schools to opt out of national pay negotiations. In effect, they can pay teachers local rates. That is unacceptable for a national education service at any time, but at this time of crisis in the supply of teachers it is completely impracticable.

Secondly, the Secretary of State's reserve powers to override or refer back decisions of the negotiating committee are not compatible with free collective bargaining. We have heard that the International Labour Organisation and a committee of the United Nations have heavily criticised the Government for that aspect of the legislation. I do not want to go over that ground again. The machinery in the Bill is unsatisfactory for resolving disputes in the negotiating committee. It contains no provision for arbitration, and that is an important issue in all free negotiations.

The Government propose to move on from the interim advisory committee, and they should at least have carried the teachers' organisations with them. It is sad that the Government have failed miserably to satisfy the very people to whom they wanted to respond positively. The Secretary of State said that the proposals had the support of the teachers' organisations. We know that the National Union of Teachers is totally opposed to the Government's proposal for national negotiations.

Hon. Members have no doubt received from the Assistant Masters and Mistresses Association a document which states:

> "New procedures and powers in the Bill for the local determination of teachers' pay and conditions of employment are at the least ill-judged and premature, and the reserve powers accruing to the Secretary of State are so excessive as to jeopardise the success of negotiating machinery established under the Bill."

The association recommends that hon. Members oppose the Bill and ask the Government to go back to the drawing board and bring in a Bill allowing teachers free negotiations. That would take our education service forward into the 1990s and give us tranquillity and progress.

The Government should encourage everyone in education to work together to meet the needs of our communities. Even at this late stage, I ask the Minister not to run into great opposition with all the teachers' organisations even before the Bill becomes an Act. He should have another look at it and try to get legislation that everyone can work in the interests of our children and our future.

7.34 pm

Mr. Ken Hargreaves (Hyndburn): I welcome the opportunity to make a brief speech. Last December, when the motion on teachers' pay and conditions was debated, I expressed my disappointment and displeasure at the fact that it had not been possible in the three years allowed to set up a new negotiating body for teachers' pay and conditions. That regrettable delay in setting up such machinery has been to the detriment of teachers.

This morning, I attended the presentation of the national schools curriculum awards at which the chairman, Sir Geoffrey Chandler, told a large audience that teaching was the most important occupation, a fact which he said we had succeeded in disguising from ourselves for some time. I totally agree. The future of our country depends upon the quality of the education and training received by our young people, and the best quality will be provided only if teachers themselves are of the highest quality. That was acknowledged in the Green Paper, where it was recognised that the new teachers' pay determination machinery should be designed to provide settlements that pay due regard to the need to recruit, retain and motivate sufficient teachers of the right quality.

I visited almost every school in my constituency during the summer recess and I am convinced that, generally speaking, Hyndburn has high-quality teachers. My concern is that we may not retain them unless we give greater priority to education and to teachers. We should all beware of politicians who promise to spend more on everything—on the health service, on roads and on overseas aid. That is impossible, but politicians can re-order priorities, and now is the time to do so. Education and training must be at the top of our list.

Change is never easy, but teachers have coped extremely well with Government reforms in education. The reforms will prove beneficial, providing teachers do not get bogged down with administration. Those changes coincided with changes in society, which have led to less respect for people in authority. A reduction in teachers' standing in the community and their inability to negotiate their own pay settlements have caused many experienced and dedicated teachers to leave the profession.

At this morning's ceremony, I was with the head teacher, staff and pupils of Rhyddings high school, Oswaldtwistle, which won an award. Rhyddings is a fine school, but in the recent past it has lost the head of the science faculty—a teacher with 30 years' experience—a teacher who spent 15 years in the technology department, and a teacher with a similar length of service in home economics. Those are just three examples of people who have left the profession. Many of my local schools tell the same story.

The Government can do little about the changes in society, but by supporting teachers they can show that they understand, and the best possible sign of that understanding would be a substantial salary increase. this year's increases for teachers of 6·4 to 11·8 per cent., with an average of 8·3 per cent., can hardly be described as over-generous or as designed to retain let alone motivate them.

[Mr. Ken Hargreaves]

The Secretary of State said that teachers' pay had risen by 30 per cent. in real terms since 1979. But that takes no account of how other professions, which have not faced the changes and pressures faced by teachers in recent years, have fared. To allow teachers to develop personally, we must ensure that they are financially secure. That does not seem to be the case at present. If that is true for the north of England, the situation must be worse in the south where living costs are higher.

The Education Reform Act 1988 has increased the responsibilities not only of senior management but of the teachers responsible for line management. Unless we have people of high calibre at all levels, the national curriculum will not be delivered to the standards that most teachers would wish. While it is clearly essential to have an attractive commencing salary, if we are to retain the best of our teachers, we must address the problem of progression and try to prevent excellent teachers from coming out of the classroom to become part of the organisation and administration simply on financial grounds when they would prefer to stay in the classroom.

I welcome the introduction of incentive allowances to reward teachers for good classroom work or for increased responsibility. I am pleased that a further 89,000 allowances were awarded by September this year, bringing the total to 189,000 or 50 per cent. of all secondary school teachers and 40 per cent. of all primary school teachers. That is a welcome development.

I also welcome the way in which the previous Secretary of State, my right hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South (Mr. MacGregor), constantly recognised publicly the excellent work that is done by the majority of teachers. I am sure that my right hon. and learned Friend the present Secretary of State and his Ministers will continue the practice of praising teachers in public. Such an attitude, coupled with a substantial pay increase, would do much to restore the low morale of teachers.

Teaching is a calling or a vocation but that is not a reason why teachers should not be adequately rewarded. In April, the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) said:

"Teachers will still, under a Labour Government, be less well-paid than they wish to be paid."

Fortunately for teachers, there will not be a Labour Government. The Government have clearly done more for teachers than the previous Labour Government. If we are to retain the experienced teachers to whom I referred, we have to do even better. I hope that the Bill will be a vehicle by which we can do that.

7.41 pm

Mr. Roy Beggs (Antrim, East): The determination of school teachers' salaries and conditions in England and Wales and the method by which those salaries are negotiated may have some influence on the determination of salaries for teachers in Northern Ireland. The conditions and the awards that are made here have in the past tended to be rubber-stamped some weeks later in Northern Ireland—hence my interest in this legislation.

Since the abolition of the negotiating machinery for teachers' salaries in England and Wales, their salaries have been determined by the interim advisory committee within certain cash limits imposed by the Government. For the past three years, that has resulted in salary increases lower than the rate of inflation, which means that teachers' p has been cut year after year while more demands have be made on classroom teachers and principals alil Teachers' living standards will be further depressed for t fourth successive year due to the cash limit imposed on t interim advisory committee of 8·9 per cent. for the Ap 1991 salary award.

Such a policy on teachers' pay and conditions insulting to the professionals who give honourable serv and show dedication and concern for our children. V have repeatedly heard about the crisis in teacher supply it affects many areas in England and Wales. Although in Northern Ireland have no apparent shortage teachers, the evidence of low morale in the profession, lack of job satisfaction and the discontent with pay a conditions are there for those who wish to recognise signs.

Since 1980, 10 per cent. of the total teaching forc between 1,800 and 1,900 teachers out of a total of 18,5 —have retired prematurely. The number of experienc teachers over 50 years of age who are seeking premat retirement is dangerously high and could result shortages which could damage the education of children in the future unless it is controlled.

Instead of confrontations with teacher unions, Secretary of State should ensure that there is meaning consultation with teachers' representatives. T Government should be prepared to listen to the views the professionals in education who have first-ha experience and useful advice to proffer. Unfortunat that attitude does not appear to have been adopted in past.

Teachers in Northern Ireland are paid salaries sim to those of their colleagues in England and Wales. The will therefore have direct consequences on the salaries a conditions of Northern Ireland teachers. There is conc that the proposed legislation is an attempt to divide conquer, to set school against school and teacher aga teacher, and that it will result only in a further lowerin morale in an already demoralised profession.

We are very proud of the variety, choice and type school to which parents may choose to send their child in Northern Ireland and we have no intention diminishing the options that are available to parents. are also very proud of our teachers, of their dedication the service that they give. We believe passionately that t should have pay and conditions which truly reflect th worth to society.

The economic future of the whole of the Un Kingdom depends on halting the drift from teaching ensuring that there are sufficient well-qualified teach who can ensure that all our children can be educa according to their age, ability and aptitude, with pro provision being made for those with special educatio needs. Teacher shortages will disappear when pay conditions clearly demonstrate that the professior respected, is accorded its proper status and is prop remunerated.

Because of the implications of the legislation, I welc the correspondence that I have had from the gen secretary of the Ulster Teachers Union. I do not wis present the whole communication to the House because I hope that there will be another opportunit present the salient matters raised in it, but correspondence makes it patently obvious that there i widespread agreement and that there has not been sufficient recognition of the representations made in the past by the teachers' unions.

I emphasise the concern expressed in the representation made to me—a concern which I share—that the Bill does not appear to provide for arbitration. That is a serious omission and inconsistent with the principles of free collective bargaining. As others have said, the Government interference in free collective bargaining is contrary to the convention of the International Labour Organisation to which the United Kingdom is a signatory.

While supporting a return to free collective bargaining, the general secretary of that union stated that he did not belive that clause 2 and schedule 2 provided the independence necessary in such negotiations. We are concerned that, under clause 8, which provides the opportunity to opt out, our teachers in Northern Ireland, where salaries and wages are already low, would be further disadvantaged. Workers in Northern Ireland receive the lowest average salaries and wages of any region of the United Kingdom. That is why we see the provisions as an attempt by Government to introduce regional rates of pay, which totally deviate from the concept of equal pay for equal work. I hope that there will be further consideration before the Bill reaches the statute book and that genuine account will be taken of the serious opinions of those whom the Government consult.

7.50 pm

Mr. David Amess (Basildon): I am delighted to be called to speak on this historic day in the life of this Parliament —a day when the Conservative party can unite behind our new Prime Minister, my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major). Had I been called earlier, I should have wished to pay tribute also to my right hon. Friend the outgoing Prime Minister.

I want to praise the Bill. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Minister, in his reply to the debate, will identify how the new negotiating machinery is preferable to the old Burnham machinery. I want to concentrate most of my remarks on grant-maintained schools. I am delighted to inform the House that Chalvedon school in my constituency is to be the first grant-maintained school in Essex. Essex is the largest education authority in the country. I pay tribute to the governors, the headmaster, the parents and the enthusiastic children who have brought this historic moment to Basildon.

Chalvedon school is already benefiting from grant-maintained status. Last night it was announced that, as a result of central funding, huge additional resources will be given to the new school. Morale has improved in only a short time, and I am sure that that will set the trend for the rest of Essex. I am especially pleased that the rules have been changed and that other schools can now apply for grant-maintained status. I hope that my hon. Friend the Minister will make it clear that grant-maintained status has nothing to do with opting out of the state system—on the contrary, all that it signals is a different method of funding and increased opportunities for schools that achieve that status.

I was a teacher in the early 1970s. I taught at St. John the Baptist junior mixed school, which was run by the Inner London education authority. It was a fine school. I welcome the opportunity tonight to pay tribute to all teachers, who work so hard on behalf of our children. They do a magnificent job. Most people find it difficult looking after their own children, whether two or three, let alone looking after a class of 25 or 26——

Mr. Andrew Smith (Oxford, East): Thirty-two.

Mr. Amess: I was educated in the east end of London in the London borough of Newham. We had 52 in a class. My teacher was dedicated to the extent that, at the age of five, she told my mother that I was dyslexic. I had great difficult enunciating—I could not pronounce the sounds "st" or "fr"—and for two years I went to a speech therapist. I was identified as a child with special learning difficulties, within a class of 52. Because of the Government's policies, the pupil-teacher ratio has now fallen to 19. That is excellent news.

Ms. Armstrong: I am delighted to hear that the hon. Gentleman had access to a speech therapist at the age of five. Is he aware that that is exactly the sort of provision that we want for every child, and at an early stage? There is enormous difficulty for children with special needs gaining access to specialists. This afternoon, Conservative Members have attacked the authorities that are retaining and supporting speech therapists and other non-teaching staff to meet special needs through central pools. Will the hon. Gentleman join me in saying that local authorities should be providing those opportunities for children with special needs?

Mr. Amess: The hon. Member for Doncaster will note that I am an enthusiast about all that speech therapists can do——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): Order. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will not drag me into the debate—I am the hon. Member for Doncaster.

Mr. Amess: I am sorry, Mr. Deputy Speaker; I meant the hon. Member for Durham, North-West (Ms. Armstrong). I am sure that she will accept that there is a substantial cost to her proposals.

The Government should be congratulated on the previous education Bill and on the testing that is being introduced, which will make it much easier to identify, at an early age, the children with special needs. For 18 months, I was responsible for helping children with special learning difficulties, so I know how tough it is. I recognise that there is a substantial cost to the provision of additional teaching services. I believe that the Bill will give teachers great pleasure when they are talking about their pay and conditions. However, on this historic occasion it would be wrong not to take into account the economic position.

Of course we need more money for education, for the health service, for highways and works, and so on—but that is the whole point about the failings of Labour party policy. It never identifies where the money will come from. The Government's policy of trying to reduce inflation and interest rates will eventually result in far greater resources being available for education—in particular, for speech therapists—so that children with learning difficulties can be identified at an early age.

I welcome the opportunity to pay tribute to all my schools in Basildon. I visit every one of them during the year. We have 38 educational establishments—infant schools, junior schools, seven secondary schools and a college of further education. They are absolutely magnificent. I am delighted to tell hon. Members that during the eight years that I have been the Member of Parliament, education standards in Basildon have improved. That would not have been possible without the determination of the teaching staff. That is why I say again that the Bill will considerably improve morale within the teaching profession, and I hope that the House will give it a Second Reading.

[Mr. Amess]

Although I was educated in a class of 52, there was no doubt about the dedication and the commitment of the teachers. Who else would have worked in Victorian buildings, with children sitting at old-fashioned desks in cold conditions? Who else would have been as dedicated as those teachers, who were much more poorly paid than the teachers of today?

I am delighted to say that because of Government initiatives, education in Basildon has improved considerably. More of our young people now go on to take full advantage of the opportunities of higher education. Essex county council recently decided to reorganise education in Basildon and, in future, our seven secondary schools will not have sixth forms; instead, their young people will be sent to the college of further education. I was not entirely enthusiastic when Essex county council made that announcement, but having visited the college to see at first hand the magnificent conditions and facilities that will be available there to young people, I have no doubt that they will receive a very good education when they attend our sixth form college.

I pay tribute also to our education team, who have enthusiastically taken up the policy that we presented to the public in our 1987 election manifesto. The difference between our party and Labour is that we do not look for short-term popularity but set out our policies before the general public and ask them to be judged accordingly.

In 1987, Conservative party policies—particularly those on education—received massive public endorsement, and we were returned with a majority of more than 100 seats. Following tonight's historic events, and given the Leader of the Opposition's statement that he will fight the next general election with education as a first priority, we welcome the battle that is to come.

We welcome the decision that our party has taken tonight. One can see from the faces of my right hon. and hon. Friends that they are very happy, and one can see from the faces of Labour Members that they are absolutely distraught and full of despair. They are very worried, because they know in their heart of hearts that in choosing a successor to my right hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher), we have made ours the best party to win the next general election. I give the Bill my full support.

8.1 pm

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley): Trying to follow the hon. Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) is very difficult. God help our teachers, pupils and schools if the Conservatives secure a 100-seat majority in the next Parliament. I am sure that our schools would literally start falling to the ground.

I welcome the news that teachers are to be given back union negotiating rights that perhaps should never have been taken from them in the first place.

Two weeks ago, I visited the schools in constituency. My first call was the high school. impressed by what I saw there of aspects of loca county council education. The school was well maint and the teachers had a fairly high morale. That was to see after a decade of low morale in schools i north-east. However, the head teacher said that he like to meet our shadow Education Secretary to he certain things right, because obviously the teachers were wishing and hoping for a return of a L Government. They have clearly marked their cards f choice of the next Government.

I next visited a first school. It should be remem that, although pay is important, so are working cond —as I know from having worked as a miner for part life. My visit to the first school was an entirely di story, for the morale there was very low. The scho fairly new, but the first sight that greeted me was a w hut that had stood there for 15 years, which was rott falling to bits. It served as a classroom for 30 kids a and seven. Needless to say, the teacher exper considerable difficulty trying to educate those chil not least because the hut was heated by a duct system, which made such a racket that she could heard and it had to be turned off, so the teacher w half-frozen. Such conditions should not be tolerate

Next to that was another wooden hut that w small for the number of children in the class, so some brighter kids had to be put in yet a third wooden hu school is no more than 15 or 20 years old, yet con there are deplorable.

While the children assembled in the hall to si teachers came to meet me and the vice-chairman education authority. I can assure the Governme they have no support from those teachers for the Bil the Education Act 1988, of which they are proud.

I notice that the Secretary of State has not yet r chart that I handed him during Question Time. given to me by teachers as an example of the wo they are required to do by law. That set of three requires each pupil to be the subject of a 45- assessment. As each class has 30 or more pupils, h teacher supposed to teach when he or she has to spe much time on assessments?

Ms. Armstrong: When my hon. Friend hand Secretary of State those charts earlier, there wa confusion about their purpose. As I understand the are a summation of the teacher assessments attainment targets for each of the main core curr subjects. Is my hon. Friend aware that teachers m only complete that task to comply with the legislation, but must also subject their pupils standard assessment test at age seven? We were tol former Secretary of State that assessments were importance than the tests themselves, but teach finding that statement both confusing and frus Primary school teachers must measure more tha attainment targets in the first year. Those targets match and have not been correlated, because the was implemented in a hurry by people who understand the demands of a primary school cla that the orange document that I gave the Secretary of State is still on the Table. He did not take it away to examine it, and it will probably be there still after the Division and then chucked into the dustbin. The whole scheme should be put into the dustbin.

Mr. Campbell: I had hoped that the Secretary would offer an explanation, but my hon. Friend h to the Government's rescue and put them right.

That is the problem that teachers, especially those in first schools, have to face. They have to take assessments home. Naturally, they will not do the assessment and forget about teaching the kids, so they have to take them home and do them in the evening. They also have to prepare work for the next day's class at home in the evenings.

I talk to teachers—in fact, I live next door to one. In the summer, I often see her out in the garden preparing for next day's class—she works in a first school. How on earth can teachers, who are dedicated to their pupils, assess kids at the same time as trying to prepare their classes? If he can, will the Minister answer that question when he winds up? Can he rassure teachers about that? I assure the Minister that, if he visits schools, he will find that assessments will be one big headache come March, when every parent will have the right to go to a school and see an up-to-date chart whenever they wish. That will certainly cause problems for teachers.

The Prime Minister—I do not know who that is at this minute—said that she was in favour of the voucher system. I raised the subject with teachers, and asked for their assessment of it. The answer was simple—I was talking to teachers, not politicians. They thought that it was an opportunity for the rich to go to the schools of their choice. The rich will have the money to put with the voucher system, to pick the best schools. The rich will go to the best schools and those who do not have the money to put with the voucher will go to bad schools. That is how teachers assess the voucher system.

Perhaps Conservative Members think that they will be elected again next time with their new wonder, super trampoline man. Can we expect a voucher system to be a target for the Government? During the next election campaign, Conservative Members will be pressed on that subject, and they need to be. Teachers are sure that, if such a system in introduced, there will be a two-tier education service in this country.

Mr. Burt: Does it ever strike the hon. Gentleman that, at present, parents with money pay to move to large houses in expensive areas where there are good comprehensive schools, and leave kids in poor comprehensives at the other end of town to their fate? Does he not realise that that is the way that money works within the present state comprehensive system, and that it produces no more fairness than the system that he describes?

Mr. Campbell: That does not happen in my area, I am afraid. I do not represent a yuppie area, but an all-mining town in the north-east of England, where people tend to stay put. I am trying to explain that, as teachers are well aware, if a voucher system is introduced—as you have admitted it will be, although you do not know what you are going to do, but we will get it out of you one way or another—people will not shift. People do not just up and leave houses. It costs a lot of money to shift, and to get another mortgage to go somewhere else where you think that there may be better education.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman must not keep bringing me into the debate, and his speech is now ranging rather wide.

Mr. Campbell: I apologise, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

The introduction of the voucher system is a very emotive idea. We should press the Government on this issue all the time. I wish that the Government would listen to teachers and professionals. I have already heard all the humbug about not giving teachers money or about their having to line up for it. Teachers are professionals. The education of the nation, and of all our children, is in their hands. They are also dedicated people and we should treat them as such—in the same way that we now, just about, treat nurses in the health service. We now treat them as professionals and we should treat teachers in the same way.

Teachers are an honest bunch of people and many of them will not strike. Although one hon. Member mentioned a strike and said that teachers locked out children, for the sake of the kids, many teachers refuse to strike. They are dedicated to the kids' education. They have the schools at heart. As I said, the school that I visited last week would have been a disgrace to a Government of any party.

I hope that the Secretary of State will take note and will put some more money—if we can get it—into the education service.

8.14 pm

Mr. Alistair Burt (Bury, North): Having crossed swords with the hon. Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell), during his speech, I am happy to agree with his conclusions about the professional status of teachers. There is no difference between the two sides of the House on that. In recent years, the Government have tried their best to restore the professional status of teachers. The Government have treated both teachers and nurses better than the Labour Government ever did.

I begin by declaring an interest, as I have recently been appointed a parliamentary representative of the Assistant Masters and Mistresses Association. I join two other colleagues from the House—the hon. Members for Dewsbury (Mrs. Taylor) and for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes), who also represent the AMMA. I have been appointed to replace my hon.Friend the Member for Salisbury (Mr. Key), whom I congratulate warmly upon his promotion into the Government. I pay tribute to him for his work on the Back Benches for the AMMA and for teachers and education in general.

My hon. Friend the Member for Salisbury is a genuine man and a good friend, who has the interests of education very much at heart. I wish him well, and I am sure that all Conservative Members, and many Opposition Members, look forward to him working in the Department of Education and Science at some time in the future. I worked there for three years as parliamentary private secretary to my right hon.Friend the Member for Mole Valley (Mr. Baker), who has certainly left his mark on education. It says much for his foresight that so much of today's wide debate on education is based upon issues that he raised to such public prominence. His recognition of the problems of standards in schools led to his determination to end so many years of talk about a national curriculum, and to introduce one. He focused the nation's attention on standards and quality, on parental choice and the local independence of schools, and laid a basic framework, which has quite rightly been fleshed out and altered in the light of practical experience, just as he envisaged.

[Mr. Alistair Burt]

A back-handed tribute to my right hon. Friend is that the Opposition's so-called big idea for the forthcoming general election is the very idea that he had and developed three years ago. Opposition Members are seeking, unsuccessfully, to fight on what is really our ground. Their record on education—opposing the reforms of recent years—and their record when in office should fill no one with any confidence. One example is the Opposition's continued and persistent opposition to grant-maintained schools. Whatever may have been the original ideological objection on the Opposition Benches, the history of grant-maintained schools can now be evaluated in the light of experience.

As reports come through from various schools, especially those in which head teachers originally opposed the idea, they show that there is a tremendous change in staff attitude and morale. Case after case comes to the Department as the schools report. Teachers say that the whole atmosphere in a school, which had been threatened in one form or another, has changed. Headmasters report that they had been thinking of giving up the profession entirely 18 months ago, but they now feel—as their schools feel—rejuvenated.

I suggest to Opposition Members that any measure that can achieve that for education is worth considering. It is a choice and it is different. Grant-maintained schools may not be one's planned idea of how state education should go, but it is still state education—free education for children in our towns and boroughs. It is still an opportunity for them. The fact that it is something different, which teachers, head teachers, parents and children like, means that it should be given a chance.

If only Opposition Members would curtail their ideological opposition to an idea that they did not like when it was introduced and give it a chance, perhaps the county would have some confidence in their education programme. For as long as they persist in objecting on almost ideological grounds alone to developments such as grant-maintained schools, there will be no confidence in them. Grant-maintained schools have proved their worth and are giving real excitement back to people who are slogging away for children in our towns and cities. It has given them a chance.

I am glad to return to the theme of the debate—the Bill. This has been the sort of evening during which debate has ranged more widely. Back-Bench Members have enjoyed it because it is not often that we have an opportunity to spread ourselves a bit with the Whips nodding encouragement and telling us to keep going. However, the matters in hand are just as interesting.

One of the continuing problems in education over the past few years has been teachers' pay and conditions and the mechanism for deciding on them. I was in the Department of Education and Science when the difficult but necessary decision was taken to abandon Burnham. I am aware of the controversy and the arguments about the loss of negotiating rights and the effect of that on teachers' status. I have no doubt that the right decision was taken to end the unholy mess that Burnham had become and to set up the interim advisory committee. The situation in classrooms had become almost intolerable, and the anger at the loss of negotiating rights was g had letters from teachers in my constituency pr it was not a put-up job and that they were re —so was the sense of relief that something had to end the Burnham stalemate and give teach money.

My right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Va was then Secretary of State for Education and Sc a cartoon from the Evening Standard. It is still o of his current office. It shows a teacher being es a policeman down an identification parade a station. The line contains various undesirables of one sort or another and in the middl incongruously, is my right hon. Friend the M Mole Valley. The policeman is saying, "Can yo the man who stopped you in the playground an £600 a year rise on you?" At the time of the settlement teachers were complaining that money forced upon them and they were angry and receiving such a large increase.

The proof of the pudding over the past thre that that anger has, to a large extent, subsided receive as many letters about the matter constituents. Also, a combination of various settlements from the interim advisory commit financial support from the Government and r attitudes from the majority of teachers and t unions has meant no disruption in sch disruptions in schools three or four years ag dreadful atmosphere and to my right hon. Member for Mole Valley taking the action tha

Mr. Ronnie Campbell: The hon. Gentleman pay and the imposed pay rise. What does Gentleman say to teachers who have to work at who will in the future have to take home assessm and work preparing for the next day's class? W that side of the job? Surely they should not be in this day and age.

Mr. Burt: I am not sure that teachers shou doing that. Necessary work in preparation for always been done by teachers, often outside the hours and often involving work at home understood. At the moment, there is an excessi of work in the early stages of the national curr teacher in a secondary modern school in Rosse me through an exercise similar to that which Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell) showe hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State showed me the sort of work being done for ass sent it to my right hon. and learned Friend the of State and my hon. Friend the Minister ha written back to me explaining, as the Secretar explained to the hon. Member for Blyth Valle Government do not lay down in concrete w should be filled out. They are saying what work noted, not how. My view—I have expressed Secretary of State—is that there is a good arg saying that some of the work is excessive.

As the national curriculum is being implem Government should decide what it is essential t hope that the back-breaking work which I hav which the hon. Member for Blythe Valley des not last for ever. It is the early stages. A great d is being done and in years to come it will be recognised by the authorities that much of it need not be done. We must devise a system that accurately records children's development without overdoing the pressure on teachers so that they find themselves doing that and nothing else. That would be ridiculous.

In some places, it is being overdone, but my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State and my hon. Friends on the Front Bench are receptive to the practical examples being sent to them. At some stage, a sensible balance will be achieved between what needs to be recorded and what does not, to teachers free to do the work that they must do while still keeping decent records.

Ms. Armstrong: The hon. Gentleman is making a good case for our arguments. We said that teachers should be much more involved in the development of the national curriculum and assessment procedures. If the hon. Gentleman had supported that, we might not have had these problems now. Will he support the view of Her Majesty's inspectors that primary teachers in particular should be given at least 10 per cent. non-contact time so that during the school day they can attend to the problems that we have been identifying?

Mr. Burt: I shall not talk about percentages, but I recognise the problem. It is appreciated that primary school teachers could do with more time and I am not against that.

In the introduction of something as complex and necessary as the national curriculum, there was bound to be a period during which different ideas and procedures would be considered so as to see what was best. It would be impossible to devise the best system at the first go. I was not able to support the hon. Member for Durham, North-West (Ms. Armstrong) because I do not think that her system would have been the best. We need to get the system into schools and then see what is best. If the Government pick up on that and the good common sense that teachers often display, we can get a workable system.

As we are coming to the passing of the interim advisory committee, we must not forget that it worked to stabilise the difficult position in schools during the mid-1980s. It has been a success. I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley for his foresight in taking a difficult but necessary decision. The 1987 settlement provided a pay rise of 16·4 per cent. The 1988 settlement increased the number and value of incentive allowances, some by as much as 60 per cent. The 1989 settlement secured pay rises of between 6 per cent. and 15 per cent. Burnham had to go and the interim advisory committee was the best thing in the intervening time. It was right to introduce it.

I welcome the introduction of incentive allowances. They have proved themselves. We can now see how they have increased in size and value. There are now some 174,000 in existence and there will be 14,400 new ones next year. They vary in size from just over £900 to £5,088. They will be increased next year by at least 20 per cent. for teachers who are not at the top of the main scale but who are awarded one of the 14,400 extra incentive allowances. It was a good idea, which brought some flexibility into the pay structure. It is right to recognise excellence, high professionalism and commitment.

All that said, it was clear that, as my hon. Friend the Member for Dartford (Mr. Dunn) said, the committee was an interim measure. It was not acceptable to go on as we were. Hence the determination of my right hon. Friend the Member for Mole Valley who, even as he worked on other matters, consulted extensively to try to find a new system to lay the foundations for what was announced in July by my right hon. Friend the Member for Norfolk, South (Mr. MacGregor) and what has been brought forward today by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State.

I welcome the broad thrust of the Government's proposals. Both I and moderate teachers, with whose representatives I have been in contact, welcome the return of the negotiating procedure. I am glad that we were not too hasty about bringing it back. It was right to talk it through carefully. However, I am pleased that there is to be a return to the negotiating procedure. I recognise the genuine feeling of concern in the teaching profession about its withdrawal.

I am pleased that there are to be separate committees for heads and deputy heads. I am also pleased about the linking of pay and conditions—a long overdue reform—the issuing of a timetable and the provisions to avoid deadlock. They are also welcome to all those who remember the interminable indecision of Burnham.

I intend to highlight two concerns that have been referred to in the debate. I do not believe that they are insuperable. The Bill ought to be given a Second Reading, but I expect those matters to be fully debated in Committee. I hope that the Government will therefore accept well-meaning expressions of concern. On the machinery of negotiation, the Government will need to exert themselves as to the issue of their reserve powers in order to explain precisely how they intend to use them, and under what circumstances.

Although I believe that reserve powers are a legitimate refuge for a Secretary of State in order to deal with a problem, it is clear that a full explanation of their intended use would take much of the sting out of attacks upon them. There is no overwhelming consensus for an independent review body, and the credibility of the new pay arrangements will be adversely affected unless a measure of independence is guaranteed. I hope that Ministers will take due note of that in the wind-up speech and in Committee.

Ministers must also recognise that there is a certain amount of concern in the teaching profession about local determination of pay. I believe that to be an evolutionary development from the flexibility introduced through the interim advisory committee. However, it is new and not fully tested. The Secretary of State would do well to proceed with caution and to listen carefully to the arguments on that point in Committee. I believe that it is a welcome development, but it is fraught with difficulties and must be properly and fully explained.

At the heart of the Bill is a further Government commitment to restore the status of the teaching profession. That is both right and proper. The problem is not so difficult as it is sometimes made out to be by Opposition Members. The vast majority of my constituents have a high regard for their children's teachers. They recognise that tremendous efforts are being made to cope with changes to examinations and with the national curriculum. Parents want, as do teachers, the continued improvement in standards and quality to which this Government are committed. They made their benchmark on that at a far earlier date than the Opposition. Parents in my constituency want their children's teachers to be well paid. They also want the Government to recognise that fact. Our record in that respect is far better than that of the Opposition.

[Mr. Burt]

The Bill—the main thrust of which I welcome and support, with some reservations that must be considered in Committee—represents yet another change in education. Few other areas of our national life have experienced such change in recent years. Despite the media's concentration on some bad examples of education in England and Wales, the majority of schools—heads, assistants and teachers—have made strenuous efforts to come to terms with and to implement change, to the best of their ability. However, the speed and, on occasion, the manner of those changes have caused concern.

Despite the extraordinary achievements of my right hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) in all her many works, the Government have been thought sometimes to be going too far and too fast and listening too little. When change is necessary, speed of decision is a good quality for which we should make no apologies, but there is no reason why adequate explanation and a determination at least to create some form of consensus should not be an integral part of our future approach.

Recently the Foreign Secretary said that, should he be elected Prime Minister, he would introduce, as a stamp of government, the policy of listening, deciding and persuading. I hope that that will be the stamp of the new Government under the leadership of my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major). I am sure, knowing him, that the sentiments expressed by my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary will strike a strong chord among the teaching profession and the wider public. Such an approach would be warmly welcomed. I hope that we make a good start during the passage of the Bill.

8.34 pm

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): It is interesting to reflect on the departure of the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) and her arrival on the collective bargaining scene in 1978. When there was a dispute at Ford and the workers went on strike to share, as they then described it, in Ford's prosperity, the right hon. Member for Finchley hastened there to assure the strikers that, under a Conservative Government, there would be free collective bargaining. This measure demonstrates the calumny of that announcement. It is not true. It amounts to more centralised dictatorship by the Secretary of State for Education and Science.

Schedule 1 provides the Secretary of State with the power to appoint the main committee and the sub-committee. He will have the absolute power to determine pay relationships. At the same time, the Government welcome the changes in eastern Europe. There were no free, independent trade unions in those countries. Trade unions were very much the creature of the state. Eastern European states fell into the error of not allowing independent trade unions to scrutinise the machinery of government.

By taking these powers, the Secretary of State intends to bring back pay bargaining, but it is not really pay bargaining; it is pay deciding by the Secretary of State. He has not chosen to make provision for the affirmative resolution procedure. The House would then have, as of right, a paltry one and a half hours in whic merits of the Secretary of State's decision. T State intends to use instead the nega procedure. For the Bill not to provide for resolution procedure is yet another subversion by the Government of our example of the Secretary of State's determ strong, centralised powers of imposition.

According to the negative resolutio prayer has to be tabled and time obta obtained need not necessarily be the full hours required for the affirmative resolu The time obtained has to be negotiated th channels. If we want a debate to be held un resolution procedure, that has to be neg the usual channels, too. With the affirm procedure, there has to be a resolutio statutory instrument.

The Department of Education and Scie for abusing the legislative powers of the H Education Reform Act 1988, powers are are known as the Henry VIII sections—by the Secretary of State can amend the pri passed by the House of Commons. That misuse of legislative powers.

Mr. Straw: My hon. Friend speaks w authority as Chairman of the joint Statutory Instruments. Will he confirm t this difference between the negative and resolution procedures: that an order un procedure can come into force before it h in the House, even though a prayer has be it?

Mr. Cryer: Indeed: my hon. Friend is Moreover, because of primary legislatio House, an order can be laid, and can com when the House is not sitting. The day before the House counts in the numbe which prayers can be laid. The annulme negative instruments is less than satisfac

A delegated legislation conference of countries was held at the end of 198 Department of Education and Science the way in which it has abused the proced —not by me or elected representatives b the Select Committee on Statutory Instru looking for particularly outlandish exan powers.

The Bill will not improve the general the teaching profession. Teachers must with the removal of negotiating rights an bargaining system which they had been years, but must deal with the shortage o not exemplified by them personally, alth not good.

I hope that the Minister will say, h provisions in schedule 3 for the c chairman and members of the advisor compare with teachers' pay. It is intere the Secretary of State has the power to d and conditions, but will their pay be in l pay or will it be very much more? If it is as I suspect, over the generality of teac will cause even more affront to the tea

Quite apart from their incomes, teachers are concerned about the lack of money for education. For example, they are outraged by the nearly £9 million that was paid in 1989-90 to the city technology college in Bradford, when roughly £9 million has been provided for the capital expenditure of almost 300 state schools in Bradford. I attended prizegiving at Buttershaw upper school last Friday, when the head made it clear—I endorsed his view strongly—that the CTC can provide nothing that cannot be provided in a superior and emphatically better way in the state sector.

When the Government speak of choice, they are speaking of the choice between a state sector starved of public funds and the demonstrable public relations front of the CTC, which has a new building, new equipment and has had lavish expenditure on its facilities. Compare that with, for example, the theatre of Buttershaw upper, which has been in existence for 25 years but is having to raise money for refurbishment because insufficient money has been made available by the Government.

Teachers at Buttershaw upper, as in every other state school in Bradford, are dedicated and devoted to their cause and to the children they serve. None the less, a comparison with the CTC is invidious. The Government pour money into CTCs, but as the Department of Education and Science deals with applications from local authorities in a fairly leisurely fashion, it will be almost two years before a school that was damaged by fire—its pupils have transferred to buildings in my constituency because of that fire—can be restored at least in part.

Under local management for schools, teachers have extra burdens thrust on them, which is causing enormous difficulties. When the Pickles majority of Conservatives were in power in Bradford, they imposed their local mangement schemes on schools but made no provision for a schedule of dilapidation for each school and made no clear apportionment between local authority expenditure and school budget expenditure on major capital items. That is causing enormous difficulties. Since Labour councillors gained control of Bradford, they have redirected expenditure, albeit under a limited Tory budget, to the best of their ability. Several million pounds have been given to education, which forestalled what would have been a certain crisis because of the lack of expenditure by Tories in Bradford.

Mr. Nicholas ... mett: Does the hon. Gentleman believe that the statistics on teachers' pay, capital expenditure, size of classes or any other education statistic were better under the Government in which he was a Minister than under this Government? He was a Minister in that Government, who had an appalling record.

Mr. Cryer: I am delighted to tell the hon. Gentleman that, contrary to the campaign on denigration and mischievous misrepresentation which he and his fellow Conservatives have undertaken, in comprehensive education, which covers between 85 and 90 per cent. of our children, the number of O and A-levels obtained per thousand children increased virtually every year from 1970. Therefore, why on earth the Government are attacking comprehensive schools I really do not know. On the criterion of academic achievement, comprehensive schools have been successful. I know, and I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will recognise, that education is not solely about passing examinations but about many o things. The hon. Gentleman and his fellow Conserva tend to take only the examinations criterion into acco

Mr. Bennett: Examination results are an impor criterion and quality control standard. Why did the I London education authority, before it was abolished April this year, spend more on pupils than any o authority, yet come 88th in the examination lea Waltham Forest, another Labour authority, spent £2 per pupil but came 95th. The best authorities spent least, and in the main were Conservative author Before the hon. Gentleman says that the reason for th the existence of middle-class areas, I would point out Wigan, a Labour authority, came 15th in the examina league. It is a question not of money but of qualit examination results and quality control in schools.

Mr. Cryer: The hon. Gentleman has trotted out t claims before, but London has some of the w education problems. He is saying that, if an area has education problems, it cannot exceed a centrally dire level of expenditure. It is characteristic of him and fellow Conservatives that they are simply not prepare take into account the variations in pattern around country. Of course there will be a higher and lower lev education expenditure, and there is bound to be s variation in examination results. That is one of differences between regions and cities. It does the Gentleman no good to advance that argument, whi paltry, to say the least.

I draw the House's attention to the other aspec centralised control that causes me considerable conc Clause 5(4) says:

"the Secretary of State may give directions to the Advi Committee as to considerations to which they are to regard and financial or other constraints to which recommendations are to be subject, and as to the time w which they are to report to him; and any such directions be varied or revoked by further directions under this secti

The reference to revoking directions shows s formality, but nowhere in the Bill do I see a definitio "directions". A direction is not subject to the approv the House or of anyone down the Corridor; it i unfettered, unanswerable, unaccountable power give the Bill to the Secretary of State for Education Science. That is not good enough. The directions shoul defined. This is a way of getting around the deleg legislation powers laid down by the House. Department of Education and Science not only abuse powers of subordinate legislation but tries to get rou altogether. That must be stopped.

Over the past few days, the Government have trotting out a lot of support for the United Nations. hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough Flannery) drew attention to the International La Organisation, which has strongly criticised the Bill. I not go into the criticisms, because my hon. Friend them out. I want to point out the importance of United Nations-affiliated body. If the Government ch to support the United Nations over the Gulf, they not be selective. They must take notice of the ILO recognise that it is worried about the deliberate unila abrogation of collective bargaining rights for teac This is unfair and unjust for teachers, just as it woul for any other section of employed people. I hope tha Government recognise that.

8.51 pm

Mr. George Walden (Buckingham): I hope that the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) will excuse me if I do not approach the problems of education in Britain from the prism of the Gulf and the United Nations. There are other slightly more relevant approaches. I apologise to Front Benchers for my absence from the debate for the past couple of hours—there have been external distractions.

I congratulate my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State on the wisdom of the Bill, which to some extent he owes to his predecessor, and particularly on the persuasive way in which he presented it to the House. The teaching profession has had to wait a long time to have its pay arrangements modified and updated. During that period, it has had to undergo a series of reforms, with all the strains that that involves.

Unlike some hon. Members, I believe that it is necessary to be frank about what we are discussing. We are talking not only about pay but, by the Government's definition, about recruitment, retention and motivation. I was glad that my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State placed some stress on quality. To discuss the teaching profession and its pay purely in terms of recruitment, retention and motivation without any emphasis on quality is to misjudge the basis of the issue.

In his previous incarnation, my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State—he is not here, for reasons which I understand—was Secretary of State for Health. I wish to say something that will not please the Opposition but it reflects the truth, which is what we are here to discuss. When my right hon. and learned Friend was in charge of nurses, he had problems of recruitment and retention, but not of quality. I, for one, have never heard any of my constituents complain or seen any reports in the press about the inadequate quality of nurses. As a user of the national health service, I have nothing to complain about in that respect.

The Opposition know as well as I do that it is a fact of life that there is a problem with the quality of teachers. It afflicts those with the least social and economic advantages much more than it afflicts people like me who send their children to private schools, for reasons which I would be happy to defend. In addressing pay, recruitment, retention and motivation, we must lay the emphasis on quality because that problem is clearly perceived by ordinary people.

To begin with the mechanics of the Bill, it is natural that the Opposition should query the insistence by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State on the need for regional pay bargaining and opt-out arrangements. I do not want to enter into any great controversy. Apart from anything else, it might be difficult to steam up the Chamber on this issue as I seem to be the only person on the Conservative Benches.

The philosophy of the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) seems to fit naturally with his philosophy on the uniformity and homogeneity of the comprehensive system. That is not a contentious statement but an objective observation. It is a fact of Labour party policy to want to have—I do not say "impose"—a uniform comprehensive system, but that is another issue. It is natural that the hon. Member for Blackburn should want uniform national pay bargaining to go with that system. I listened to what he said about the need for some local variation, but the emphasis of his speech and approach was, naturally and legitimately fro view, on uniformity and socialist neatness

I do not happen to agree. I agree with my learned Friend the Secretary of State ab harsher and more difficult course of differ rational that, in favouring the opting out right hon. and learned Friend should favou of pay negotiations, because the two go tog Member for Blackburn talked about the di opting out of schools and of pay negotiati to look more in terms of a variegated and offering more opportunities to those depri including, lamentably, large numbers of p

I congratulate my right hon. and learn Secretary of State both on his insistence on negotiations and on his caution. The ho Blackburn was, I think, right to draw a possibility of the risk of inflation in accompanied by no compensating gain in teaching or management; that, at any r interpreted his remarks. In the course of wh a very responsible exchange between Benches, my right hon. and learned Friend demonstration of naive enthusiasm. On t appeared prudently to recognise the possi

As I have explained, I believe that the if people are to be offered the choice t crucial. I agree with my right hon. and lea is necessary to run the risk, but to run it pru thing that we need is a system whic leapfrogging local authority teachers' p compensating improvement in quality.

That brings me back to the central then the risk of being divisive, or what the A party-pooper, I must say that quality strik to the problem. I was encouraged by wha and learned Friend the Secretary of State the latest recruitment statistics. I k Government say that teacher shortages confined to certain subjects; neverth disturbing evidence that the problem ma further.

If the shortages begin to bite harder as dip deepens, we may experience a recruiters may be driven, to put it crudely who offers to do the job.

I am aware that we have not reached t it really is a nightmare. If it becomes reali recruited will, by definition, be given the e for life, and once in the profession may b remove; moreover, it is a sociological they will find themselves teaching in th parts of the country. Time and again, w the inequality of opportunity that has so in the past.

As the years go by, we must monitor the mere mechanics of recruitment and quality of those recruited. I hope that my Minister will be able to satisfy my cu pattern of A-level scores achieved by th teaching over the past few years. I ackn is a rough-and-ready guide, but at leas some sort to the quality of new recruits.

It is not enough for my right hon. an the Secretary of State simply to say entering the profession are sufficient to staff the profession. We are asking more of teachers. We are not only placing more responsibility on them in connection with the GCSE examinations—we are asking them to make more judgments about the pupils. That, of course, is in the nature of the the examinations. We must ensure that quality is not only maintained but improved, because children's futures depend increasingly on the judgments of individual teachers.

Another reason not only to maintain but to improve the quality of teaching relates to international comparisons. I hope that the traumas of the past few years have taught us one thing—that we cannot think only in terms of our own national performance. We must watch with a keen eye the quality of teaching in other countries and make comparisons, however disturbing they may occasionally be.

If we are to get teachers of quality, it is not enough to offer them good pay, although that is essential; we must also offer them good conditions. To put it simply, we must also offer them good children. When I say that, I am thinking of children starting school at the age of five. Are they children whom teachers will find it easy to handle? These children are not always easy to handle. I am not talking merely about children in deprived areas, but about those in my own area, where in many classes a third or more of the children come from broken homes.

I apologise to my hon. Friend the Minister for reverting to the subject of nursery schools. To improve the quality of education in the country as a whole, and to attract higher-quality graduates and teachers to the profession, it is essential that the Government have a plan, however long term, to introduce uniform, high-quality nursery education for people of all social backgrounds—and not only for those able to pay for it. If the Government do that, they will—overnight—make the teaching profession far more attractive because teachers will inherit children who, from the age of five, are less likely to suffer from behavioural problems and who are far more adapted to learning.

Any hon. Member who has talked to teachers will have heard them explain in graphic detail how difficult it is to start teaching a child of five who has behavioural problems, who cannot tie his or her shoe laces and who has not even a minimal sense of discipline. Nursery schools will have an important influence on the recruitment, motivation and retention of teachers. I urge the Government to keep that necessity closely in mind, quite apart from all the other self-evident educational benefits that flow from high-quality nursery education.

The final thought with which I leave my hon. Friend is that, when one looks in detail at the Government's proposals, and at the intricate and subtly elastic formulae by which teachers will be able to get a little bit ahead of the annual increases for non-manual workers, one is encouraged in as much as they allow the possibility of recognition by the Government that there is a problem not only in terms of recruitment, but perhaps also in terms of recruitment of the necessary quality. However, the proposals are a little over-prudent in the sense that slightly more dramatic measures will be needed in the years to come. If we are to attempt to bring ourselves up to the standards achieved in some continental countries, we must face the country with the need for some transfer of resources—I know that there is no easy new money available—from other areas of government to education, to achieve a high-quality teaching profession. It will p necessary to raise teachers's pay more dramatically th implied by the present cautious formulae.

The Bill presents a sensible new system for dec teachers' pay, but there will have to be a national w put more effort and resources into education. It wi necessary to explain to the public why there have transfers from other areas—I have my own views a where they should come from—to raise the quality o profession. Even the hon. Member for Blackburn Straw) in his Walden interview was driven to reco that that may be a problem. This is a satisfactory Bil the Government will have to recognise that the cent the debate is and will remain the issue of teacher qu

9.10 pm

Mr. Edward O'Hara (Knowsley, South): Like the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden) I apologis having been unable to attend the whole debate, a apologise in advance if I am therefore slightly repeti of matters covered earlier. I had a long-stan commitment this morning to support pupils from a sp school in my authority's area who were recipients o of the schools curriculum awards. I then entertained —it was a learning experience for them—in the Hous afternoon. I am sure that hon. Members who attended this debate will applaud such an active expre of commitment and support for the staff and pupi Cartbridge special school in Knowsley. I pay tribu those pupils—they are designated as having behavio difficulties—for the impeccable way in which represented their school today in trying circumstanc the capital.

At one point during the afternoon, when my g were in the Gallery listening to a sample of the deb heard the Secretary of State list the purposes behin Bill. The Bill must be judged in the light of how it with those purposes, which were to improve the quali entrants to the profession, to improve retention in profession, to find teachers of specific subjects to fill where they are needed, to raise morale and to motivat profession, which I hope means to motivate them to of their best to all the nation's children.

I wish to discuss the provisions of opting out o national pay negotiations and to discover how adequ the Bill deals with the purposes listed by the Secreta State. The Bill is based on a cruel deceit, speci justified in the Secretary of State's speech b misrepresentative stereotype: of the irresponsible La authority unable to compete in the wages free-for-al to extravagance with its resources. Most La authorities are voted into office because their electo trust them to take responsibility for the services that need, and in the main those authorities acquit thems honourably of their responsibilities.

The deceit lies in the suggestion that differe payments of salary can be allowed without engend division between schools and between the haves an have-nots in society—all from a party which in the week or so has had a sudden excess of enthusiasm fo classless society. The deceit is cruel because it compound the problems of the authorities which hav greatest problems and therefore need the best qualifie best motivated teachers.

[Mr. Edward O'Hara]

What are the extravagances upon which those authorities expend their scarce resources? Plenty of Labour-controlled authorities such as mine in Knowsley have to struggle with the resources available at their disposal to provide educational guidance services, necessitous clothing and free school meals. They must also provide a careers service—and there is a paradox, because the more depressed the economy, the less optimistic are the job prospects for young people. The careers guidance service must therefore work harder, which in turn must have resource implications.

The extravagances also include nursery education—here I agree with the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden)—and provision for special educational needs such as that expended on pupils whom I entertained today. It also includes the provision of speech therapists.

Those authorities recruit, retain and motivate their teachers through their proven commitment to the education service and to the support services that their teachers need—services which certain tabloids present as an extravagant use of resources. The efforts of those authorities and the loyalty of their teachers are undermined by the Government's patent lack of commitment, as shown by their refusal to put resources into the education service.

The statistics may have been referred to earlier. We may talk about a 10 per cent. increase in expenditure, but there has been a decline in central Government input while local government input into the education service has increased. There has also been a fall in the share of gross domestic product going to education, and in the next spending round there is a clear lack of commitment to maintaining spending on education relative to other services. The Bill will further undermine the loyalty of teachers in those authorities.

Will the Bill improve quality at entry or improve retention and morale? No, it will not do that for the profession or for the teachers of all the nation's children. If it achieves anything, it may concentrate the best that is available in the few authorities most able to pay because they have fewer attendant and legitimate calls on their resources, or in the few schools fortunate enough to have children whose parents can contribute if they are not already adequately bankrolled by the Government.

The Bill ignores the real measures which might achieve the purposes that the Secretary of State set out. It ignores measures to improve the quality of teacher education and a scheme of teacher appraisal as an instrument of professional development. It ignores the possibility of a general teachers' council to underpin the status and self-esteem of teachers and their control of the quality of the teaching profession. Above all, it ignores a commitment of adequate resources to the service and to teachers' salaries as a whole.

The Bill is built on the familiar fallacy so evident in the city technology colleges and the grant-maintained schools—that the success of the advantaged few can benefit the many by example. The Bill contains the same inbuilt dynamic. In fact, the success of the few can be achieved only at the expense of the majority. The Bill does not begin to address the problems that it should address, and it should be rejected.

9.19 pm

Mr. Derek Fatchett (Leeds, Central): I should probably start by congratulating those who have participated in the debate on having the strength to resist other temptations around the building. My hon. Friend the Member for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) has participated in virtually all the debate, and others who achieved the same target have shown aspects of democracy at its very best on what may be remembered as an historic occasion.

It is not without significance that this is the first education debate with the new Secretary of State who, together with the rest of the country, is aware that the Labour party is putting forward positive policies on education and enjoys a 30 per cent. lead in the opinion polls. So worried was the Conservative party about Labour's education lead that, in order to divert public attention from our sensible education policies today, it organised a leadership election. They were so desperate to keep the debate away from the media's attention.

May I say, in parenthesis, that I acknowledge the wisdom of the choice of Education Ministers. I suspect that, at some later stage, they will not be in a position to come back and lecture us about backing winners. It is good to see unanimity in the Department of Education and Science for once. Given that Department's track record, it is not surprising that it got the result totally wrong.

I suspect that today's election will be remembered in future history classes because it offers an interesting question—when was the first time that a political party could organise an election system in which a candidate who gained a majority was ejected from office and a subsequent candidate who did not gain a majority was then declared the winner? It may well be the first time in history that a person with a majority has been rejected and someone without a majority has been acclaimed the victor.

That election system will appeal to the Liberal party, representatives of which are not here at present. Those of us who listened to all the debate enjoyed the Liberal cameo from the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor), which was a typical Liberal Democrat speech. I noted virtually all his comments for 15 minutes, and every one was a criticism of the Bill. He then said that he was going to vote for it and would recommend to his hon. Friends that they do exactly the same. He also said that they would demand that certain conditions should be met, or they would not vote with the Government on Third Reading. I am sure that the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) will lose a night's sleep tonight with that threat from the Liberal Democrats, whose spokesman gave us a typical performance.

A backcloth to this debate was provided by discussions on teacher morale. It was interesting that all speakers recognised that there is a problem of low teacher morale. The Secretary of State, and one or two of his colleagues, presumably working from the same central office brief, argued that the collapse in teacher morale was somehow attributable to the teachers' pay disputes of the mid-1980s. I find that a strange argument. I notice that the Parliamentary Private Secretary, the hon. Member for Chelmsford (Mr. Burns), nods away sagely behind the Ministers. He, too, can read the brief.

Members of the interim advisory committee responsible for writing this year's report said that there had been a further collapse in teacher morale in the past two years. My sense of history may not be great, but it is sufficient to tell me that there have been no teacher disputes during the past two years. Teacher morale has fallen for a number of other reasons. If Conservative Members do not understand that, they simply do not understand the current problems facing teachers trying to perform their roles as classroom teachers and as part of the education system. One can list those problems.

All primary schoolteachers have been worried by the weight and pace of the introduction of the national curriculum. It is difficult for them to know what will happen next year about testing at the age of seven. Conservative Members may ask, why should they know, when even the Secretary of State does not know what will happen about testing? The difference is that primary teachers have a direct responsibility for their children and would like to know what will happen about testing.

We have heard about morale. Many teachers are trying to carry out difficult tasks in crumbling schools but Conservative Members say that that does not matter. For reasons that will be apparent to hon. Members, I recently spent a few weeks in Bradford, where we mounted a successful campaign. While there, I saw schools in which it was extremely difficult for teachers and children to perform to the top of their ability and to extend their talents. One of the schools that I visited had been in temporary buildings for seven years. The head teacher told me that it was so cold moving from one temporary classroom to another that the authority provided the teachers with thermal underwear. It would be much better if the Government provided those children with a proper school so that they could get on with the real job of learning.

The local authority in Bradford was the Thatcher experiment in the north of England. I do not know whether the new leader of the Conservative party approves of what went on in Bradford, but the people there did not approve of that experiment with their children, and nor do they approve for one moment of a reduction this year of £13 million in the education budget. That is a sign of the education priorities of Bradford's Conservatives.

My hon. Friend the Member for Knowsley, South (Mr. O'Hara) said that one or two people in the Conservative party have suddenly discovered education. That is a thin commitment, especially when judged against the record of what Conservatives in local government in places such as Bradford have done to the education system. I visited in Bedworth a secondary school which was under local management, and the head teacher told me that he was to lose two and a half teaching posts. How can we maintain morale and improve standards in schools that are faced with such cuts, and what are the implications for the delivery of the curriculum and good quality education?

Morale in the teaching profession is at an all-time low. That is not a criticism of teachers and their performance —quite the opposite: they are doing an excellent job in difficult circumstances. A real partnership in education must be built between Government and teachers. Government should provide teachers with the tools, resources and ability to allow them to get on with the job of providing our children with the education that they deserve and the country needs for the future. The Government have failed to keep their part of the bargain.

The Bill will do little to raise the morale of teachers. My hon. Friends the Members for Sheffield, Hillsborough (Mr. Flannery) and for City of Durham (Mr. Steinberg) spoke about the machinery introduced by the Bill, which will add yet again to the centralised powers of the Department of Education and Science. My hon. Friend the Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer) chastised the Department for its use of those powers. One of the Secretary of State's predecessors took for the holder of that office more than 400 powers in the Education Reform Act 1988. The Bill adds to those powers. The problem which has been evident in all the speeches in the debate is that they can be used arbitrarily and whimsically in the industrial relations and collective bargaining processes.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke indicated dissent.

Mr. Fatchett: The Secretary of State shakes his head, but as the Bill stands, he can intervene on a negotiated settlement and tell the parties that the settlement is unacceptable. There are no parameters to begin with, yet there is a whimsical and arbitrary decision at the end. If we are to have true negotiations and good industrial relations, surely those involved have a right to expect that they will be provided with clear parameters from the Secretary of State rather than his being allowed simply to intervene in a way that will be totally disruptive.

The other key element of the Bill deals with the opt-out provisions by which grant-maintained schools and local education authorities can opt out of the national pay bargaining procedures. It is absolutely clear from all the speeches from Conservative Members, including those from the hon. Members for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall) for Epping Forest (Mr. Norris) and for Buckingham (Mr. Walden), that the opt-out mechanism is regarded as the means of introducing competitive bidding for a scarce resource. That scare resource is the teacher.

The Secretary of State made two interesting comments, one of which showed an ignorance of reality and the other his failure to understand the importance of his own role. Taking the second point first, the right hon. and learned Gentleman seemed relaxed about the prospect of individual local authorities opting out of the national agreement. Indeed, he went further and said—I believe that I am quoting him correctly—that he looked forward to a situation in which three quarters of local education authorities will opt out of the national pay bargaining machinery.

The Secretary of State then failed to understand that by allowing, and, indeed, encouraging that process, the Government have no view about and no role in teacher supply or pay, or the distribution of teachers across subjects and local authorities. The Secretary of State has abdicated his own responsibility in the Thatcherite dream of how the free market is supposed to work.

Mr. Walden: I am not seeking to make a mischievous point, but the hon. Gentleman said earlier that my right hon. and learned Friend was centralising powers. He is now saying that my right hon. and learned Friend is irresponsibly throwing his authority to the dogs. Is it not true that, by the very caution of his presentation of this issue, my right hon. and learned Friend is showing that he is aware of the need to encourage local responsibility and devolution, while having some sense of national restraint? Why does the hon. Gentleman not recognise that fact rather than seeking to make mischief on both sides of the argument?

Mr. Fatchett: I was not trying to make mischief, but to point out to the hon. Gentleman and to his right hon. and learned Friend that there is a contradiction in the Government's philosophical position, as is so often the case with the Thatcherite philosophy of an autocratic centre combined with a belief in the free market. Both are irresponsible positions.

[Mr. Fatchett]

The other part of the Secretary of State's argument is that opt-out will not lead to leap-frogging, because there are no shortages. Recently, when the teachers' unions published their survey on teacher shortages, the Secretary of State said that there was no problem and that teacher shortages do not exist. The Secretary of State's response was to say that the results of the survey were "ludicrous".

I thought that, instead of relying on the teachers' unions' data, I would go and have a look at the figures produced by the Department of Education and Science. I went back to its recent comprehensive survey which the right hon. and learned Gentleman's predecessor published on 17 July. Over a five-year period by subject, and a shorter period by individual local authorities, the survey showed that the problem of teacher shortages is growing. The subject areas in which teacher shortages have grown in the past five years include French, German, history, geography, craft design and technology, music, physical education, religious education, drama, careers and remedial education——

Mr. Flannery: What is left?

Mr. Fatchett: Yes, not a great deal of the curriculum is left, when all these subjects are taken out.

I repeat that teacher shortages have increased in all those subjects. In addition, the DES provided the figures by region. Not one region has improved on the figures provided by the Department; indeed, the figures for every region have deteriorated. For example, in the northern region, the number of vacancies trebled during the period 1988-90. That is based not on my statistics, not on the statistics of the teachers' unions, but on the Department's statistics. In the Yorkshire and Humberside region, the number of vacancies increased by 33 per cent. The number of vacancies in London rose by 50 per cent., and in the rest of the south-east by 100 per cent. The reality is that teacher shortages are a serious problem.

The Secretary of State argues that there is not a teacher shortage. He also tries to tell us of another success story —that recruitment for initial teacher training is working so well that we do not need to worry about future teacher shortages. I shall cite figures that were given in Hansard on 26 March for recruitment to the areas of skills shortages, compared with the targets set by the Department. For maths, recruitment was 75 per cent. of the target figure; for craft, design and technology, it was 70 per cent.; for chemistry, it was 72 per cent.; and for physics, it was 55 per cent. The Secretary of State claims that each of those figures is some sort of success. Is not the reality quite different? The truth is that there is an increasing problem of teacher shortages.

Conservative Members advocate the opt-out procedure, but they do so for only one reason. They represent the rich south-east of England, and they want to use the opt-out procedure to buy in teachers, not to add to teacher supply——

Mr. Timothy Wood (Stevenage): To add to cost.

Mr. Fatchett: The Government Whip is right. He should not have said that. No doubt he will be writing a letter of apology later. He was right to say that the opt-out procedure will add to costs—[Interruption.] The Secretary of State appears to be telling the hon. Gentleman what he should have said, but in fact his remark was true. It will add to costs, but it will not add one additional teacher to the teaching force.

The opting-out procedure will result in a redistribution from the poorer authorities in inner London to the better-off, outer-London authorities. Tonight's Evening Standard highlighted the crisis of teacher shortages in London. The Bill will add to that crisis, to the cost of inner-London boroughs and to the benefit of outer London boroughs. It is a redistribution from the poor to the rich, and that characterises the Government's record during the past 11 years.

The Bill could have done a great deal for teacher morale if it had dealt with the establishment of a general teaching council and with teacher appraisal, which this Government have decided not to introduce. It would have helped to improve quality in the classroom. The Government could do a great deal more in initial teacher training. It is the Labour party that is advocating a national core curriculum for teacher training and national standards of competence in newly trained teachers.

The Government could have done a great deal more to attract teachers from the pool of qualified teachers that are currently inactive. Indeed, there are as many inactive as there are active teachers. What have the Government done about that pool of teachers, who could be retrained and who could work in the classroom? They are spending no more than the cost of four teachers' salaries in each local authority—hardly a programme designed to attract teachers back to the profession and to give them the confidence, the training and, in many cases, the necessary help with child care to enable them to return to work.

As always, the Government have greatly damaged our education system. They have damaged the morale of teachers. One of their most damaging acts, even for this Government, was to take negotiating rights away from teachers. The Bill does little to rectify that record. It is too late, it does too little, and it does not deal with the major problems in our education system. That is why I shall ask my right hon. and hon. Friends to vote for our amendment, which puts forward a real policy for education and gives hope to parents and children.

9.39 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mr. Tim Eggar): We had a wide-ranging debate and I am sure that we all felt that we were at the centre of the nation's affairs. That was well borne out by the level of attendance throughout the debate.

I particularly welcomed the comments of my hon. Friends the Members for Hendon, South (Mr. Marshall), for Hyndburn (Mr. Hargreaves), and for Basildon (Mr. Amess), of my hon. Friend the Member for Bury, North (Mr. Burt)—whom I welcome with his newly declared interest—and of the hon. Member for Antrim, East (Mr. Beggs). I am grateful for the way in which my hon. Friends praised the professionalism and ability of so many of our teachers, which was in stark contrast to the comments of Opposition Members. It was not until the speech of the hon. Member for Leeds, Central (Mr. Fatchett) that we heard any praise for the work that our teachers do in the classrooms.

Mr. Cryer: That is not true. I said that they are dedicated.

Mr. Eggar: I am delighted to hear the hon. Gentleman remark that teachers are dedicated, although he was not present in the Chamber for most of the debate.

I do not recognise from the many visits that I have paid to primary and secondary schools throughout the country over the past two or three months the gloomy picture painted by Opposition Members. I pay my own tribute to teachers' dedication and commitment, and to their achievements in giving effect to many of the far-reaching improvements that we introduced over the past two or three years.

The situation in schools today is very different from four or five years ago. The credit for that transformation belongs to the teachers themselves. Many teachers and their unions recognise the folly of the union action of the 1980s. Great credit is also due to the interim advisory committee, whose reports led to far-reaching improvements to the teachers' pay structure. I noted with interest the remarks of the hon. Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) about the IAC's role. The Government played their part in rebuilding teachers' self-esteem and in reaffirming to parents the importance and commitment of the teaching profession.

The Bill is an important step forward. By restoring teachers' negotiating rights, we are expressing our confidence that the progress made in recent years will be sustained. The Bill does not look back to the shambles of Burnham, but looks forward——

Mr. Straw: Will the Minister give way?

Mr. Eggar: —to the effective determination of teachers' pay——

Mr. Straw rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman knows that, if the Minister does not choose to give way, the hon. Gentleman must resume his seat.

Mr. Eggar: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Straw: The Minister praises the interim advisory committee and suggests that everything has changed since 1986. If that is true, why does the IAC's third report, published just a few months ago, state:

"We are in no doubt from our schools visits that teacher morale is lower now that in our first two years, and that a number of factors are contributing to this."?

Why is teacher morale lower now than it was before?

Mr. Eggar: One reason why teachers feel undervalued are remarks of the kind just made by the hon. Member for Blackburn, who year after year produces false prospectuses about teacher shortages and makes no apology when his claims are proved wrong. The hon. Gentleman has a role to play in contributing to improving the status of the teaching profession—a role that he has consistently refused to play.

I recognise that every feature of the Bill will not be welcome to every party involved. We have to realise that the divisions between the various teaching unions are as deep as ever. We all know that their own particular interests rarely coincide. But the machinery that we are introducing, through the Bill, will give the employers and the six unions the opportunity to discuss, to negotiate and, I hope, to agree. That is what most of those concerned really wanted.

There is a second, perhaps more fundamental, point. It is right that the employers and the teacher unions should have the opportunity to negotiate agreements on pay and conditions. But there are other parties with legitimate interests—notably the Government and the taxpayers. The question of the weight to be attached to the various interests and of how those interests are to be reconciled in the context of new pay machinery, is serious and important.

I am delighted to note that the hon. Member for Blackburn accepts that there is a role for the Government in setting teachers' pay. He recognises that there is a balance to be struck. Any responsible Government must recognise that. We believe that the Bill—the result of much consultation and reflection—does indeed get the balance right.

It is interesting to note that neither the hon. Member for Blackburn nor the hon. Member for Leeds, Central even tried to discuss the core of the Bill, which concerns the machinery for setting pay levels. They did not put forward one serious or constructive suggestion about what they wanted to do. I challenge them to come forward with their proposals in Committee. We shall wait with interest to hear what they have to say.

Most of the debate concentrated on clauses 8 and 9, which cover opting out. My hon. Friends the Members for Dartford (Mr. Dunn), for Rugby and Kenilworth (Mr. Pawsey) and for Hendon, South mentioned the advantages, and the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Taylor) mentioned the problems, which flow from clauses 8 and 9, covering opting out. LEAs and schools already have considerable flexibility to target payments selectively to tackle any local recruitment or retention difficulties, and to reward good teachers and those teachers who take on additional responsibility. That flexibility has increased significantly over the past few years and, as my right hon. and learned Friend said, it will be extended further when the January payment settlement date is reached.

Let us be clear about one thing. Opting out has nothing to do with the volume of resources available to an LEA or a grant-maintained school, but a great deal to do with the allocation and better management of resources at local level. We have in place already a pay structure that gives wide flexibility to reward, recruit and retain. I am sure that the local authorities' negotiators will be looking to maintain and to extend that existing flexibility, but I firmly believe that individual LEAs, which must answer to parents and community charge payers for the effective delivery of the education service in their areas, must be able to go their own way if, and only if, they conclude that the national pay and conditions arrangements do not provide the framework they need.

Mr. Matthew Taylor: The Minister said that, under the Bill, local settlements would not affect the volume of resources. I cannot see why he believes that the national structure would do that anyway. It seems that the Government are setting the volume of resources in advance of national negotiations, so why is it necessary to maintain a ministerial veto, rather than a veto at local level?

Mr. Eggar: A grant-maintained school has a clear budget and it has to look at alternative calls on that budget. Local education authorities are able to deploy resources at a local level. Therefore, it is right that the Government should have a reserve power for the national settlement. That power can be used only at the end of an extremely long process. There has to be a referral back and if that does not satisfy, it must be referred to the interim advisory committee, back to us and then to a negative resolution of the House.

Opposition Members have uttered dire warnings about a future in which there are many different local and regional salary levels and pay structures. I believe firmly that individual local education authorities and grant-maintained schools are best placed to determine how best to respond to local needs and priorities. It may be that some of them will feel that the way forward is to opt out of the national arrangements altogether. They may feel that they should determine the pay and conditions of their teachers at local level. Even at this early stage, one or two local education authorities are thinking seriously about that. I have no doubt that they should be able to make that choice if they so wish.

We are legislating for many years to come and need to provide for the long-term evolution of the system. It would be short-sighted to assume that the national system will always be sufficiently flexible to enable every local education authority and grant-maintained school to respond as it would wish in tackling its needs and difficulties. We have moved a long way over the past three years in devolving to local level decisions about the salaries of individual teachers. As my hon. Friend the Member for Buckingham (Mr. Walden) said, the proposals in the Bill are a natural extension of the process upon which we have already embarked.

The hon. Member for Blackburn referred to the loss of teachers from the profession. He claimed that there was a wastage rate of four in every five teachers over a period of five years.

Mr. Straw: No.

Mr. Eggar: He said that only one in five teachers was teaching after five years.

Mr. Straw: The Minister got it wrong. The figures do not come from me but from the Department of Education and Science. I said that, for every three entrants to teacher training, only one is left teaching five years after qualification.

Mr. Eggar: The hon. Gentleman is wrong. He does not bother to check his facts. About 70 per cent. of those entering teaching are still in the profession five years later. Half of the 30 per cent. who are not teaching re-enter the profession at some stage after five years. Those are the facts that have been given to the hon. Gentleman in a briefing from my Department. If he cannot accept the facts, he has failed to do his homework.

Mr. Straw rose——

Mr. Eggar: I shall not give way to the hon. Gentleman. He got his facts wrong in his speech and his intervention. He cannot accept the briefing from my Department and would rather accept advice from the unions.

The hon. Member for Blackburn also said that some qualified teachers are not teaching now. They are in what is known as the pit—the pool of inactive teachers. If t hon. Gentleman looks at those behind him, he will see th 57 of his hon. Friends are members of the pit and ha decided for one reason or another that they do not wish continue teaching. I am sure that my hon. Friends wou welcome it if they returned to the classroom, as I am su they will after the next election. I understand why the ho Member for Blyth Valley (Mr. Campbell) looks worried. He must be concerned about the teachi standards that his hon. Friends would make available children. I share his concern.

I was interested to read about the proposals of the ho Member for Leeds, Central to reform teacher training. made fascinating reading. Imitation is the highest form flattery. The hon. Member for Leeds, Central suggest that more practical classroom experience is needed. We a there already. I shall give the hon. Gentleman t opportuntiy to endorse the licensed teacher scheme th was introduced two years ago by willingly giving way him. While he is about it, may I ask him also to endorse articled teachers scheme that was introduced September? Both schemes are based on practi classroom experience. That is exactly what he called for his speech last weekend.

Mr. Fatchett: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Eggar: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman i minute.

The Opposition suggest that there ought to be national core curriculum for teacher training. I refer hon. Member for Leeds, Central to our criteria for approval of courses. They were laid down in 1984 a revised at the end of last year to take account of national curriculum. Why does not he welcome our crite for a core curriculum for teacher training? I hope that will endorse it this evening.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to what he cal competence statements. I hope that he will take opportunity to endorse the criteria that we laid down 1984.

Mr. Fatchett: I am pleased that the hon. Gentlem spent so much time last weekend reading my speech. I had read it in full, he would have recognised that Opposition want agreed levels of competence to re from teacher training. The hon. Gentleman knows t licensed teachers do not possess agreed levels competence.

Mr. Eggar: The hon. Gentleman does not accept logic of his own position. He says that teachers ough have more classroom experience and then, for umpteenth time, he rejects a scheme that is based enti on classroom experience.

The Opposition have had a great deal to say ab resources. We ought, therefore, to look at the fa During the past 10 years, funding per pupil has risen —[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Eggar: The Opposition do not want to recog the fact that during the past 10 years there has been increase of over 40 per cent. in real terms on spending pupil. There has been a 12 per cent. increase in provision for secondary schools, a 17 per cent. increas the provision for primary schools, a 20 per cent. incr in further education for adults, a 33 per cent. increase for additional special schools, a 58 per cent. increase in expenditure on the under-fives and, for teachers, a real-terms increase in pay of 30 per cent. Those are the facts about resources. The increases in resources are real —unlike the cheap words of the Opposition.

Under the previous Labour Government, teachers' salaries rose by only 6 per cent. Moreover, under the previous Labour Government there was a positive reduction in education programmes. During the five years of the previous Labour Government, spending per pupil fell in real terms. Between 1976 and 1978, there was a 28 per cent. cut in real terms in expenditure on schools. We increased spending on teachers' salaries, and we were not ashamed of doing that.

When the hon. Member for Blackburn speaks of extra resources for education, he adds a little caveat—as resources allow. By that, he means that he is making a series of confetti promises when he knows perfectly well that shadow Treasury spokesmen will not give him the resources. He will not fool the people. We want support for the Bill, and that is what we shall get.

Question put, That the amendment be made:—

The House divided: Ayes 177, Noes 328.

Division No. 12] [10 pm

AYES

Abbott, Ms Diane
Allen, Graham
Alton, David
Anderson, Donald
Archer, Rt Hon Peter
Armstrong, Hilary
Ashley, Rt Hon Jack
Ashton, Joe
Barnes, Harry (Derbyshire NE)
Barron, Kevin
Battle, John
Beckett, Margaret
Beggs, Roy
Bell, Stuart
Bennett, A. F. (D'nt'n & R'dish)
Benton, Joseph
Bermingham, Gerald
Bidwell, Sydney
Blair, Tony
Blunkett, David
Boateng, Paul
Boyes, Roland
Bradley, Keith
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Brown, Gordon (D'mline E)
Brown, Nicholas (Newcastle E)
Brown, Ron (Edinburgh Leith)
Buckley, George J.
Caborn, Richard
Callaghan, Jim
Campbell, Ron (Blyth Valley)
Campbell-Savours, D. N.
Canavan, Dennis
Clark, Dr David (S Shields)
Clay, Bob
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Coleman, Donald
Cook, Robin (Livingston)
Corbyn, Jeremy
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Crowther, Stan
Cryer, Bob
Cummings, John
Cunliffe, Lawrence
Cunningham, Dr John
Davies, Ron (Caerphilly)
Davis, Terry (B'ham Hodge H'l)
Dixon, Don
Dobson, Frank
Doran, Frank
Eadie, Alexander
Eastham, Ken
Evans, John (St Helens N)
Fatchett, Derek
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Fields, Terry (L'pool B G'n)
Fisher, Mark
Flannery, Martin
Flynn, Paul
Foot, Rt Hon Michael
Foster, Derek
Foulkes, George
Fraser, John
Galloway, George
Garrett, John (Norwich South)
Garrett, Ted (Wallsend)
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Golding, Mrs Llin
Gould, Bryan
Grant, Bernie (Tottenham)
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Grocott, Bruce
Hardy, Peter
Harman, Ms Harriet
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Healey, Rt Hon Denis
Hinchliffe, David
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Home Robertson, John
Howarth, George (Knowsley N)
Hoyle, Doug
Hughes, John (Coventry NE)
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport E)
Illsley, Eric
Ingram, Adam
Janner, Greville
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Jones, Ieuan (Ynys Môn)
Kaufman, Rt Hon Gerald
Kinnock, Rt Hon Neil
Lambie, David
Leadbitter, Ted
Leighton, Ron
Lestor, Joan (Eccles)
Lewis, Terry
Litherland, Robert
Livingstone, Ken
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Lofthouse, Geoffrey
Loyden, Eddie
McCartney, Ian
Macdonald, Calum A.
McKay, Allen (Barnsley West)
McKelvey, William
McLeish, Henry
Maginnis, Ken
Mahon, Mrs Alice
Marek, Dr John
Marshall, Jim (Leicester S)
Martlew, Eric
Meacher, Michael
Meale, Alan
Michael, Alun
Michie, Bill (Sheffield Heeley)
Mitchell, Austin (G't Grimsby)
Moonie, Dr Lewis
Morris, Rt Hon A. (W'shawe)
Morris, Rt Hon J. (Aberavon)
Mowlam, Marjorie
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Paul
Nellist, Dave
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, William
O'Hara, Edward
O'Neill, Martin
Orme, Rt Hon Stanley
Parry, Robert
Pendry, Tom
Pike, Peter L.
Prescott, John
Primarolo, Dawn
Quin, Ms Joyce
Randall, Stuart
Redmond, Martin
Rees, Rt Hon Merlyn
Reid, Dr John
Richardson, Jo
Robinson, Geoffrey
Rooker, Jeff
Rooney, Terence
Rowlands, Ted
Ruddock, Joan
Sedgemore, Brian
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Short, Clare
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, Andrew (Oxford E)
Smith, Rt Hon J. (Monk'ds E)
Smith, J. P. (Vale of Glam)
Snape, Peter
Soley, Clive
Steinberg, Gerry Stott, Roger
Strang, Gavin
Straw, Jack
Taylor, Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Thomas, Dr Dafydd Elis
Thompson, Jack (Wansbeck)
Turner, Dennis
Vaz, Keith
Walley, Joan
Wardell, Gareth (Gower)
Wareing, Robert N.
Welsh, Michael (Doncaster N)
Wigley, Dafydd
Williams, Rt Hon Alan
Williams, Alan W. (Carm'then)
Wilson, Brian
Winnick, David
Wise, Mrs Audrey
Worthington, Tony

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Frank Haynes and
Mr. Martyn Jones.

NOES

Aitken, Jonathan
Alexander, Richard
Alison, Rt Hon Michael
Allason, Rupert
Amess, David
Amos, Alan
Arbuthnot, James
Arnold, Jacques (Gravesham)
Arnold, Sir Thomas
Ashby, David
Aspinwall, Jack
Atkins, Robert
Atkinson, David
Baker, Rt Hon K. (Mole Valley)
Baker, Nicholas (Dorset N)
Banks, Robert (Harrogate)
Barnes, Mrs Rosie (Greenwich)
Batiste, Spencer
Beith, A. J.
Bellingham, Henry
Bellotti, David
Bendall, Vivian
Bennett, Nicholas (Pembroke)
Bevan, David Gilroy
Blackburn, Dr John G.
Blaker, Rt Hon Sir Peter
Body, Sir Richard
Boscawen, Hon Robert
Boswell, Tim
Bottomley, Peter
Bottomley, Mrs Virginia
Bowden, A (Brighton K'pto'n)
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Bowis, John
Boyson, Rt Hon Dr Sir Rhodes
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Brazier, Julian
Bright, Graham
Brown, Michael (Brigg & Cl't's)
Browne, John (Winchester)
Buchanan-Smith, Rt Hon Alick
Buck, Sir Antony
Budgen, Nicholas
Burns, Simon
Burt, Alistair
Butcher, John
Campbell, Menzies (Fife NE)
Carlile, Alex (Mont'g)
Carlisle, John, (Luton N)
Carlisle, Kenneth (Lincoln)
Carrington, Matthew
Carttiss, Michael
Cartwright, John
Chalker, Rt Hon Mrs Lynda
Channon, Rt Hon Paul
Chapman, Sydney
Chope, Christopher
Churchill, Mr
Clark, Hon Alan (Plym'th S'n)
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Clarke, Rt Hon K. (Rushcliffe)
Colvin, Michael
Conway, Derek
Coombs, Anthony (Wyre F'rest)
Coombs, Simon (Swindon)
Cope, Rt Hon John
Cormack, Patrick
Couchman, James

Cran, James
Critchley, Julian
Davis, David (Boothferry)
Day, Stephen
Devlin, Tim
Dickens, Geoffrey
Dicks, Terry
Dorrell, Stephen
Douglas-Hamilton, Lord James
Dover, Den
Dunn, Bob
Durant, Tony
Eggar, Tim
Emery, Sir Peter
Evans, David (Welwyn Hatf'd)
Evennett, David
Fairbairn, Sir Nicholas
Fallon, Michael
Favell, Tony
Field, Barry (Isle of Wight)
Fishburn, John Dudley
Fookes, Dame Janet
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Sir Norman
Fox, Sir Marcus
Franks, Cecil
Freeman, Roger
French, Douglas
Fry, Peter
Gale, Roger
Gardiner, George
Garel-Jones, Tristan
Gill, Christopher
Gilmour, Rt Hon Sir Ian
Glyn, Dr Sir Alan
Goodhart, Sir Philip
Goodlad, Alastair
Goodson-Wickes, Dr Charles
Gorman, Mrs Teresa
Gorst, John
Grant, Sir Anthony (CambsSW)
Greenway, Harry (Ealing N)
Greenway, John (Ryedale)
Griffiths, Sir Eldon (Bury St E')
Griffiths, Peter (Portsmouth N)
Grist, Ian
Ground, Patrick
Grylls, Michael
Gummer, Rt Hon John Selwyn
Hague, William
Hamilton, Hon Archie (Epsom)
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hampson, Dr Keith
Hanley, Jeremy
Hannam, John
Hargreaves, A. (B'ham H'll Gr')
Hargreaves, Ken (Hyndburn)
Harris, David
Haselhurst, Alan
Hawkins, Christopher
Hayes, Jerry
Hayward, Robert
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael
Hicks, Mrs Maureen (Wolv' NE)
Higgins, Rt Hon Terence L.
Hill, James
Hind, Kenneth
Hogg, Hon Douglas (Gr'th'm)
Howard, Rt Hon Michael
Howarth, Alan (Strat'd-on-A)
Howarth, G. (Cannock & B'wd)
Howell, Ralph (North Norfolk)
Hughes, Robert G. (Harrow W)
Hughes, Simon (Southwark)
Hunt, David (Wirral W)
Hunt, Sir John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Hurd, Rt Hon Douglas
Irvine, Michael
Irving, Sir Charles
Jack, Michael
Janman, Tim
Jessel, Toby
Johnson Smith, Sir Geoffrey
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Robert B (Herts W)
Jopling, Rt Hon Michael
Kellett-Bowman, Dame Elaine
Key, Robert
Kilfedder, James
King, Roger (B'ham N'thfield)
King, Rt Hon Tom (Bridgwater)
Kirkhope, Timothy
Kirkwood, Archy
Knapman, Roger
Knight, Greg (Derby North)
Knight, Dame Jill (Edgbaston)
Knowles, Michael
Knox, David
Lamont, Rt Hon Norman
Lang, Ian
Latham, Michael
Lawrence, Ivan
Lee, John (Pendle)
Leigh, Edward (Gainsbor'gh)
Lennox-Boyd, Hon Mark
Lester, Jim (Broxtowe)
Lilley, Peter
Lloyd, Sir Ian (Havant)
Lloyd, Peter (Fareham)
Luce, Rt Hon Richard
Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
Macfarlane, Sir Neil
MacGregor, Rt Hon John
MacKay, Andrew (E Berkshire)
Maclean, David
McLoughlin, Patrick
McNair-Wilson, Sir Patrick
Madel, David
Major, Rt Hon John
Malins, Humfrey
Mans, Keith
Maples, John
Marlow, Tony
Marshall, John (Hendon S)
Marshall, Sir Michael (Arundel)
Martin, David (Portsmouth S)
Mates, Michael
Maude, Hon Francis
Maxwell-Hyslop, Robin
Mayhew, Rt Hon Sir Patrick
Michie, Mrs Ray (Arg'l & Bute)
Miller, Sir Hal
Mills, Iain
Mitchell, Andrew (Gedling)
Mitchell, Sir David
Moate, Roger
Monro, Sir Hector
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Moore, Rt Hon John
Morris, M (N'hampton S)
Morrison, Sir Charles
Morrison, Rt Hon P (Chester)
Moss, Malcolm
Mudd, David
Neale, Gerrard
Nelson, Anthony
Newton, Rt Hon Tony
Nicholson, David (Taunton)
Nicholson, Emma (Devon West)
Norris, Steve
Onslow, Rt Hon Cranley
Oppenheim, Phillip
Owen, Rt Hon Dr David
Page, Richard
Paice, James
Parkinson, Rt Hon Cecil
Patnick, Irvine
Patten, Rt Hon Chris (Bath)
Patten, Rt Hon John
Pattie, Rt Hon Sir Geoffrey
Pawsey, James
Porter, Barry (Wirral S)
Porter, David (Waveney)
Portillo, Michael
Powell, William (Corby)
Price, Sir David
Raffan, Keith
Raison, Rt Hon Timothy
Redwood, John
Renton, Rt Hon Tim
Rhodes James, Robert
Riddick, Graham
Ridsdale, Sir Julian
Rifkind, Rt Hon Malcolm
Roberts, Sir Wyn (Conwy)
Roe, Mrs Marion
Rossi, Sir Hugh
Rost, Peter
Rowe, Andrew
Rumbold, Mrs Angela
Ryder, Richard
Sackville, Hon Tom
Sainsbury, Hon Tim
Sayeed, Jonathan
Scott, Rt Hon Nicholas
Shaw, David (Dover)
Shaw, Sir Giles (Pudsey)
Shaw, Sir Michael (Scarb')
Shelton, Sir William
Shephard, Mrs G. (Norfolk SW)
Shepherd, Colin (Hereford)
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Shersby, Michael
Sims, Roger
Skeet, Sir Trevor
Smith, Sir Dudley (Warwick)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Soames, Hon Nicholas
Speed, Keith
Speller, Tony
Spicer, Sir Jim (Dorset W Spicer, Michael (S Worc
Squire, Robin
Stanbrook, Ivor
Stanley, Rt Hon Sir John
Steen, Anthony
Stern, Michael
Stevens, Lewis
Stewart, Allan (Eastwoo Stewart, Andy (Sherwoo Stewart, Rt Hon Ian (He
Stokes, Sir John
Sumberg, David
Summerson, Hugo
Tapsell, Sir Peter
Taylor, Ian (Esher)
Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Taylor, Teddy (S'end E)
Tebbit, Rt Hon Norman
Temple-Morris, Peter
Thompson, D. (Calder V Thompson, Patrick (Nor
Thornton, Malcolm
Thurnham, Peter
Townend, John (Bridling Townsend, Cyril D. (B'h
Tracey, Richard
Tredinnick, David
Trippier, David
Trotter, Neville
Twinn, Dr Ian
Vaughan, Sir Gerard
Viggers, Peter
Walden, George
Walker, Bill (T'side Nort
Wallace, James
Waller, Gary
Walters, Sir Dennis
Ward, John
Wardle, Charles (Bexhil
Warren, Kenneth
Watts, John
Wheeler, Sir John
Whitney, Ray
Widdecombe, Ann
Wiggin, Jerry
Wilkinson, John
Wilshire, David
Winterton, Mrs Ann
Winterton, Nicholas
Wolfson, Mark
Wood, Timothy
Woodcock, Dr. Mike
Yeo, Tim
Younger, Rt Hon George

Tellers for the Noes:
Sir George Young and
Mr. David Lightbown.

Question accordingly negatived.

Main Question put forthwith, pursuant to S Order No. 60 (Amendment on Second or Third Re and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time, and commit Standing Committee pursuant to Standing Order (Committal of Bills).

School Teachers' Pay and Conditions Bill

[Money]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—
Motion made, and Question proposed,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the School Teachers' Pay and Conditions Bill, it is expedient to authorise the payment out of money provided by Parliament of—

(a) any expenses of the Secretary of State under that Act, and

(b) any increase attributable to that Act in the sums so payable under any other Act.—[Mr. Fallon.]

10.16 pm

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): I am sure that the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) is being pressed to depart from the Chamber because he must want to know that the money is under close scrutiny. After all, under the Tory Government, he has been responsible for cuts ever since he was Chief Secretary to the Treasury.

The money resolution uses a curious form of words. It authorises any increase in expenditure

"attributable to that Act"— that is, the School Teachers' Pay and Conditions Bill—

"in the sums so payable under any other Act."

That is a broad form of words. Why does the Secretary of State not rely simply on the authority granted by section 79 of the Education Reform Act 1988, which applies to teachers' pay and under which, through negotiations under the School Teachers' Pay and Conditions Bill, he is authorised to increase expenditure? As the main source is listed under the financial effects of the Bill, why should the resolution refer to "any other Act"?

What other legislation do the Government have in mind which will be covered by the resolution? The words of the resolution are broad, so we are giving carte blanche to the Government to apply expenditure to any other Act that they may desire to introduce. Perhaps they already have in mind a list of Acts to which the resolution could apply. In that case, they should have listed such legislation in the financial effects of the Bill. That would be a useful explanation to place on the record.

Secondly, schedule 3(3) lists the sorts of expenditure that the Secretary of State is authorised to pay over to the chairman, deputy chairman and members of the advisory committee. The financial memorandum to the Bill makes it clear that the cost of the committee will be offset by disbanding the interim advisory committee. I asked earlier whether the Secretary of State had in mind any increases in the pay and improvements in the conditions of the new committee. If there are significant differences between the money paid to teachers and the payments made to the advisory committee, teachers will be affronted. They are dissatisfied with their pay, not least because it has been removed from a decent pay bargaining framework such as that recommended by the International Labour Organisation, which is affiliated to the United Nations.

We need to know what these people will be paid and what hours they will be expected to work each week. That will give teachers a useful basis for comparison. If the payments are large, the advisory committee will not be independent, because it will be under an obligation to its paymaster in the form of the Secretary of State. The money resolution authorises the Secretary of State to determine those levels of pay, and the House should know what they will be. We should not have to find that information out from press leaks because it has been determined in secret.

The legislation places the negotiations on and recommendations for teachers' pay in the public arena. Everyone will know what the teachers are paid, so we should also know what the advisory committee will be paid.

Naturally, the Minister is a little excited and nervous because he does not know whether he will be a Minister after tonight. I take the view that the right hon. Member for Huntingdon is not clever enough to get rid of him, but one never knows. The Minister of State, who wound up the debate on Second Reading, did not reply to my earlier question, so I hope that the Under-Secretary of State will reply to it now.

10.22 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Education and Science (Mr. Michael Fallon): I hope to be able to satisfy my right hon. Friend the Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) as well as the hon. Member for Bradford, South (Mr. Cryer). The hon. Gentleman mentioned two points which were central to the resolution, so it may be helpful if I explain what the resolution does. First, the expenses of the Secretary of State are simply those concerned with the operation of the advisory committee—the cost of its secretariat, its incidental expenses, any payments made to the chairman or members, and the publication of its report. Neither the chairman nor the members of the committee will be paid —they will receive expenses only, although the chairman may receive a fee per diem.

The advisory committee is likely to cost somewhat less than the interim advisory committee which it replaces because it has a narrower remit and a shorter period in which to report, and it is likely to pay fewer visits to schools.

Mr. Cryer: The Minister said that the Committee members will be paid nothing but expenses, and that is welcome. He also said that the chair and deputy chair will be paid a daily fee. What sort of fee does he have in mind?

Mr. Fallon: The same sort of per diem fee as applies to the interim advisory committee—there is no difference.

The second leg of the money resolution is required under procedures of the House because changes in teachers' pay arising from the new machinery will give rise to increases in local authority expenditure. It also covers the Secretary of State's grant to grant-maintained schools, which provides for all their expenses, including the pay of their teachers. I hope that the hon. Member for Bradford, South will be content with that reply and I commend the resolution to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Teachers' Pay and Conditions

Motion made, and Question proposed,

That the draft Teachers' Pay and Conditions Act 1987 (Continuation) Order 1990, which was laid before this House on 15th November, be approved.—[Mr. Eggar.]

10.25 pm

Ms. Hilary Armstrong (Durham, North-West): I suppose it's a funny old world. We have witnessed yet another circus act on the Government Benches, with a new Prime Minister in waiting who must be wondering tonight how he can reconcile his statements as Chancellor of the Exchequer with his commitments over the weekend as a candidate for the position of Prime Minister.

I am quite confident that the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) will turn his back on those promises and forget about them. One of his commitments was about raising teacher morale, which is important. However, he has been a member of a Government who have denied teachers the right to negotiate their salaries and conditions.

We are here tonight because of that denial of basic rights and opportunities. It is a denial of a right that is allowed to all other local authority personnel, to central Government personnel and even to people at GCHQ.

This is not an abstract point. People in staff rooms around the country feel excluded from having any role in constructing their own working conditions. Hon. Members in this place and even members of the Government would not tolerate that, as was reflected in the way in which Conservative Members behaved over the past few days.

The point is mirrored for teachers by a wide range of other experiences, including a lack of consultation over the national curriculum, over testing and over the whole paraphernalia of the Education Reform Act 1988. The Government constructed that Act so that it would not involve teachers, and the education service is reaping the whirlwind that the Act brought with it. We must now adapt to many of the issues in the Education Reform Act in the way that was predicted precisely because the Government refused to consult and negotiate with teachers.

We are being asked tonight to agree to an order which is directly responsible for low morale. Those who support the order are directly responsible for pushing down morale and for keeping it low. When the 1988 Act was introduced, the Government said that it would be temporary. We are told that a week is a long time in politics, but teachers in the staff rooms have had four years of the Act, and that seems like an eternity.

The 1988 Act has in no sense been temporary. This order seeks to continue something which no one would consider to be temporary. When the 1988 Act was passed, it was said that it would be replaced by an Act that had consent. We have spent today discussing that, and it must be clear to anyone, particularly from the contribution made by my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton South-East (Mr. Turner), that the new School Teachers' Pay and Conditions Bill does not have consent. The Government have not been able to achieve consent, because no one believes that the Government believe in consent. The Government have demonstrated powerfully that they are completely unable to negotiate. The interim advisory committee, introduced by the 1987 a produced some interesting and useful reports, as Friend the Member for Blackburn (Mr. Straw) s even in responding to those reports, the Gove history has been abysmal.

The first IAC report in April 1988 excee Secretary of State's cost limit by 6 per ce Government refused to fund the difference and education authorities had to find the extra money. IAC report rejected regional variations an differentials for teachers of subjects with staff sh Today, the Government made clear what they th that IAC recommendation.

In the second report in February 1989, the se was £80 million above the remit of £350 million. A Government refused to meet the shortfall, £25 mi met by savings in teachers' pension funds and the again, had to be found by local education autho

The third report, in 1990, again recomm settlement above the Government's remit—£133 Again, the Government ducked their responsib refused to meet the settlement agreed by the IAC. they decided on a phased increase, which mea rather than an increase of 9·3 per cent., teacher make do with an increase of 7·1 per cent.

I need hardly remind the House that, des magician-like qualities of the right hon. Mem Huntingdon, inflation is 10·9 per cent. The figur for themselves. I hope that, as someone who is dealing with figures, he will look at the figures a reconcile the contradictions within them, because we who suffer from those contradictions and dif but the children in the schools.

In the remit to the IAC in September, the Secretary of State—I hope that I do not have to again next week—did not give a limit of settleme committee. He directed that the cost of its recom tions should fall within the interquartile range o sector, non-manual settlements. But there overriding question, which the previous Secretary and the present one have not yet answered: Government fully fund the settlement that arises remit that they have given this year's IAC? That —the Government have cash-limited the amo local authorities can spend.

Despite the arguments between us and the some Conservative Members are unhappy to acc all know that teacher morale is low. As a s tonight's edition of the Evening Standard show teachers in London have left during the past two The fed-up teachers blame the exodus on poor pay status. The Government must address that iss have a responsibility tonight to assure us that fully fund any recommendation from the IAC.

I have outlined the Government's dismal r date. There has been much discussion today abou morale. The 1990 IAC report said:

"Any profession would be justifiably proud of th commitment on the part of the teachers we have m our school visits in all three years. However, com cannot by itself guarantee the success of the curren It needs to be underpinned by far higher morale tha found."

The IAC recognises that the commitments that and the promises that it tried to elicit from the of State would not solve the whole problem. But it thought that it was critical that any future pay settlement must be recognised by the Secretary of State and must be funded.

Other Members have spoken of teacher morale. It is not a political point to be thrown across the Chamber. I have to deal with that issue every time I go into a school. I do not try to put teachers down: far too many members of my family and friends are teachers and I value their health as much as I value my own. Last week, the Health and Safety Commission said that teachers probably suffer more stress than people in any other profession. I beg the Secretary of State to take the issue much more seriously than he appears to be prepared to do.

The order continues the work of the IAC. We are debating yet another order, even though, year after year, Secretaries of State have told us that we were debating the last one, and that matters would be sorted out. The Bill rejects many of the main tenets of the IAC reports. The IAC has agreed that a basic necessity is a basic national pay level with local variations, where necessary, on top of the basic amount. For the first time since the war, the Bill will change the whole basis of negotiations. We are being asked to continue the work of a body, one of whose major recommendations has just been rejected by the House.

Several hon. Members spoke about the International Labour Organisation. There is no doubt that the ILO utterly rejected the Government's view as contained in the 1987 Act. Its committee of experts said that the Act was in breach of article 4 of convention 98 on voluntary negotiation, and called upon the Government to modify the legislation to make voluntary negotiations possible. The Government have not modified the Act through the order, and we are being asked yet again to renew the order.

Sometimes the Government admit that teacher morale is low, but that admission depends on which Minister is speaking. They have denied teachers the rights given to other people. The Labour party has been talking about teacher morale for some time, not in order to lower it but to get it recognised. The Government are exploiting the commitment of teachers. Teachers have an enormous commitment to the job and to their children and they deserve our support and recognition. Teachers will soon know what the new Cabinet thinks of them and will see whether the new Prime Minister and his Cabinet are prepared to meet the demands in the IAC report. The Government should at last be prepared to recognise and value teachers with a worthwhile pay settlement.

10.38 pm

Mr. Matthew Taylor (Truro): I do not propose to delay the House because, like many hon. Members, I have already spent more than enough time debating education. All hon. Members must be bitterly disappointed at having to debate the order at all. Everybody wanted matters to move forward more quickly, so that proper pay machinery could be put in place earlier. Liberal Democrats predicted that we would be in the position that we are now in, even though Ministers argued otherwise. That has a certain inevitability about it.

I hope that the Minister will address some specific issues. First, I hope that he will outline the basis and remit within which the IAC will make its decision this year. That is important, given the teacher shortages, the problems with morale and the other difficulties referred to in the earlier debate. We need to know to what extent the IAC is being asked to look at that matter this year.

Secondly, there is the question of full funding or otherwise, which has already been raised. Perhaps the Minister could give the House a clear statement about the Government's commitment to meet the cost of the settlement that may be reached as a result of the IAC's deliberations.

Thirdly—this is also important—last year, the IAC made a recommendation that the government effectively rejected by deciding to phase the implementation instead of introducing it according to the recommendation. The result is the vast cuts in teachers' salaries against inflation during the three years of the IAC's recommendations. Do the Government intend to see a settlement—would they be prepared to see a settlement—that at least matches inflation and ensures that teachers' salaries are restored to their proper level according to the IAC, so that, when the new machinery that we debated earlier is implemented, we do not immediately have to make up for the Government's meanness in the past two or three years?

Finally, since a new Prime Minister will take office tomorrow, who is committed to a thorough review of teachers' salaries, do the Government intend that any account of that commitment should be taken in these deliberations? Have the Government already set in stone what the IAC will do this year or, if the Prime Minister does indeed seek a thorough review of teachers' salaries, will it be possible for any account of that to be taken in the settlement?

10.41 pm

The Minister of State, Department of Education and Science (Mr. Tim Eggar): I shall try to reply to the points raised by the hon. Members for Durham, North-West (Ms. Armstrong) and for Truro (Mr. Taylor). I am delighted that the atmosphere now is slightly less frenetic than 43 minutes ago. I hope that the hon. Member for Hackney, South and Shoreditch (Mr Sedgemore) is now tucked up safely in bed.

The interim advisory committee has been asked to build on the far-reaching improvements it recommended last year. The remit balances market forces against affordability. This is consistent with the Government's approach to pay across the board. It also acknowledges the need to continue improving teacher supply in areas where vacancy rates are a particular cause for concern, notably London and, as many of my hon. Friends said earlier, across the south-east. We have never sought to disguise the fact that there are shortages in certain subjects, as well as in some geographical areas.

The committee has been directed that the cost of its recommendations must fall within the inter-quartile range of non-manual pay settlements in the 12 months to November 1990. This constraint is the same as that which already applies to civil servants and will also have a role in the new permanent negotiating machinery that will be set up under the Bill, the Second Reading of which has just received such overwhelming support in the House. Incidentally, I thank the hon. Member for Truro and his hon. Friends for their support.

[Mr. Tim Eggar]

It is, of course, for the committee to decide what to recommend within that remit, taking account of what the local authorities can afford, but it allows for a very fair settlement to be reached——

Mr. Jack Straw (Blackburn) rose——

Mr. Eggar: I believe in a relaxed style at the Dispatch Box, but at 10.43 pm, after the debate that we have just had and after the week that we have all had, I hope that the hon. Gentleman will forgive me for not giving way to him. I shall be delighted, however——

Mr. Straw: It is only a simple question.

Mr. Eggar: That is exactly what I feared. I know my limitations.

We believe that the Bill allows for a fair settlement for teachers. The remit given to the IAC is, by definition, very fair, and the Government expect it to work within that remit. Of course, education standard spending includes an appropriate allowance to meet any considerations within that remit.

The Government believe that flexible pay systems, which allow the targeting of additional payments to meet specific needs, are the most cost-effective way of addressing any problem of recruitment and retention. The committee's remit for 1991-92 invites it to consider whether local flexibilities should be developed still further. Hon. Members referred to that point. The committee is currently considering evidence from interested parties. My right hon. and learned Friend has asked to receive its report by 18 January.

This time next year, the Teachers' Pay and Conditions Act 1987 will have been repealed. In the meantime, however, we need this order to extend the life of the Act beyond 31 March 1991, so as to pay teachers an increase next year. I commend it to the House and ask that it be approved.

Question put and agreed to.

Ordered,

That the draft Teachers' Pay and Conditions Act 1987 (Continuation) Order 1990, which was laid before this House on 15th November, be approved.

Pharmaceutical Companies (P

Motion made, and Question proposed, That do now adjourn.—[Mr. Neil Hamilton.]

10.45 pm

Mr. Andrew Hunter (Basingstoke): Humil to concede that other political develop somewhat overshadow this debate. Ne welcome the opportunity to introduce a brief predicament in which the United Kingdom cal industry finds itself, with particular em profitability and its importance.

My hon. Friend the Minister needs no rem importance of the pharmaceutical industry. source of products which alleviate huma Secondly, in commercial terms it acts as a inward investment into the United Kingdom. a provider of employment. Indeed, in the 197 employment in the industry rose dramatical the industry is an essential dimension to infrastructure of the United Kingdom. That the matter.

Research is the lifeblood of the ph industry, but there can be no research unle sufficient level of profitability. There cannot pharmaceutical industry in the United Kin research is taking place in the United King why I sought a debate on the profitability of

I am sure that my hon. Friend will hav about the importance of the industry. Rec described by Lord Walton of Detchant as "the jewel in our industrial crown."

I remind my hon. Friend that three of th medicines in the world, and seven of the top 2 in origin and development. The United Ki better record in pharmaceutical innovation th country. The top 50 products in the world under half the total prescription medicines those, 27·6 per cent. originate from the Unit which is more than the total figure of 29·8 pe rest of Europe. The United States figure is cent. That is a magnificent record.

It is worth stressing that the Unite pharmaceutical industry provides an expo more than £1 billion per year, compared wit national deficit of £15 billion this year and next year.

In a wide range of medical conditions, the new or improved medicines would alleviate misery—not least the two killers in develope refer to heart disease and cancer, which alo people in the United Kingdom than any ot ailments—nearly one third of a million peop

Advances in research cannot be made profitability to finance research. Only more research and development will help to find n treatments, but the costs of that investment and the returns for innovative companies are

Most important of all for a thriving Unit pharmaceutical industry is patent term resto is, effective patent protection. The 1989 report concluded that, between 1960 and 1 patent life was eroded from 12 years to arou I acknowledge that those are average figures a is considerable variation around the mean. Nevertheless, that degree of erosion over 25 years gives great cause for concern.

The ranges for other major European countries are somewhat higher, but the same downward trend is evident, though it is greater in the United Kingdom than elsewhere in Europe. My hon. Friend the Minister will be aware of the European Commission's draft regulation, which proposes an effective patent life of 16 years by the granting of "complementary protection certificates." That term was arrived at after careful consideration, and its authors maintain that it strikes the right balance. There is a great discrepancy between that proposed provision and current United Kingdom practice.

In the case of treatments for medical conditions such as multiple sclerosis, which are characterised by long periods of remission and which would therefore require longer periods of evaluation, there could still be no hope of bringing a product to market while any effective patent protection remained. In meeting that and similar situations, the EC directive is ineffective and United Kingdom practice is even more defective.

In the case of the more complex products of biotechnology, one can foresee a much longer product registration approval process. Where the approval process exceeded the life of the patent, no effective patent life would be left.

It may be argued that the Government, while accepting that some action needs to be taken, seem to believe that a patent term of 13 or 14 years would be appropriate. If I am mistaken, the Government have an opportunity, through my hon. Friend the Minister, to correct a false impression. Meanwhile, France and Italy, for example, are proposing a 17-year period, the United Kingdom 13 or 14 years, and the EC 16 years. While such trends persist, the United Kingdom pharmaceutical industry will continue to be at a disadvantage by comparison with its major competitors.

My hon. Friend the Minister will be aware that Dr. Heinz Redwood, a noted health economist, recently stated:

> "The purpose of patent restoration in the 1990s is not to save a relatively prosperous industry from failure but to underpin its resolve and to take a massive scientific and financial risk, in order to produce new drugs which society needs in order to cope with serious gaps in therapy."

With regard to generics and to patent term extension, the profitability of the industry in the United Kingdom has arguably been further threatened by the Government's encouragement of generic prescribing and parallel imports. One reason advanced against supporting the EC regulation is that it would blunt the generic initiative, and prices would rise rapidly. As I shall demonstrate, however, there is little evidence to support that view.

First, let us consider the position in which the pharmaceutical industry now finds itself. On the one hand, it is a research-based industry with an average effective patent life of approximately six years, which is entirely unacceptable. On the other hand, the Government are advocating generic prescribing and the use of the products of the generic industry. The indicative prescribing scheme was the re-writing of working paper IV of the White Paper. There, the Government set out to recommend generic prescribing and to allay any concerns about it. That is a questionable thesis in its own right, but it is profoundly worrying in its implications for the pharmaceutical industry.

Dr. Redwood has developed a hypothetical mod which calculates the effects of the EC proposals on the 100 medicines. Between 1990 and 1996, the annual ex cost would be a mere £10·2 million at 1988 prices—no significant debit, other points considered. In any case, recent NHS reforms, and the pharmaceutical pr regulation scheme will control pricing. I hope that my h Friend will acknowledge that generic extension is in its no El Dorado.

With regard to the profitability of the industry, price control regime has been almost too effective. T return on capital employed on sales to the NHS by industry has reduced from 16 per cent. in 1986 to abou per cent.—an unsatisfactory state of affairs. To take j two comparisons, the return on oil and gas investment h reduced over the same period from 28 per cent. to 16 cent. while that of food retailing remains at about 22 cent. My hon. Friend seems to disagree—I look forward hearing his comments, but I believe that with the NHS a major consumer, return on investment for pharmaceutical industry is arguably inadequate.

As a result of the flexible and encouraging polic pursued during the 1970s and 1980s, the United Kingdo is host to the international pharmaceutical industry. It h been encouraging to see United States and Europe companies expand manufacturing and research facilities the United Kingdom, providing high quality jobs a supporting an already strong scientific infrastructure.

Parent boards of such foreign multinationals are no beginning to have second thoughts about investment in t 1990s. We have a less favourable attitude to patent ter extension. We have a history of adverse legislation—t limited list of 1984, indicative prescribing in 1990, son concern about the workings of pharmaceutical pri regulation, and a generics industry endorsed a encouraged by the Government. We have decreasi profitability. Faced with those issues, and the welcon attitude being displayed in France, Germany and Italy, name but three countries, the future of pharmaceutic industry investment in the United Kingdom must now in doubt.

If we are to retain our lead in pharmaceutical inventio I urge my hon. Friend to review his position on pate term extension before the European Council of Ministe makes its final decision on the proposals. I urge him bear in mind the points that I have tried to make. T United Kingdom pharmaceutical industry is not a lan duck but a bird in flight. The question is whether th Government should inadvertently shoot it down.

10.59 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Heal (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): I congratulate my hon. Friend th Member for Basingstoke (Mr. Hunter) on having th opportunity to introduce the first Adjournment debate the new era. It shows his impeccable sense of timing. H has brought to the attention of the House an issue considerable importance to his constituents and th country. The issue is close to my heart, for in m constituency of Loughborough are based two majo British pharmaceutical companies—Fisons and Riker- and I do not need to be reminded of the importance of th industry as a key supplier to the national health servic and as a major employer and wealth creator for the Britis economy.

[Mr. Stephen Dorrell]

My hon. Friend talked of the "predicament" of the pharmaceutical industry. That is not the word that I would use. As he was at pains to make clear, the British pharmaceutical industry has behind it an almost unrivalled history of success in terms of its capacity to generate new products, wealth and jobs. It was one of the cornerstones of the success of the British economy during the 1980s. My constituency interest in the future of the industry merely adds to my belief and recognition from a Government perspective of the importance of the industry in our total industrial effort.

To illustrate the scale of the industry's success, I can add some statistics to those given by my hon. Friend. The United Kingdom is fifth in the world in terms of the scale of pharmaceutical production. The sales of the British pharmaceutical industry amount to about £5 billion a year, of which £2 billion is exported. The industry employs about 70,000 people directly, never mind those who have jobs as a result of its success. Those employees are substantially better paid than the average employee in British industry. Therefore, it is not merely an employer of labour but an employer of high-paid labour.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke was at pains to point out, the industry has a tremendous record in terms of its spend on research and development. A total of 14 per cent. of the entire world spend on pharmaceutical research and development takes place in these islands. My hon. Friend was too modest in his claim that seven of the world's 20 best selling medicines are based on United Kingdom research. I am advised the figure is eight, including the world's No. 1 pharmaceutical product—Zantac—which is a product of Glaxo.

By any definition, the British pharmaceutical industry is not in a "predicament". It is a world-beating industry, setting a pace and performance target that few other industries in this country or elsewhere can match. It is a tremendous success story. As a Minister with a key interest in the industry as a customer and as a representative of a constituency in which it is an important employer, I have asked what circumstances made that success possible. It is clearly in the interests of us all that those circumstances should continue, so that the success story can be maintained.

In considering what made it possible, one thing is clear. That did not happen because of the benign good will of a few civil servants in Whitehall. it is no thanks to the outdated ideas of industrial sponsorship in Whitehall Departments that we have a successful pharmaceutical industry. Its success is based upon high quality management and entrepreneurial decision taking by people in the industry, making the right decisions about the allocation of resources. It is a success story for British management, not a success story for British politicians.

That is the key factor that marked the industry out for success, but the Government cannot close their mind to the fact that the national health service is the largest single customer of the British pharmaceutical industry. As a customer, the Government have an important interest in ensuring its continued strength. Only if the industry continues to be strong can we expect it to continue to undertake the research that is necessary to ensure that British pharmaceutical technology continues to develop and to break new frontiers.

The Government are also properly co wider implications of the success of employment and wealth creation. purchasers from the pharmaceutical i Marks and Spencer is interested to ensur are vigorous, strong and able to conti needs next year as well as this year, Government keen to ensure that the right the continued success of the British industry, both because we rely on its stre needs of the national health service and want to ensure that its wealth-creating underwrite the success of that part of the

What are the key ingredients that success possible? A fair slice of my hon was devoted to the importance of pate new pharmaceutical products, based research. The Government share m recognition that proper patent protectio for an innovative industry. There are few record of innovation to match that of th industry.

I agree with my hon. Friend about t ensuring that there is in place a proper system that recognises the balance tha between the interests of a pharmaceut protect its right to use the fruits of its ow interests of the customer in not having to research three, four or five times over.

My hon. Friend will be aware that th been changes during the last 15 years protection available under patent law. 1977 extended the basic life of a patent from 16 to 20 years. The Copyright, De Act 1988 abolished the concept of prod right. That was an important change i

I agree with my hon. Friend that we the importance of the distinction in pate basic life of a patent from the time that or new active ingredient is patented—the testing process—and the protected mark product, once it is accepted for use as difference arises because of the time that i gain approval for a new compound. The life that is available to the company exploit the product in the marketplace c small proportion of the total length protection. That subject was research las Ross.

We recognise that that phenomenon talk of a patent life of 20 years doe products are available in the marketpla is important to assess the protected mar the total patent life, and to ask whet market life of a new product is becom Touche Ross report, to which my hon. made a contribution to that debate, but of the issue is continuing and I am not in him the conclusions that we have draw

We must not forget the other side of is not true to say that, the moment that out, a product is available for use in the is not true to say that, the moment that the company can no longer exploit th marketplace. There is a considerable beyond the life of patent protection, during which a company can continue commercially to exploit the results of its research.

My hon. Friend the Member for Basingstoke rightly said that those issues must be addressed in the domestic context and particularly in the context of the Commission's proposals. We are still considering exactly what response we should make, and we shall certainly bear in mind the points that he made.

My hon. Friend touched briefly on the operation of the pharmaceutical price regulation scheme, which I know from constituency experience to be of continuing concern to those charged with operating British pharmaceutical companies. My hon. Friend, and most people in the sector, will recognise that some rules on the exploitation of monopoly products are inevitable. The industry recognises that some rules are inevitable and that they work to its advantage, because it has signed the PPRS, which is a voluntary agreement between the industry and the Government, who represent the national health service, the largest single customer of the industry.

The PPRS is based on the proposition that it is not sensible to try to cost each product in each form of delivery, but more sensible to base our agreement on the concept of return on investment achieved by a pharmaceutical company in the supply of goods to the national health service. My hon. Friend quoted a return on investment of 7 per cent., which is not the figure by which we work. The target returns by which we work under the PPRS are between 17 and 21 per cent., which my hon. Friend will not regard as comparing too badly with the other industries that he used by way of comparison.

We recognise that, if we want to maintain a viable, strong and successful industry, we must ensure tha who operate within it can secure a reasonable mar of return on their investments in the industry, which the targets are fixed that level. From my p experience in industry, I know that they are not unr rates of return to fix in a relatively secure marke must remember that, over and above those rates is t area, whereby a company can keep up to 50 per cer its target profit if it can demonstrate that that extr was generated as a result of specific and iden productivity gains in the supply and production of of products.

My hon. Friend, if I may say so, exaggerated the to which the PPRS makes the production and pharmaceutical products to the national health ser uneconomic business proposition. I do not doubt f moment that we apply downward pressure on through the PPRS—that is its precise purpose—bu realistic scheme that allows a successful industry to a realistic return on the investment made in the prod and sale of pharmaceutical products.

The most important factor is that the Governmen recognise that there is potential and limitation i position. We shall be a responsible, informed purch pharmaceutical products. We want our suppli pharmaceutical products to be viable, successful panies tomorrow. We want this vital British indus continue its record of success into the future. We that primary responsibility for that must rest w management. Our role is that of the responsible purc and we shall seek to continue to discharge it.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at fifteen minutes past Ele

House of Commons

Wednesday 28 November 1990

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PRIVATE BUSINESS

ADELPHI ESTATE BILL

Read the Third time, and passed.

Oral Answers to Questions

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Cyprus

1. Mr. Haynes: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what progress has been made on the problem of Cyprus.

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office (Mr. Tristan Garel-Jones): We want to see a comprehensive, just and lasting settlement of the Cyprus problem. The United Nations Secretary-General's initiative has our strong and active support. The secretary-general's special representative is continuing to pursue separate discussions with all parties to the dispute.

Mr. Haynes: As the Minister is a new boy at the Foreign Office, will he come with me to visit that beautiful island so that he can see its problems at first hand? Tragically, the island is divided and in the north there are foreign troops from the mainland of Turkey, and all sorts of armaments. We need to know where the people missing from the southern part of the island have gone. Therefore, will the Minister come with me to look round to see what we can do about those problems and sort them out once and for all?

Mr. Garel-Jones: Like most hon. Members, I would go to the ends of the earth with the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes). I agree that it is tragic that the island should be divided in that way and that there are several refugee and human rights problems. We think that the best way forward is by supporting the United Nations initiative, and that is what Her Majesty's Government are doing.

Sir Dudley Smith: I know that the Government believe in the rights of minorities, but will my hon. Friend address the problem more positively, because it has dragged on for many years? Is he aware that, but for the robust efforts of President Denktash in northern Cyprus, there would have been mayhem and bloodshed a long time ago?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I reject the proposition that the Government are not addressing the problem robustly. We have committed to the United Nations peacekeeping force 700 British troops, and that underlines the desire of Her Majesty's Government to bring about a peaceful and proper accord that unites the island.

Mr. Anderson: I congratulate Foreign Office Ministers on their apparent survival. The secretary-general's initiative seems effectively to be stalled, or even in retreat, following the recent decision of Mr. Denktash to delegate responsibility for contact with the United Nations to a deputy. Does the Minister appreciate the sense of frustration and impatience in Cyprus at the continued tragic division of that island? Has consideration been given to further initiatives to break the deadlock?

Mr. Garel-Jones: The hon. Gentleman has expressed the frustration that hon. Members on both sides of the House feel about the continued tragic division. We do not believe that the United Nations initiative has run out of steam. It continues to enjoy the full support of Her Majesty's Government.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Mark Lennox-Boyd): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall answer Questions 2 and 6 together. [HON. MEMBERS: "Question 7."] Questions 2 and 6.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Question 6 is about Bulgaria.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker. A question has been withdrawn and the numbering has not been changed.

BBC World Service

2. Mr. Harris: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the future of the BBC World Service.

7. Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether he will make a statement on the future of the BBC World Service.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: This year's autumn statement provided for real growth of resources for the BBC World Service during the next three years. That will enable it to improve still further the excellent service that it provides.

Mr. Harris: I welcome that answer, but does my hon. Friend accept that the Gulf crisis is just the latest in a long series of international events, which prove beyond doubt the vital importance of the World Service in providing an impartial source of news to so many countries? Does my hon. Friend accept that, as in the case, for example, of one of my constituents whose husband is, unfortunately, a hostage in Kuwait or Iraq, the message service of the World Service is the only link with people in the Gulf in this time of crisis? As we approach Christmas could there possibly be a further increase in the amount of time made available for such messages?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: I am happy to endorse my hon. Friend's congratulations to the World Service, which has been especially good during the Gulf crisis. The Arabic service has been increased to 10·5 hours a day and the English service is maintained at 24 hours a day. The Gulf link programme, to which my hon. Friend referred, is invaluable for families in Britain to send messages to their relatives. I am happy to say that in the past two weeks the World Service has extended that programme to 45 minutes a day, and we hope that that will provide an adequate facility for families to communicate with their relatives before Christmas.

Mr. Bennett: Is my hon. Friend aware that the BBC World Service has more listeners than Voice of America and is excellent value for money? In view of its excellent work last year in broadcasting information to eastern European countries and other formerly totalitarian countries, will he look sympathetically on any applications by the BBC for extra broadcasting to countries that are still non-democratic?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: Yes, my hon. Friend is correct. The World Service plays a vital role in giving information to closed societies. It is the most successful of all the overseas broadcasting services. It has 120 million regular listeners, the highest in the world, even though its output is fifth in hours. None the less, in recent years its output has increased and it is now the highest that it has been since the 1950s.

Mr. Home Robertson: Does the Minister recognise the urgent need for more information and entertainment for British forces deployed in the Gulf? Does he further recognise that the World Service and other broadcasting functions could be used most appropriately, to assist those people doing an important job in that area? Will the Minister make a statement on that?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The content of programmes is a matter for the World Service, but I shall ensure that the hon. Gentleman's suggestion and comments are passed on to it.

Mr. Menzies Campbell: As the radio service has proved to be so successful, will the Government look favourably on the suggestion that there should be a BBC world television service as well?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: BBC TV Europe is part of BBC Enterprises, not part of the World Service. Commercial arrangements are for the BBC and we wish it well in its endeavours in that respect.

Mr. Allason: Does my hon. Friend agree that the most important priority must be English language broadcasting around the world and that before we concentrate on some rather obscure third-world languages, we should at least be able to get the right transmitter sites and the right frequencies around the world? For example, is my hon. Friend aware that it is not possible to listen to the World Service in north America between 10 am and 8 pm?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: As my hon. Friend will be aware, during the past 10 years there has been an increase in the audibility programme. It was begun in 1981 to improve audibility and it is almost complete. It has involved expenditure of £100 million or more in 1981 prices so, in that respect, the World Service has done well.

Mr. Kaufman: Will the Minister disregard the idiotic question just asked of him by the hon. Member for Torbay (Mr. Allason)? It is an absurd notion that languages such as Arabic and Chinese are unimportant and should be disregarded and that the peoples of all the countries of the world should be expected to learn idiomatic English. It is important that we provide proper services throughout the world, especially at times of crisis. Will the Government reconsider the Minister's stodgy answers about television services? When I was in the Gulf, and in other places t I was told time and again that people there cannot en impartial television coverage but have to rely on Ca News Network rather than the BBC's high-qua broadcasts. It is time that the Government changed th policy and offered proper financing for a world televis service.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: No, I cannot accept either of right hon. Gentleman's suggestions. I am sure that h aware that English is the lingua franca in many parts of world, and that it is immensely important to maint English language broadcasting. Nevertheless, my h Friend the Member for Torbay (Mr. Allason) was advocating a cut in World Service foreign langua programmes. As to the right hon. Gentleman's secc point, ITN has started a commercial world televis service without making use of public funds. If ITN can so, that must be the way forward.

Romania

3. Mr. Irvine: To ask the Secretary of State for Fore and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement the progress of reform in Romania.

13. Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he make a statement on the progress of reform in Roma

The Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwea Office (Mr. Douglas Hogg): Romania has made so progress on democratic reform since the grave setback June. We are also encouraged by the start of econo reform. However, we urge the Romanian Government press ahead with further moves to transform Romania i a genuine free-market democracy.

Mr. Irvine: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree t it is important to make it clear to the Roman Government that the more thoroughgoing their imp mentation of political, democratic and economic refor the greater will be the amount of aid Romania can exp to receive from Britain and other western countries?

Mr. Hogg: I could not have put the position clea myself. At my recent meeting with the Roman ambassador, I took the opportunity to make precisely same point.

Mr. Winterton: I apologise for my lack of voice, wh I am sure will be welcome—[HON. MEMBERS: "He hear."]—in some parts of the House. Will my hon. a learned Friend tell the Romanian Government that deplore the continuation of undemocratic procedures that country and that no aid can be provided until refo is genuinely under way? In that connection, certainly aid should be made available until the media are accessi to opposition parties and other democratic groups.

Mr. Hogg: This is the first time in my life that I h had some difficulty in hearing my hon. Friend the Mem for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton). His substantive poi are wholly correct. As to the important issue of the mec the Romanian press is fairly free, but there is yet m progress to be made in respect of television and radio. hon. Friend is right to say that more progress must made also with economic liberalisation and political reform before the British Government would give aid to Romania.

Mr. Flynn: Does not the Minister see a great danger in the policy suggested by the hon. Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton), in that if Romania were to be cut off, it might return to the dark days of isolation that it suffered under Ceausescu? The Government have claimed in a ludicrous way all the responsibility for the welcome changes that have occurred in introducing democracy to eastern bloc countries. They should acknowledge also that, in addition to the great difficulties that those countries face in creating new economies, democracy and independence, they are confronted by problems arising from the Gulf crisis, including oil shortages, and a collapsing Soviet economy. Unless the newly democratised countries receive our support, they will face a very harsh winter.

Mr. Hogg: The hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) was rather unfair to my hon. Friend the Member for Macclesfield (Mr. Winterton). The hon. Gentleman will be pleased to know that giving humanitarian aid, either bilaterally or through the European Commission, is not subject to the criteria that we discussed earlier. There is a balance to be struck. The general view is that one should not extend aid of the type that we have been discussing unless there is clear evidence of progress towards political reform and economic liberalisation. It is most certainly true that Romania has made progress in both areas, but our own judgment—it is shared by the G24 meeting that took place at the end of October—is that sufficient progress has not yet been made.

Middle East

4. Mr. John Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he next plans to meet the Israeli Foreign Minister to discuss the middle east peace process.

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Douglas Hurd): I met the Israeli Foreign Minister on 16 October. We discussed middle east issues, including the peace process. I have no firm plans to meet Mr. Levy again, but we agreed to stay in closer contact in future.

Mr. Marshall: Does my right hon. Friend agree that peace will come to the middle east only when Saddam Hussein is forced to disgorge his gains and give up his nuclear potential and stock of chemical weapons? Will he remind those who seek to appease that tinpot dictator that such a course of action would not provide peace in the middle east, but would merely encourage other dictators elsewhere in the world to engage in acts of aggression?

Mr. Hurd: I hope to make a statement after Question Time on that issue, but I agree with the thrust—[Interruption.]—the thrust of what my hon. Friend said. I am not sure that people in this country are yet fully aware of the test of the international community's will that will be involved in meeting the objectives that my hon. Friend rightly set out.

Mrs. Dunwoody: Is the Secretary of State aware that constant incursions into Israel from neighbouring states will not be the way to encourage the Israeli people to support peace moves? Will he make it clear in his talks with Arab nations, as well as with the Israelis, that this country supports the maintenance of peace, and we certainly support the integrity of Israel's borders?

Mr. Hurd: Israel is entitled to security behind confirmed, secure borders. I agree with the hon. Lady that the sort of killings that have again been reported in the past few days—for example, on the border between Israel and Egypt—can serve no purpose whatever, except to retard the peace process. Equally, it is important that the Israeli Government should understand that the security of Israel cannot reasonably rest for ever on the occupation of the west bank, the Gaza strip or indeed, in our view, east Jerusalem. So neither the occupation nor the violence against the occupation from across the borders of Israel in any way helps the matter.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend: Bearing in mind the fact that the Government correctly recognise the right of self-determination of the Palestinian people, would not it be sensible for the Government also to support the concept of a Palestinian state, bearing it in mind that that would be the logical conclusion of such self-determination?

Mr. Hurd: It might be—but I believe that it is more sensible and more logical to support the right to Palestinian self-determination without advocating a specific outcome. We have never specifically advocated a Palestinian state, as opposed to other conceivable outcomes that have been canvassed, such as a confederal link with Jordan. I do not think that it is for us to specify that. We have said that the right of self-determination exists and that it will have to be respected as part of a comprehensive and negotiated settlement, which must also include provision for the security of Israel.

Mr. Kaufman: May I welcome the right hon. Gentleman back to the Dispatch Box. The number of votes cast for him yesterday was a reflection not on him, but on the intelligence and discernment—or lack of them—of his right hon. and hon. Friends—[Interruption.]

Mr. Holt: That is out of order.

Mr. Speaker: It may have been out of order but it was very human.

Mr. Kaufman: May I ask—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Kaufman: The unruliness among Tory Members would make one think that they were still trying to get rid of the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher).

Will the right hon. Gentleman join me in deploring the deaths of Israelis and Palestinians over the past few days? Does he agree that the deaths of young people on both sides of the divide are unnecessary and pointless but will go on taking place until the peace process gets under way? Does he further agree that those who stand in the way of the peace process must take their share of responsibility for the continuing loss of life? Will he urge the Israelis to see sense and take part in the peace process?

Mr. Hurd: I am obliged to the right hon. Gentleman, but I have always found his compliments rather more damaging than his criticisms. Again, I agree with the basic thrust of his final point. In my answer to the hon. Member for Crewe and Nantwich (Mrs. Dunwoody), I deplored the killings that have taken place recently. It is clear that the sporadic acts of violence by whomsoever committed are retarding the process because they make it more difficult for reasonable people to come together and negotiate. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman about that. Once the aggression against Kuwait is reversed, the international community has to make a fresh effort to seek a solution to the Arab-Israel dispute. That will involve fresh thinking by the Palestine Liberation Organisation, the Arab states and the Israeli Government.

Bulgaria

6. Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he has any plans to visit Bulgaria.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has no plans to visit Bulgaria at present.

Mr. Stern: I am grateful to my hon. and learned Friend for that reply. If he or his right hon. Friend has an opportunity to visit Bulgaria in the near future, will he advise whichever political party has failed to avoid taking power that week that the continual shilly-shallying and niggling while the economy collapses is doing no good to the country's reputation and risks losing the good will that was gained on its rapid transition to democracy earlier this year?

Mr. Hogg: We are anxious to see Bulgaria move fast towards a process of economic liberalisation and political reform. I suspect that that involves a high degree of bipartisanship within the country. That is the observation that I would put to Bulgarian Ministers and officials should I meet them. Clearly, a bipartisan approach to such policies will enhance the country's reputation within the international community and domestically.

Mr. Tredinnick: At a time when unity is on the minds of Conservative Members, will my right hon. Friend accept my congratulations on the great contribution that he has made to unity in the past 24 hours? Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that the way to unify both sides of the House in the European currency debate is the hard ecu, which offers——

Mr. Speaker: Order. This is about Bulgaria.

Mr. Tredinnick: Does my hon. and learned Friend agree that were Bulgaria to join the European Community, the hard ecu would be of great relevance to it?

Mr. Hogg: I have received many compliments in my life, and those that I cherish most were made indirectly and unintentionally. But I do not think that I have ever contributed to unity in this place or anywhere else. If my hon. Friend meant my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State, I entirely agree.

Drugs Trade

8. Mr. David Martin: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what support is being given to the international offensive against the drugs trade.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We play a leading role in the fight against drugs, not only through direct assistance to countries such as Colombia, but through our participatio in the activities of the United Nations, the Europea Community and the Council of Europe.

Mr. Martin: Will my hon. Friend confirm that w continue to enjoy the closest possible co-operation wit the United States of America in combating this evil trade Will he highlight any recent successes, especially in th Caribbean and the dependent territories?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We co-operate fully with the Unite States authorities in drug enforcement. We have had som particular success in the British dependent territories fo which we must take direct responsibility. I am happy to te my hon. Friend that in the British Virgin Islands i November, 614 kg of cocaine were confiscated, and in S Vincent in October, 317 kg of cocaine were confiscate

Mr. Corbett: Those finds show not success but growin amounts of cocaine washing round the world. What step are the Government taking to encourage co-operation b the nations of eastern Europe and the Soviet Union? Th fact that their borders are more open makes it easier t smuggle drugs into this country.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The hon. Gentleman is correct: w must pursue further contacts with the Soviet Union an eastern Europe. We are taking a lead in the bilater contacts with eastern Europe on drugs, and I am happy t tell the hon. Gentleman that plans are under way for east-west Europe ministerial conference on drugs in Osl next spring.

Kuwait

9. Mr. Andrew MacKay: To ask the Secretary of Stat for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make further statement on the future of Kuwait.

Mr. Hurd: I hope to make a fuller statement aft questions, but I can tell my hon. Friend that in accordanc with the Security Council resolutions we remai committed to bringing about the restoration of Kuwait independence and its legitimate Government. We welcom the outcome of the Kuwaiti people's conference in Ta' which agreed a framework for future political advanc ment in Kuwait.

Mr. MacKay: Does my right hon. Friend agree that th one happy affair in this tragic circumstance has been th role of the United Nations, particularly that of th Security Council? It is encouraging for the new worl order that is developing that its permanent members hav agreed to so many positive resolutions.

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is right. There is a chanc that the Security Council will establish itself in the role fo which its founders designed it—as the supreme politic authority of the international community which can tak decisions, as opposed to simply uttering decisions, that ar respected. We are not there yet, but my hon. Friend is rig that there is a chance.

Mr. Ron Brown: Surely Saddam Hussein cannot be a that bad if he hates Thatcherism. As that lady has parte with her philosophy to stand in Dallas or elsewhere, migh the House look at the issue more clearly? Saddam Husse makes sense in some respects. he says that there must b dialogue, settlement and a peaceful solution to a very b problem. He says that, but, more important, the British community there, whom I met a short time ago, also say it. Does the Secretary of State agree that they want the British Government to achieve some solution which makes sense without going to war, because war would be costly in human and economic terms? What will the Secretary of State——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member has asked his question.

Mr. Brown: It is important to people in this country and, more important, to people——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman's question is too long.

Mr. Hurd: To say that the hon. Gentleman's conduct and remarks on this matter are silly is to pay him a compliment. Labour Front-Bench spokesmen are following the tradition of the Labour party, which believes in collective security. In the days of the League of Nations, that sometimes led the Labour party into great difficulty. Now, when the Security Council is beginning to make collective security real, is the time for all people who genuinely believe in an international order to rally to its support. In place of that, and not just today, the hon. Gentleman has been blurring the issue. He has, with others, been helping to give the aggressor the idea that the issue can be confused and that somehow he can go away with part of his spoils. The hon. Gentleman is doing no service to peace by the line that he takes.

Sir Jim Spicer: In the context of Kuwait today, will my right hon. Friend do all in his power to ensure that our poor citizens who are in hiding in Kuwait know from him and from the House that we view their situation with horror and that we shall do all in our power to ensure that this wretched man is thrown out of Kuwait at the earliest opportunity?

Mr. Hurd: The position of the approximately 450 British citizens who are now in hiding in Kuwait weighs daily on all of us who know about their situation. That is one reason why Her Majesty's ambassador in Kuwait remains at his duties, despite the difficulties. My hon. Friend is entirely right. The messages and the views that we receive from these, our fellow citizens, are exactly the opposite of the view expressed by the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Brown).

Mr. Redmond: The Secretary of State will agree that, after a conflict, the victors and the vanquished get round the table to discuss solutions to the problems. If we want a peaceful solution, it is obvious that a dialogue must take place. Will the right hon. Gentleman consider Colonel Gaddafi's seven-point plan for starting a dialogue to find a solution to the middle east problem?

Mr. Hurd: No one in his senses has any wish or appetite for war as a solution to this problem. There is a peaceful solution and it lies entirely in the hands of President Saddam Hussein. He has to comply fully with the resolutions, not of the President of the United States or the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, but of the Security Council of the United Nations.

Consular Services

10. Mr. Amess: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations have been made to his Department on the quality of its consular services; and whether he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Foreign and Commonwealth Office—and individual consular officers—receive many appreciative letters from British travellers whom they have helped when in difficulty overseas.

Mr. Amess: Although I recognise the excellent help that our consular services provide to deal with urgent cases, does my hon. Friend agree that, because of increasing travel abroad, some of the relatively minor matters that are brought to their attention have placed a strain on them? Does he agree that one way of dealing with the matter would be to encourage self-reliance and to encourage people to take out individual insurance policies?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: In 1989, 30 million people travelled from Britain abroad, 7 million of them to Spain. Six million British citizens live overseas. My hon. Friend is correct that, inevitably, the great growth in travel imposes strains on the consular services. I emphasise that in cases of great need and bereavement, the consular service is a magnificent service which is always there to help, but my hon. Friend is right that people must look after themselves in dealing with small problems, particularly by taking out insurance.

Mr. Beggs: Was the first secretary at the British embassy in Washington representing Government policy on Northern Ireland when he called for sacrificial lambs, thereby implying that the Fair Employment Commission in Northern Ireland should discriminate against innocent employers?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: We are looking into that report, but it sounds as though it is distorted.

Antarctica

11. Mr. Tony Banks: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions he has had with the Government of Australia regarding their proposals for designating the Antarctic a wilderness park.

17. Mr. McKelvey: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement about the recent conference in Santiago on the future of Antarctica.

Mr. Garel-Jones: We have had no discussions with the Government of Australia regarding their proposals for designating Antarctica a wilderness park.

The Australian high commissioner and the French ambassador called on me on 30 October to deliver their Governments' joint proposals for a new convention for the protection of the Antarctic environment. Officials from the Foreign and Commonwealth Office and other Departments are currently attending the 11th special consultative meeting of the Antarctic treaty parties in Vina del Mar, Chile, and it is likely that discussion of designating Antarctica a world park will take place there.

Mr. Banks: The Minister has the well-deserved reputation of being one of the most Machiavellian Members of the House. He may be able to deceive half the Cabinet about his true voting intentions—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. This sort of thing takes up a lot time, and it has nothing to do with the question.

Mr. Banks: —but I do not think that he should try to deceive the British people. A statement was made before the Chile conference, giving a clear indication that the British Government would support the proposal to turn the Antarctic into a wilderness park but what has been said so far at the Chile conference clearly demonstrates that that is not the Government's position. They still support the extraction of minerals from the Antarctic.

What is the Government's true position? Is it to be a wilderness park or the extraction of minerals? The Minister cannot take it both ways.

Mr. Garel-Jones: The position of Her Majesty's Government is to attempt to seek consensus in regard to Antarctica. We have made it perfectly clear that, to achieve that, we are prepared to listen to all the options put forward by other signatories of the Antarctic treaty.

Mr. Jacques Arnold: Will my hon. Friend give us some more detail about the existing convention on the regulation of Antarctic resource activities—CRAMRA—and how it uses international consensus to save the Antarctic environment, especially from mineral extraction?

Mr. Garel-Jones: It may be worth reminding the House that CRAMRA was introduced by consensus; it was not a departure introduced by the British Government. It has been agreed to by 18 of the signatory parties. We have made it clear, however, that if consensus on this matter no longer lies with CRAMRA, we shall attempt to be the focus of a new consensus to protect the environment.

Dr. Thomas: I am sure that the Minister will accept that a consensus is achieved when the parties propose various stances. He still has not told us what the Government's position is. What is it?

Mr. Garel-Jones: As the hon. Gentleman will know, the conference in Chile was called by Britain to protect the environment. I think that the House should understand that Britain has not been dragged to the conference—indeed, Britain called it.

We have already presented our own protocol for environmental protection which covers environmental impact assessment, tourism, waste disposal, marine pollution and habitat protection. As I think the House knows, all those issues pose an immediate threat to the environment in Antarctica. I am sure that the House will be pleased to learn that the protocol presented by the British delegation has already received a great deal of support from 10 consultative parties, as well as from the five proposing countries. It should be clear that the first thing that Britain has done in the conference is address the immediate threat posed by pollution to the environment in Antarctica.

The threat posed by mining exists, but it is not an immediate one; the immediate threat to Antarctica is caused by tourism, oil pollution and so forth. As I said, if there is no consensus around CRAMRA, Britain the lead in trying to find a way of achieving cons this difficult issue.

Mr. Bellingham: As my hon. Friend is the Mini responsibility for the polar regions, he will be inte hear that recently I received a large petition f constituents who would like Antarctic to be turn wilderness park. Is he aware that many c constituents expressed support and approval positive and constructive attitude that my hon. Fr shown?

Mr. Garel-Jones: I am grateful to my hon. Fri to many hon. Members and members of the pu have put their views to the Government. It is imp stress that those views have, I hope, enabled us t the Government's position more clearly to the ma Members who take an interest in the matter and, them, to members of the public.

Mr. Foulkes: Is not it true that the Minister received a relatively modest welcome as a new b the Foreign Office from the organisations concern the Antarctic when he said that he had no rigid c to a world park, now appears to have been no Foreign Office officials? His delegate in Chile put a plan which does not include a mining arrangements for enforcement. Will the Minister the Dispatch Box, re-assert his authority? He say is prepared to listen. Will he now talk to the A Government and support the idea of an Antarct park? If he does not, the next Labour Governm

Mr. Garel-Jones: I recognise, of course, that th issue is difficult and that it may run for some tim will have to run for a considerable time before Gentleman and his party have any say in the ou

The proposal that our delegation put forward del Mar seeks to address the immediate enviro threats to Antarctica. As I said, that proposal see gathering consensus around it. It is true that th issue must also be resolved, but we know of no o world who is intending to mine or is interested i in Antarctica. Therefore, although that issue is im it is not as great a threat as the immediate enviro threats. We have put forward our proposals. certainly tackle the mining issue with an entir mind and we will listen to any proposals arou consensus may be seen to gather.

Japan (Whaling)

12. Mr. Amos: To ask the Secretary of S Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will Japanese Foreign Minister to discuss the c slaughter of whales, dolphins and porpoises, in de the international moratorium.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Japanese Government aware of our views on the killing of whales, dolp porpoises.

Mr. Amos: I am grateful to my hon. Friend reply, but will he have another meeting with the Minister and make it even clearer to him that w deceived by their rapacious, duplicitous and selfis in killing whales because we know that they a them not for scientific research but for human consumption? Will my hon. Friend tell the Japanese Minister that we will not allow Japan to continue to fly in the face of world opinion on this very important ecological and environmental matter?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Government very much share my hon. Friend's views about the undesirability of the Japanese position. On two previous occasions in the past two years we co-sponsored resolutions at the International Whaling Commission calling on Japan to reconsider its programme. We feel that that is the best forum in which to pursue our objectives. I have no doubt that we will adopt a similar position, should circumstances continue to warrant it, at the next International Whaling Commission meeting in May.

Mr. Flannery: The Minister outlined some of the facts and referred to our contacts, but he failed to answer the question. We have great connections with Japan and the Japanese have many factories here and contacts with this country. Will the Minister use his influence to prevail upon the Japanese in a friendly manner to stop killing these noble animals just for profit? That is what they are doing.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: The Japanese are well aware of our views, which we continue to express. My point is that if we make our views known at the next commission meeting, we shall have the support of other people and maximum pressure will be brought to bear.

Mr. Robert Banks: Is not this slaughter utterly disgraceful? Views and representations are having no effect on the Japanese. Is not it time for countries such as Britain to take direct action by starting to ban certain products from Japan until the Japanese obey the moratorium?

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My hon. Friend is not quite right. In many areas the pressure that we have brought to bear on the Japanese Government has undoubtedly paid dividends. We expressed our concern about Dall's porpoises to the Japanese Government. In 1989, as a result of a report from the International Whaling Commission scientific committee, the Japanese catch of Dall's porpoise was unsustainable and the Japanese have now reduced the number that they catch. Our pressure is beginning to bear fruit and we shall proceed in the way that I have outlined.

Palestine

14. Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last made representations to the Israeli authorities about the arrest and detention of Palestinians in the occupied territories.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: During the visit of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to Israel in October, he put to members of the Israeli Government our position on the treatment of Palestinians in the occupied territories. We have made clear our concern about the recent detention of three Palestinian leaders: they should be charged or released. I made this plain to the Israeli ambassador last week, together with our view that administrative detention is unacceptable.

Ms. Primarolo: I am grateful to the Minister for that answer. However, will he again press the Israeli authorities specifically about the three prominent Palestinians who have been arrested without charge and gaoled without trial in circumstances that continue to inflame the already difficult situation in the west bank and Gaza? At this time of pressing for peace in the region, we should make it clear to the Israeli authorities that administrative detention is not a way to deal with people whom they believe may have committed crimes.

Mr. Hogg: I agree with what the hon. Lady said about administrative detention. I do not think that it is right, as I told the Israeli ambassador last week and as I shall do so again should convenient and appropriate circumstances arise. People who are held should be either charged or released. The process of administrative detention is not conducive to peace or to reconciliation.

Mr. Soames: Was my hon. and learned Friend able to garner from the Israeli ambassador any reason why the Israelis—who, after all, must know more about the terror of persecution than any other race on earth—should treat the Palestinians in such a contemptible manner?

Mr. Hogg: The Israeli ambassador advanced a number of arguments, but, in my view, the arguments in favour of administrative detention were unpersuasive and unacceptable.

Middle East

15. Mr. Home Robertson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the implementation of United Nations resolutions affecting the middle east.

Mr. Hurd: The Security Council resolutions are crucial for peace and stability in the middle east. The vast majority of members of the international community, including Britain, have confirmed their intention to comply with the resolutions on the Gulf crisis. Once the Iraqi aggression has been reversed, we shall play our full part in the Security Council to carry forward the search for a just and durable solution to the Arab-Israeli dispute.

Mr. Home Robertson: Does the Secretary of State accept that all the resolutions—those involving Palestine as well as those relating to the Gulf—must be implemented if there is to be stability in the middle east and that it is reasonable to set deadlines? Nobody wants a war—not even on a dry Saudi hogmanay. Having visited the Gulf area with the Select Committee on Defence and seen for myself the firepower that is now ranged against the Iraqi occupation forces in Kuwait, may I urge the Foreign Secretary to do everything in his power to convince Saddam Hussein that his position is indefensible in every imaginable sense of that word and that he must now withdraw if he is to preserve peace in that part of the world?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman's question is helpful. That is precisely the point. All the efforts, sometimes well-meaning efforts, to blur the position are fading away. The hon. Gentleman's remarks after his visit to the desert show that the issue is becoming clearer: either Saddam Hussein must leave Kuwait in peace or he will be forced out.

Mr. Favell: I know that my right hon. Friend is acutely aware that the families of hostages in Iraq and Kuwait are suffering hardship. Do the Government have any plans to relieve their financial burden?

Mr. Hurd: We are trying to assist both the hostages and their families. We are in close touch with the Department of Social Security. In addition, I have been in close touch, for example, with the chairman of British Telecom about telephone calls. We are helping the Gulf Support Group, organised by my hon. Friend the Member for Kingswood (Mr. Hayward). We have our own Gulf support centre in the Foreign Office. We are always open to ideas by means of which we can give further help, but the help that we are giving to relieve anxiety and, indeed, stress is already substantial.

Iran

19. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the United Kingdom's relations with Iran.

Mr. Hurd: We restored relations with Iran on 27 September on the basis of mutual respect and non-interference in each other's affairs. As a result, the British embassy in Tehran opened on 28 October and the Iranian embassy here opened on 2 November.

Mr. Coombs: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that in the past week no fewer than 700 parliamentarians from throughout the world, including 140 from Britain, have issued a condemnation of the Iranian Government for persistent human rights violations? Will he also confirm that within the past month alone, no fewer than 116 official executions have been admitted by the Iranians, to add to almost 450 further executions this year, some of them carried out in the most bestial manner? Will he do what he can in the United Nations and elsewhere to make the Iranian Government understand that such human rights abuses are not acceptable anywhere in the world, particularly by reference to Islamic law?

Mr. Hurd: As my hon. Friend knows, recently the United Nations special representative, Mr. Galindo Pohl, issued a new report covering some of the points that my hon. Friend mentioned. We are now considering, as we must, with our European colleagues, what line we should take when the report comes to the third committee of the United Nations general assembly which deals with human rights issues. However, I hope that my hon. Friend will accept the seriousness with which we take the matter.

Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe

20. Mr. Archer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs whether, at the forthcoming conference on security and co-operation in Europe, he will propose a limitation of arms sales to the developing world.

22. Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the outcome of the conference on security and co-operation in Europe summit in Paris on 19 to 21 November.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: Arms sales are not within the scope of the agreements endorsed at the CSCE summit in Paris on 21 November, but we maintain strict controls on all arms exports.

We welcome the adoption by the CSCE summit of the Paris charter. It expresses a universal commitment by all the CSCE states to the principles of democracy, to rights and to economic liberty, and sets out a new s of CSCE activity. My right hon. Friend the Mem Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) gave the House an acc the CSCE summit in her statement to the House la

Mr. Archer: May I direct the hon. and Gentleman's mind to the question? Is not there a that manufacturers whose markets are shrin Europe and north America may be looking markets among developing countries? Does he ag they will destabilise those areas where, in any ever should be other priorities for the resources?

Mr. Hogg: The right hon. and learned Ge makes a perfectly fair point, but it is not best dealt the CSCE, not least because several of the countr which we are most preoccupied—for example, Ir not party to that process.

Mr. Atkinson: As so much of the work parliamentary assembly of the Council of complements that of the CSCE, and as the Co Europe now includes 31 out of 32 European CSCI should not my hon. and learned Friend look no than the Council of Europe as the proposed new assembly of Europe, to which we could welcome th American parliamentarians who are currently in taking part in the North Atlantic Assembly?

Mr. Hogg: My hon. Friend is a distinguished of the Council of Europe and I understand wh saying. There are, however, essential differences the proposed assembly of Europe and the Co Europe. One important distinction is that the mem of the Council of Europe is not the same as tha CSCE; for example, the United States is not a part Council of Europe. Another important distinctio the charter of Paris is, essentially, a political ag and doctrine rather than a legal one, when agreements that underpin the Council of Europe strictly legal obligations.

Iraq (Hostages)

21. Mr. O'Hara: To ask the Secretary of S Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what provis currently being made for the sustenance, comf welfare of British hostages in Baghdad and their in the United Kingdom.

Mr. Hurd: The embassy in Baghdad has so more than 100 bags of comforts to the hostages in Kuwait and delivered more than 30 bags to those to Baghdad to meet wives visiting from the Kingdom. The contents include beer, cigarettes, to vitamins, books and writing materials. In London set up a post office box that families can use to wri hostages and communities in Iraq and Kuwait. working with the British Red Cross to set up a sy send parcels from families in Britain.

The Foreign Office Gulf families support centr in regular touch with families and works closely Gulf Support Group, providing advice and help.

Mr. O'Hara: Is the Secretary of State aware of t hardship faced by some families of hostages? In dawn of compassion that was at least suggested election campaign for the leadership of the Conservative party, will he prevail upon his colleagues in the Government to redouble efforts to secure the comfort of hostages' families, especially their ability to maintain telephone communications with their relatives in Baghdad?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman does not need to give that edge to his question. I am conscious of the valid point he makes. I appreciate that the hon. Gentleman is talking about the families here, rather than the hostages in the Gulf. The Gulf families support centre in the Foreign Office acts as a first point of contact for families facing problems. Representatives from the Department of Social Security are on hand to ensure that any requests for help are dealt with promptly. I accept that the families support provisions are not lavish, but if they are properly and quickly administered they ensure that families do not suffer serious deprivation as a result of loss of income.

Middle East

3.31 pm

The Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs (Mr. Douglas Hurd): With permission, Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a statement on developments in the middle east since I did so on 24 October.

The international coalition is holding firm. Our objectives remain: the full and unconditional withdrawal of Iraqi forces from Kuwait; the restoration of the legitimate Government of Kuwait; and the release of all hostages. President Saddam Hussein continues to show little sign that he intends to comply with the will of the international community and withdraw. He continues to rebuff the United Nations, to strengthen his military position in Kuwait, to destroy Kuwait's fabric and national identity, and to manipulate the fate of British and other citizens trapped in Iraq and Kuwait.

Only by intensifying all the pressures at our disposal —diplomatic, economic and military—can we persuade him that he has no alternative to withdrawal. Sanctions are being applied rigorously. We hope that the existing pressures will suffice to persuade Saddam Hussein to withdraw. If they are not sufficient, we need to convince him that the military option is a serious one. The option for peace is in his hands. No one does any service by blurring the choice before him.

For that military option to be fully credible, the international community must show that it has the political will to exercise it. That is why the Security Council is expected to meet at ministerial level within the next few days and vote on a resolution authorising "all necessary means"—that is to say, including force—to be used to ensure Iraqi compliance with Security Council resolution 660 and later resolutions. The resolution now being finalised will include a date—probably in the first half of January—by which time Iraq is required to comply in full with those resolutions. The House will see that it does not follow from that that military action will follow immediately thereafter—nor indeed that military action will necessarily take place. The purpose of the grace period is to allow Saddam Hussein an opportunity in which he can safely withdraw from Kuwait and release the hostages. If he does not do so, he must face the possibility of military action and certain defeat.

As questions have illustrated, we remain anxious for the well-being of the many hundreds of British hostages and other citizens who remain in Iraq and Kuwait. Some have been released through the intervention of political figures and relatives. We understand the suffering of the families and the humanitarian motives of most of those who go to Iraq. But President Hussein exploits those visits for his own unacceptable ends, and I believe that the international community is, and must remain, united in resisting that blackmail.

With tension increasing in the region, we are keeping under constant review our advice to British communities in other parts of the Gulf. We are now advising those living in the eastern region of Saudi Arabia, Qatar and Bahrain, with children in Britain, not to bring them to the area, but to spend the Christmas holiday here, and for dependants to remain outside the Gulf until the situation becomes clearer. That does not mean that we foresee hostilities around that time—the Christmas holiday—but it is sensible to minimise the number of dep region when we are entering a critical pha House will agree.

I should like to report a positive politi September we announced the resumption Iran. We are now resuming relations immediate effect. The respective heads sections in London and Damascus w d'affaires pending the exchange, when ambassadors. We have received fro Government assurances that Syria wi strenuous efforts to obtain the release of we British, hostages in Lebanon and confirm rejects acts of international terrorism and against the perpetrators of such acts whic by convincing evidence. We have also ha account of the Syrian position on the Hind not been entirely easy, but I am glad tha possible to overcome the differences betwe Syria.

Mr. Gerald Kaufman (Manchester, G the right hon. Gentleman for responding t a statement. We regard the decision to re relations with Syria as logical. We w commitment to reject acts of terrorism ar to fulfil that commitment not simply emphatically, in action.

When I visited Syria last July, I rece from the Vice-President and Foreign Mi Government would do everything possibl the release of British hostages in Lebano that President Bush had written to them r for their help on behalf of American hos diplomatic relations have been resume United Kingdom Prime Minister write President Assad on behalf of the British

Since the Iraq-Kuwait crisis began nea ago, the Labour party, the constitution o it to support the United Nations, has bas to the crisis on support for the decision Nations—sanctions and their enforcemer air blockades and the release of all hos made it clear that we believe that sanctions the maximum time to work, and that rema

If military force were to be contem insisted that any such action should have the House on 7 September

"the clear and unquestionable authority Nations charter."—[Official Report, 7 Sept 177, 892.]

We have repeatedly put strongly to the view that a legalistic reliance on article Nations charter would not be sufficient jus use of force. That being so, while we co that sanctions should be given maximu and while we ardently pray that the milit taken up and a war which could be hor must be avoided if at all possible, we r Council resolution of the sort described Secretary as fulfilling the stipulations repeatedly laid down since 2 August.

Yesterday, President Gorbachev's sp Ignatenko, said in Moscow:

"Our country will vote for language w clear-cut deadline for withdrawal from Ku hostages."

Will the Foreign Secretary confirm that the insertion of a deadline in the draft Security Council resolution has been done at the specific insistence of the Soviet Union? Will he confirm once again that the date in the resolution will not automatically trigger the use of force but is the date after which the option of force could be taken up with the authority of the United Nations Security Council?

We in the Labour party have not seen this crisis simply in terms of the unconditional withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait and the unconditional freeing of the hostages, indispensable though both things are. We see it above all as a test of the authority of the United Nations. If the 10 United Nations resolutions already carried by the Security Council are not implemented, the authority of the United Nations will be shattered and instead of world order there will be chaos.

If the United Nations resolutions are implemented, preferably peacefully of course, the authority of the United Nations will be enhanced as never before. That authority can then be used to provide for the further actions that must be taken in the middle east. Those are self-determination for the Palestinian people, whose intifada approaches its third anniversary, and a hopeful future for the Palestinian refugees with the aid of the wealth of the Gulf states; a settlement of the disputes between Israel and her neighbours and security for the state of Israel; and an arms embargo and the clearing from the whole region of nuclear, chemical and biological weapons.

All those are prizes which can be won once the United Nations resolutions on Kuwait are implemented. It is clear that they will be implemented. It is now for Saddam Hussein to prevent the nightmare of war by accepting those resolutions. He brought about this crisis by an act of aggression. He can end it by good sense and statesmanship, and the House and the world await his response.

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful, and rather more than conventionally, to the right hon. Gentleman. We are entering a time of national anxiety on this subject, and at such times it is right to have as much national unity as we can.

One strong thought in the minds of all of us who have been working to bring about the restoration of relations first with Iran and now with Syria is that restoration should bring closer the release of our hostages now held in Beirut. I note the right hon. Gentleman's specific suggestion to my right hon. Friend the new Prime Minister. I am glad that the right hon. Gentleman supports the Security Council resolution. Other things being equal, I shall go to New York to take part in the debate tomorrow. [HON. MEMBERS: "Hear, hear."] Of course, that depends on the nature of an announcement which has not been made. That is why I inject a note of uncertainty.

The right hon. Gentleman asked about the deadline in the draft resolution. I am not sure how that originated, but it has strong Soviet support and is one of the points on which the Soviet Union most specifically insisted. I confirm that the right hon. Gentleman is right to say that the date, if it is inserted or when it is inserted in the resolution, will not be the date upon which military action starts. It is the date after which member states will be authorised to take action in pursuit not of the objectives but of the specific requirements of the S Council.

Sir Peter Blaker (Blackpool, South): Is my rig Friend aware that he deserves the congratulation House on the skill with which he has conducted policy on the Gulf throughout the crisis, and the of the whole House on his proposals for the S Council resolution and the resumption of relatio Syria? He will be aware that the one major western that has not contributed forces to the coalition in t is Germany. Does he anticipate that, after the election this coming weekend, there may be moves German Government to alter the German constitu as to enable German forces to be deployed outs NATO area—for example, in the Gulf?

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my right hon. Friend remarks. I am happy to tell the House that the German Chancellor informed the Prime Minister ago of a quite substantial contribution by the Germany Government to the costs incurred Government in moving British military forces to th I understand, although it is not a matter for us, t Federal Germany Chancellor proposes, if he obta necessary support in the elections on Sunday, to a German constitution to enable Germany to take collective enterprises such as this.

Mr. Menzies Campbell (Fife, North-East): I o support for the Foreign Secretary's statement. Wil be a sombre and anxious moment when the Nations adopt the terms of the proposed resolu which, unhappily, there seems to be no alternative after the expiry of the deadline, will the use of fo justified only if all peaceful means have been sh have failed? Avoiding all questions of linkage, sho not be working through the United Nations to achi necessary long-term solution for the middle east?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. and learned Gentleman is only when peaceful means have been proved ine would we be justified in taking military action. We a at the end of November, and the peaceful press sanctions, public opinion and diplomacy have b place at least since the end of August.

As to long-term solutions, I do not see any r prospect of a useful initiative on the Arab-Israel p until President Saddam Hussein has left Kuwait. Ho I say, as I have said before, that, once that has hap the international community will need to make a effort, recognising that the basis of such a solution n negotiation between Israel, the Arab states a Palestinians.

Mr. Richard Luce (Shoreham): Will my righ Friend reaffirm that the main objective of the mee the Security Council this week is to make it cl Saddam Hussein that the United Nations as a who use whatever means are available to achiev withdrawal of Iraq from Kuwait, and that the Saddam Hussein gets out, the better for him and fo citizens?

Mr. Hurd: That is right. The issue has been bl sometimes by well-meaning people, but it is now bec clearer and starker for President Saddam Hussein.

[Mr. Hurd]

the opportunity to avoid for himself, his people and all of us the undoubted damage and suffering that will be caused by war. That peaceful option is in his hands.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): Does the Foreign Secretary have any sympathy with the view of Senator Sam Nunn that the right question is not so much, "Is it justified?" as, "Is it wise?" What does he say to the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath), who told us that the Iraqis have sown minefields in most, if not all, Kuwaiti oilfields and that flames will go up such as mother earth has never seen before with unknown results in terms of carbon dioxide, carbon monoxide and sulphur dioxide emissions?

Some of us think that war in Iraq because of Kuwait is unjustified on a scale of proportion. My hon. Friend the Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Brown), whom the Foreign Secretary treated in an uncalled—for way, was in the Royal Signals. I was tank crew, firing live ammunition, during my national service. I think that the Foreign Secretary was in the Foreign Office and not in the forces. Ought he not to be a little more careful before dismissing us?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman's last point is unworthy of him. As I said, I found the interventions of the hon. Member for Edinburgh, Leith (Mr. Brown) on this matter silly and confused, and they have done nothing to assist.

Mr. Dalyell: I am entitled to ask Ministers who send young men to their deaths about their own military experience.

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman is entirely wrong, and he should not make remarks without checking them. That one is competely untrue, but I shall not go into the details. He is usually very fair, but he has not been fair on this occasion.

To return to the point of principle and leaving the hon. Gentleman's pettiness today on one side, I simply say that I have heard the hon. Gentleman make the same point to my right hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) and others; and, of course, he is right in the sense that war is a horrible business and one cannot contemplate a war of this kind without at the same time contemplating a lot of destruction and suffering. But it would not be an indiscriminate campaign of destruction and therefore I am not entering into the kind of details that he postulates. He is perfectly right in that any war, however just, involves suffering and destruction.

The point that the hon. Gentleman has consistently failed to answer when it is put to him is how, if one is to use that argument as being decisive on all occasions, there is an earthly chance of resisting aggression. That argument, if it is allowed to prevail on every occasion, is carte blanche for any aggressor because it could be wheeled forward to justify lying down in front of Hitler, Mussolini or any aggressor of the past. The hon. Gentleman is not a pacifist, but he has not addressed that question. We have to address that question in a serious way.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: Order. Please m questions so that I may call as ma possible?

Sir Dennis Walters (Westbury):
Friend accept that the resumption o with Syria is opportune and wise? Sy and key position in the middle east interest to resume diplomatic r relations do not necessarily signify
We have diplomatic relations with cannot welcome the appalling acts Gaza which Israel is perpetrating, bu relations with both.

Does my right hon. Friend also

Mr. Speaker: Briefly, please.

Sir Dennis Walters: Does my ri accept that it would be helpful if, w stand on Kuwait, we also committ action on the Israel-Palestinian issue problem has been resolved?

Mr. Hurd: My hon. Friend is rig have never regarded having diplom country as conferring great blessing be regarded in that light. It is simply a realistic relationship so that us transacted with a Government.

Once the aggression is reversed, possible but necessary to pull the inte together, in so far as we can, in ba vigorous effort to bring about a Arab-Israel dispute.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, W cynical opportunism to enter ag relations with Syria when it has con the Government's prerequisites for Government have pinpointed the p the Hindawi affair and the Syrians and when, if The Daily Telegraph
Syrians are behind almost all the terr today? Will the right hon. Gentlem and see it as a sad first decisio Government?

Mr. Hurd: I do not agree. We hav the problem all the time that I have Office, and perhaps before. There ha based on the background of the Hin right hon. Member for Manch Kaufman) went to Damascus to dis Opposition. We have also discussed intermediaries and, most recently, di
House the outcome in my statement

We are now in the same position
Government. We shall have diplo
Syria because it is useful so to do.
Gentleman will have heard the reaso made to us on behalf of hostages he not see the restoration of diplomatic a patronising pat on the head for th and all that they do. That is not the relations. It is a hard-headed c interests that diplomatic relations sh

Mr. Tony Marlow (Northampton, North): Why is it that the Germans, French, Japanese and Italians, who have greater need for oil from the Gulf, have fewer troops committed and fewer lives at risk, and are less committed to the military option?

Mr. Hurd: We are not primarily concerned with oil from the Gulf. If we were, the international community would have settled with Saddam Hussein and the oil would be flowing. If we were concerned only with oil, as is sometimes shallowly said—although not by my hon. Friend—we would have settled a long time ago. We are concerned with international order, and a fundamental principle of that is that it is unacceptable for one member state of the United Nations to obliterate another.

Mr. Ken Maginnis (Fermanagh and South Tyrone): My right hon. and hon. Friends in the Unionist party welcome the statement, and we totally support the Government's attitude to the rape of Kuwait. We see some justification for resuming diplomatic relations with Syria in pursuing the Government's actions against international terrorism. However, we cannot help but be suspicious, and we hope that is not being done for purely economic reasons. My party supports such actions only on moral grounds.

Can the United Kingdom justify its attitude to the brutal regime in Cambodia, to the unforgivable genocide——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Member must raise that matter another time. He must confine his remarks to the middle east.

Mr. Maginnis: I accept your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I was comparing the situation in the Gulf with the unforgivable genocide in the Sudan and with the more sophisticated but equally immoral attitude taken by the Irish Republic in its harsh, uncompromising and irredentist claim to the territory of Northern Ireland.

Mr. Hurd: I am not sure that all those cases are exactly comparable, but the hon. Gentleman knows of the efforts that we are making in Cambodia and to establish law and security in Northern Ireland. In every instance, we must pursue a consistent line.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the success stories of the crisis has been the Western European Union's involvement in naval patrols? Does he agree also that the sheer professionalism of the officers and sailors involved has ensured that the sea blockade of Iraq is at least 90 per cent. effective?

Mr. Hurd: I agree with my hon. Friend. The Western European Union has proved its worth as a focus for co-ordinating European efforts. My hon. Friend mentioned the Italians. The Italian navy is involved as well as the French navy and other members. Their efforts in the Gulf are co-ordinated.

The Royal Navy in the Gulf has already challenged 1,900 vessels and boarded 16 as part of the operation. It is playing a notable part in the peaceful pressure on Saddam Hussein.

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): Is the Secretary of State aware that we all deplore the invasion of Kuwait, and that we want to see Iraqi forces out of there as soon as possible? However, bearing in mind that sanctions have not yet been given sufficient time, and the deplorable of democratic effort to find a peaceful and negot solution, would it not be crass irresponsibility on the of the Government, or indeed of any Governmer declare what is in effect a desert death sentence on young British soldiers, as well as possibly millions of casualties, in what could turn out to be one of the devastating conflicts in human history which woul nothing to solve the problems in the middle east i short or long term?

Mr. Hurd: We want to avoid such conflict. The effort of the British Government since 2 August has designed to do that. We have not spared ourselve people in other countries have not spared themselves precisely that. Time ticks on. The aggressor is still

I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman is aware of the enormities now being committed in K by the aggressor. I hope that he will look at the tran of the debate in the Security Council today wit evidence by eye witnesses because if that had happen some of the countries which are dear to the Gentleman we should have had uproar and claim emergency debates in the House. That is happening d day. We want to avoid conflict.

Diplomacy has a role—that is right. However, it not have a role in undermining or cutting away the si straightforward demands of the Security Council. Ge those resolutions is fine. We are talking about diplomatic and economic pressures, such as those ap by President Gorbachev on the Iraqis yesterday—t diplomacy. If the hon. Gentleman is suggesting diplomacy should equal doing away with, weakeni subtracting from the resolutions of the Security Coun placate the aggressor, I think that he is wrong.

Sir Philip Goodhart (Beckenham): If the Ch Government should veto a new United Nations resolu can we, in practice, ignore their veto?

Mr. Hurd: I hope and believe that that is a hypoth question. I hope—I have not total certainty—that tha not arise.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): Who i Foreign Secretary getting into bed with in this deal Syria? What has convinced him that the Syrian re today is any different from the regime which ordere murder of 20,000 Muslims in the city of Hama in which harboured the Lockerbie bombers, and invade colonised parts of Lebanon in what is now greater S The Syrian secret police are no less efficient than I They routinely use murder, terror and torture, Saddam Hussein's secret police. Is it really the case t couple of thousand Syrian troops in the Western make him believe that the hands of President Assa any less bloody than those of Saddam Hussein?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman is mistaken a diplomatic relations—they are not a form of blessing quite rightly have diplomatic relations in Baghdad bec our ambassador is needed to help our people there had diplomatic relations with Stalin all the time th was committing what we know now were clearly son the worst atrocities ever seen, we had them with Hitle so on. Diplomatic relations are not a form of blessi approval but result from a realistic appraisal of whet is in Britain's interests to have direct contact with a particular Government. In the case of Syria, I believe that it is.

[Mr. Hurd]

Mr. Ian Taylor (Esher): Does my right hon. Friend agree that one of the miscalculations made by Saddam Hussein was to underestimate the determination, resilience and procedural efficiency of the United Nations? Does he also recognise that, when I was there two weeks ago, it was clear that the role of the British permanent mission, under the leadership of Sir David Hannay, was highly respected? When he flies to New York, will he take with him the support of the House for the work being done within the United Nations in British interests, by that mission under his leadership?

Mr. Hurd: Our mission, first under Sir Crispin Tickell and now under Sir David Hannay, has played a distinguished part since August in helping to bring together in a reasonable way and with a reasonable tone the efforts of the international community.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood): Is the Secretary of State familiar with the Christian teaching on a just war? Does he agree that there are three fundamental requirements? First, the cause must be just, and there is no doubt about that. However, there are other just causes about which the Americans and the Government have not taken action. That is the problem of double standards. Secondly, there has to be no other way. In this case there is another way—sanctions. Thirdly, the remedy must not be worse than the wrong. The potential of the horrendous war in the middle east is great. The Foreign Secretary is wrong and the United Nations will be wrong if it sets a deadline in order to bluster trying to avoid a war and we end up with a war that the right hon. Gentleman did not seek. That is the danger that the Foreign Secretary is putting before us. He is breaking the basic teaching of what constitutes a just war.

Mr. Hurd: I read the cardinal's letter in The Times and the archbishop's speech and I accept that it is important for Christians to consider the nature of a just war. However, I do not accept the hon. Lady's interpretation of the criteria. First, the cause is right and just. We have tried and are continuing to try peaceful pressure. The answer to her third question is whether it is safe for any of us that the basic principle of international order should be flouted with impunity. I do not think that it is.

Sir Ian Lloyd (Havant): Has my right hon. Friend or any of the allies in Saudi Arabia received a single shred of evidence to sustain the view that the Hitlerian intransigence so far displayed by Saddam Hussein is likely to diminish or disappear if he is given more time? If there is no such evidence, does not the contribution of that time merely give him further opportunities to sow more mines and polish his weapons, with an appalling effect on the ultimate gravity of the conflict?

Mr. Hurd: If one is contemplating a military option, time works for both sides. Part of the trouble over the past few months has been the blurring of issues to which I have referred. The value of the resolution is that it will clear away some of the illusions to which the aggressor may have been subject. It will present him with the stark choice as it exists—either he complies or he is forced out. It may be a good idea to give him a specific period of weeks—not an extended period—in which to face clearly and without confusion that stark choice.

Mr. George Galloway (Glasgow, Hillhead): The Foreign Secretary was elected this lunch time the Spectator parliamentarian of the year. That accolade is well deserved and I congratulate him upon it. Will he accept that he cuts an unlikely figure in favour of war, war rather than jaw, jaw? Yet the words he has delivered this afternoon amount to an ultimatum, so that it is more rather than less likely that our constituents—young men—will shortly be coming home dead in bags. I have no truck with Saddam Hussein, and I hope that the Foreign Secretary accepts that. However, on the day when Saddam Hussein has asked President Bush for talks, will the right hon. Gentleman accept that the Iraqis and millions of Arabs across the area who agree with them have a point of view and that it might be useful to sit down and talk about that before the place goes up in flames and our young men and many hundreds and thousands of others are killed?

Mr. Hurd: I have never sought to minimise the dangers and suffering that come from war. Of course, we are fully aware of the Iraqi point of view. There is no secret about it. The Iraqis believe that they are entitled to remain in Kuwait. We do not accept that and nor do the international community or the hon. Gentleman's leadership because it is wrong. To use the phrase of the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell), it is unwise and unsafe to let that countinue.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Whatever the diplomatic justification for setting a deadline, is not the inescapable conclusion of setting such a deadline that we do not believe that international economic sanctions will ever succeed?

Mr. Hurd: No. The Security Council resolution, if passed, will add to the existing resolutions, including the sanctions resolution, which is the most important of all peaceful pressures. Shortages are beginning to appear, but, as I told the House a week or so ago, they are not decisive. As I said in reply to previous questions, sanctions are being applied. We are proposing to add what should be the most important of the peaceful pressures—the knowledge, which the hon. Member for East Lothian (Mr. Home Robertson), who recently visited the desert, conveyed to us, that the military option is in place and will be used. There is a chance, which I strongly hope will be taken, that this accumulation of peaceful pressures will do the job and that Saddam Hussein will withdraw.

Mr. Giles Radice (Durham, North): Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that most Labour Members support the need for a new United Nations resolution to put new pressure on Saddam Hussein? Is he further aware that the way to achieve peace and to avoid war is for Saddam Hussein to get out of Kuwait?

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman. That is exactly the point.

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): In the past few weeks, we have spoken much of European unity. When my right hon. Friend is in New York, will he take the opportunity to talk to other European Community Foreign Ministers to get some positive measures towards European political unity and to ensure, as many of my hon. Friends have said, that European Community countries, depending on size, do as much as Great Britain in supporting the United States and the Arab nations in this theatre of conflict?

Mr. Hurd: Burden sharing is very important. As my hon. Friend suggests, if our military contribution, its costs and our economic contribution are added together, we are somewhat ahead of our Community partners. The French are a fraction of a decimal point behind, but they have made military and economic contributions. The Germans have now made a substantial economic contribution, but it is true that, of the European contributions, Britain's represents the highest percentage of gross domestic product.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Is it not the case that since 2 August Saddam Hussein and the criminal regime in Iraq have had every possible opportunity of avoiding war by getting out of Kuwait? If the argument is that war can never be justified—in my view, if military action is taken, it will be justified in all the circumstances —what would be the purpose of the United Nations? Surely it would mean, in effect, that any country could commit outright aggression where it has no quarrel——

Mr. Dennis Canavan (Falkirk, West): Why don't you volunteer to go to the desert——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Canavan: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: No point of order arises.

Mr. Canavan: Hon. Members should go to the desert——

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Canavan: —instead of sending our young men to their deaths in the desert.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member has put his point of view. The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) has an equal right to do so.

Mr. Winnick: I have a right, I hope, as I have done all my life, to oppose fascists and criminal aggression, and I shall do so because I could not care less whether it is popular or unpopular.

Will the Foreign Secretary confirm that, if this aggression goes unpunished, if Saddam Hussein refuses to withdraw his troops from Kuwait, it would be direct encouragement for other states to do precisely the same?

Mr. Hurd: I have often disagreed with the hon. Gentleman, but I have always recognised that he is a through-and-through United Nations man. He believes in collective security and international order. He is following the logic of his convictions.

Mr. Cyril D. Townsend (Bexleyheath): I warmly commend the Government for their decision to restore diplomatic relations with Syria. Some of us feel that four years has been too long. Bearing in mind the more positive approach of the United States and the strategic importance of Syria, will he confirm that it has a crucial part to play in the forthcoming peace process in the middle east?

Mr. Hurd: I am grateful to my hon. Friend. I repeat that I believe that the arguments in favour of restoring relations with Syria are strong. Of course, they do not involve approval of everything that Syria is or does.

Mr. Peter Hardy (Wentworth): Although the military option must remain credible to ensure that sanctions succeed, will the Foreign Secretary reconsider his suggestion that pursuit of a wider settlement will follow resolution of the Kuwaiti problem, especially as it is essential now to pursue and seek to overcome the intransigence of the Likud, which was demonstrated once again at meetings I chaired in Paris last week?

Mr. Hurd: It is a matter of practicalities. Looking at the practicalities, I do not see the opportunity of a successful international initiative on the Arab-Israel question while the Iraqis remain in Kuwait.

Mr. David Tredinnick (Bosworth): Has my right hon. Friend seen the television reports this week of British troops training in the theatre in Saudi Arabia, demonstrating sophisticated anti-tank equipment and methods of clearing minefields? Does he agree that this kind of media circus could threaten the lives of British troops if we ever have to take action there and that it should be stopped if possible? Will my right hon. Friend make representations to the media, because such reports affect the lives of British soldiers?

Mr. Hurd: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is here. He tells me that he is keeping a close watch on the nature of this presence.

Dr. Dafydd Elis Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): The Foreign Secretary referred in his original statement to intensifying all the pressures at our disposal—diplomatic, economic and military. He did not tell us in his statement or answers what diplomatic initiatives he now supports. Will the grace period be used for the British Government and other European Governments to support a further diplomatic initiative, particularly a further Arab initiative, or an initiative yet again from the United Nations Secretary-General following the decision that looks likely to be taken this week by the United Nations Security Council?

Mr. Hurd: The United Nations Secretary-General has a role under the Security Council resolution, as the hon. Gentleman clearly knows. The Secretary-General was rebuffed when he tried to exercise that role. The diplomatic moves in these circumstances must be to reinforce in the Iraqis' minds the advantage for them of complying with the resolution by peaceful means.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): In a sense, the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas) anticipated my question. Does the right hon. Gentleman accept that, of course, everyone in the House and outside it is opposed to war and to young people losing their lives? In relation to the visit to the United Nations tomorrow and the probable signing of the resolution, would it not be appropriate to see the United Nations Secretary-General, Mr. Perez de Cuellar? He began a peace initiative in August which was precipitous and was aborted. It might be appropriate for him now to return again to the middle east and to go to Baghdad to impress on Saddam Hussein the will and intention of the United Nations, so that Saddam Hussein has the opportunity to withdraw while there is still a period of grace and time?

[Mr. Stuart Bell]

Mr. Hurd: I discussed this aspect in September with the Secretary-General in New York and he felt that there was no point in his offering to go again if he were again rebuffed. The hon. Gentleman is right in saying that the Secretary-General has a role, as a servant of the United Nations, in trying to bring about implementation of Security Council resolutions.

Mr. Harry Barnes (Derbyshire, North-East): During the Gulf debates, the Foreign Secretary was opposed to a resolution of the type that is going before the United Nations, on the ground that there was a possibility of its being vetoed. He did not answer the question about a possible veto by China, and I should like him to do so. If the resolution is carried, and as that would be a United Nations commitment, would it not be appropriate that forces in the middle east should be placed under a strict United Nations command structure and should not be operated at the behest of the Americans?

Mr. Hurd: On the first point, it would not have been sensible to go forward with a resolution that one thought would fail, but, as I said, that is not our information at present. On the second point, I do not think that that is likely to be workable in practice or, if there has to be a military option, that it would exercise that option in the most effective and life-saving way. I do not think that that will happen. I imagine that there will be a requirement that any member states that use the authority which the Security Council is about to confer on them should report the results to the Security Council.

Mr. John Cummings (Easington): Does the Foreign Secretary agree that, if British blood is to be spilled in the Gulf, Her Majesty's Government ought to pursue a rigorous policy aimed at the total democratisation of all the Gulf states, which certainly do not have a fine record on human rights?

Mr. Hurd: I referred earlier this afternoon to the conference of Kuwaitis—including Opposition Kuwaitis—held recently in Ta'if. That conference agreed to return to the 1962 constitution in Kuwait. That is the kind of movement that I consider sensible and right for Kuwait.

Mr. Robert Litherland (Manchester, Central): Does not the Foreign Secretary concede that to specify a deadline would automatically put this country on a war footing?

Mr. Hurd: No. It gives a period of grace—a peaceful pause—in which the peaceful pressures for a peaceful solution can reach their height. The expiry of the deadline—I have said this once or twice already, but it is very important—is not in itself a signal for military action to begin.

Mr. John McAllion (Dundee, East): Does the Foreign Secretary accept that one of the most serious obstacles to the establishment of a new international order underpinned by the United Nations is the application of double standards by that body in the face of aggression? If aggression must be met with military force and a devastating war in Kuwait, why is it met with little more than polite protest in the Lebanon, west bank and Gaza?

Mr. Hurd: There is, of course, much more than polite protest. There are Security Council resolutions, because the situation is different: the background to the Israeli occupation of the west bank is entirely different. It is the result of several wars. The Security Council has taken a very clear line—the right line—the author of which was Lord Caradon. The Security Council has said that there must be a negotiation and a reconciliation of Israel's security, and of the rights of the Palestinians to self-determination.

It is not a question of a simple act of aggression which must be reversed, as it is in Kuwait. It is more complicated, and requires—and will be given by the Security Council—a more complicated answer. We must search for that answer. Several of my replies this afternoon have concerned that point.

Mr. Ronnie Campbell (Blyth Valley): Will the Foreign Secretary tell the House what efforts his Department has made, and will make, on behalf of the hostages who are still in Iraq? Is he going to secure their release and start a dialogue with Saddam to that end as countries such as Germany, Sweden, Italy and Spain have done—along with others too numerous to mention?

Mr. Hurd: Our argument—the argument that we have used with the Iraqis throughout—is that the policy of the human shield has no justification, that all our hostages should be released and that those still working in Iraq should be enabled to leave if possible. That is our policy, and we have never ceased to impress it on Iraqis. It is also the policy of the European Community as a whole since 28 October that there should not be negotiations—partial negotiations—for the release of hostages: there should be no bargaining on that subject.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): Given that it took nearly 40 years to resolve the cold war, and given that there is no sign that sanctions are being breached, will the Foreign Secretary urge patience on the other countries before the United Nations resolution is passed and make it absolutely clear that it would be a far greater triumph for the United Nations—and far better for a new world order—if we achieved withdrawal from Kuwait by peaceful means, even it it took one, two, three or even four years, rather than through the loss of a large number of lives?

Mr. Hurd: Patience is certainly a virtue in relation to these matters, and it has been displayed. There has been no rush to arms—no rush to counter-attack Saddam Hussein. There has been a great deal of patience, which has not been rewarded with any progress.

We are not saying that patience has been exhausted on 28 November; we simply want to point out to Saddam Hussein that there is a limit to the period in which he can spoil Kuwait, kill some Kuwaitis and torture others. There is a limit to the time in which peaceful pressures can be expected to be effective. That is what we are saying.

Mr. Alan W. Williams (Carmarthen): How effective are the sanctions that are already in place against the export of oil from Iraq and Kuwait? Is it not true that those sanctions are completely effective and that exports of oil have ceased? Since Saddam Hussein invaded Kuwait to acquire those oil resources and as they have been sterilised, why embark on a path that could lead us to war? Would it not be wiser to give sanctions months or even a year or two to work rather than to prepare for war?

Mr. Hurd: Iraq is not shipping oil. I am not saying that the occasional truck carrying oil does not cross the border, but basically the hon. Gentleman is right. There is no large-scale shipment of oil out of Iraq and therefore Saddam Hussein is deprived of much the greatest part of his foreign exchange. He has quite substantial reserves not least because he stole a lot of money from Kuwait. Shortages are building up in Iraq as a result of sanctions, but, as I have just said, those shortages are not decisive. I do not believe that it is sensible or possible to rely indefinitely on that peaceful pressure to do what is necessary. I doubt whether that kind of peaceful pressure could be sustained indefinitely at its present level of intensity. The hon. Gentleman would have to face the risk of a gradual weakening of the will for collective security. There would then be a danger that at the end of that period the aggressor would sit back in possession of his aggression. It is not safe to contemplate that.

Mr. Tony Lloyd (Stretford): What can the Foreign Secretary tell the House today that will give us any confidence to believe that if there are non-military means to resolve the dispute after the deadline those means will be allowed to continue?

Mr. Hurd: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence and I and, I am sure, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will continue to do all we can to make the peaceful pressures effective. However, I have felt for a month or so—and perhaps for longer—that the most effective peaceful pressure is the clarity of the military option. The Security Council resolution will illustrate that clarity.

Mr. David Trimble (Upper Bann): I agree with the Foreign Secretary that the case of Kuwait and that of the occupation of the west bank are not analogous. I believe that the attempt to link the two was started by Saddam Hussein as a diversionary tactic. Is there not a danger that that diversionary tactic may soon move from the realm of propaganda to an attempt to embroil Israel in this situation? Should we not take steps to guard against that and would those steps involve supporting the present Government of Jordan?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Gentleman is right: that is one of the dangers. I am deeply concerned about the position of Jordan, which, for the time being, has lost its friendship with the Gulf states out of which came a lot of financial help. I believe that it is now largely implementing sanctions and as a result is in desperate economic trouble. We are doing our best within the Community and like the Germans and Japanese who have substantial resources and are not committed militarily in the Gulf, to bring help to Jordan.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Will the Foreign Secretary announce today that he is redoubling his efforts to counter what is ultimately an even greater threat than Saddam Hussein, namely, the brisk international trade in armaments research and information? Is he aware that there are many firms in this country and agencies in the rest of Europe, in south America, the United States, China and throughout the world that are selling weapons and information on exotic conventional weapons such as fuel air explosives, laser battlefield weapons and nuclear, chemical and, the most terrifying of all, biological weapons? That trade will eventually threaten future Saddam Husseins and crises throughout the world unless the new world order can control it.

Mr. Hurd: Arms embargoes are in place with regard to Iran and Iraq. The hon. Gentleman knows how they have been enforced. With regard to his wider international point, there are various international conventions in place. When this situation is over, and even if Saddam Hussein were to withdraw peacefully from Kuwait, I agree that the existence and potential of those weapons would remain a major problem.

Several Hon. Members rose——

Mr. Speaker: I called three of the hon. Members who are now rising at Question Time—[Interruption.]—but I shall call them again if they remain patient.

Mr. Bernie Grant (Tottenham): Will the Foreign Secretary confirm that our troops are under the operational command of the Americans, which means that they could be dragged into a war without any reference to the right hon. Gentleman or to any other Minister?

The Secretary of State for Defence (Mr. Tom King): They are not under such operational command.

Mr. Hurd: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Defence said, he has worked out detailed arrangements with the United States, but the position is not as the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant) has described it. In any case, there is no question of our forces being committed to military operations without the consent of Her Majesty's Government.

Ms. Dawn Primarolo (Bristol, South): I feel horrified about the way in which we are being dragged towards the inevitability of war and that the world community, with all its resources, cannot find ways to make Saddam Hussein get out of Kuwait without war. I am disappointed that the five permanent members of the Security Council now believe that war is necessary. Will the Foreign Secretary explain how the date in the resolution is not the date, upon which war will commence if Saddam Hussein has not withdrawn, because if Saddam Hussein ignores that date, inevitably we will be at war?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Lady has mistaken the point. The date in the resolution—whether it is 1 January or 15 January—will not be the date on which military action will begin. It is the date from which member states will be authorised—not instructed, but authorised—to take such action which, I repeat, is in pursuit not of their own objectives but of the specific objectives that the Security Council has laid down.

Mr. Ron Brown (Edinburgh, Leith): I remind the Foreign Secretary and the House that the tabloid press in this country have a motto—"Make it simple; make it juicy; make it up." May I assure the Government that I was never hounded or imprisoned and that I have never been a prisoner of the Iraqis, although certain newspapers, such as the Daily Record, have suggested that that might be the case? Nevertheless, there are prisoners out there from our own British community and they expect a lot more from a new revitalised British Government who, I hope, will have new ideas. One of those ideas must be to negotiate on and to discuss this problem. We may speak about linkage, and we may speak about Israel, but the one thing that we must speak about is the lives of those 1,400 British people out there, because they are important. The whole world knows that not only those lives but many other lives are at stake. Indeed, the whole world is at stake. What is the Foreign Secretary going to do about that? Will he approach the Iraqis in some way, even unofficially, because they will approach him?

[Mr. Ron Brown]

Mr. Hurd: If we had followed most of the advice that we had received from the Britons trapped in Kuwait, we would have started military action a long time ago.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Does the Foreign Secretary accept that, although we fully endorse his position that diplomatic recognition does not in any way give support, the parents and relatives of those who died at Lockerbie will want to be assured that Her Majesty's Government have genuine assurances from the Syrians that they will no longer support or in any way encourage terrorist action that emanates from their shores?

Mr. Hurd: The hon. Lady has raised a perfectly fair point. Obviously I cannot say anything about the progress of the inquiry into Lockerbie, although I have taken that point into account. The hon. Lady will know the position that the Americans have taken on it also.

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I shall take the presentation of Bill first.

BILL PRESENTED

Road Traffic

Mr. Secretary Parkinson, supported by Mr. Secretary Waddington, Mr. Secretary Rifkind, Mr. Secretary Patten, Mr. Secretary Hunt, Mr. Secretary Waldegrave, Mr. Norman Lamont and Mr. Christopher Chope, presented a Bill to amend the law about road traffic; And the same was read the First time; and ordered to be read a Second time tomorrow and to be printed. [Bill 17.]

WELSH AFFAIRS

Ordered,

That the Matter of Education and Training in Wales, being a Matter relating exclusively to Wales, be referred to the Welsh Grant Committee for its consideration.—[Mr. Chapman.]

Points of Order

4.34 pm

Mr. Tam Dalyell (Linlithgow): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. May I congratulate you on allowing questions on the statement to run for so long? I was fortunate enough to be called early. Along with other hon. Members, I congratulate you on allowing questions to run for so long on this important subject so that the Foreign Secretary could patiently answer our questions.

But there is a problem, and it is on that problem that I seek advice. The Gulf crisis is possibly the most important since 1945. You will have detected from the nature of the questioning that passionate beliefs are held by hon. Members other than those on the two Front Benches. Will you reflect on your powers of discretion? I am speaking off the top of my head, but I understand that a long time ago Mr. Speaker Gully, in the days when Sir Steven Runciman's father was a Cabinet Minister, was able to take certain decisions on controversial issues of the day to allow proper arguments to be deployed by Back-Bench Members.

My question to you, Mr. Speaker, is this. Do you believe that you have special powers of discretion to enable the many hon. Members—I hesitate to give a figure, but perhaps 30, 40, 50 or more—who hold views which may be substantially different from those voiced from the Front Bench to put their case? What are the powers of Mr. Speaker on that?

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. My hon. Friend referred to passionately held views and you had an illustration of them during the exchanges. You will be aware that I, like many of my hon. Friends, disagree with my hon. Friend the Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell). Time and time again in the history of Parliament, one of the outlets for passionately held views was a debate. Although I recognise that it is not up to you to decide—unless at some stage you grant an application under Standing Order No. 20—it would be unfortunate if parliamentary business was arranged without providing an opportunity for the House to have not merely exchanges such as we have just witnessed but a debate. Presumably the business of the House is being arranged right up to Christmas. Then we shall have the recess. I hold a view different from that of many hon. Members and I would defend and justify it if I were so fortunate as to catch your eye in any debate. I believe that a debate would be useful.

Mr. Speaker: I fully understand that a statement is no substitute for a debate. I have that very much in mind in thanking the hon. Member for Linlithgow (Mr. Dalyell) for what he said. This is an important matter which is of interest to the whole of Britain and to the wider world. That is why I let questions run today.

However, I must always have regard to the subsequent business before the House. I was able to do that today. With regard to a debate, we have business questions tomorrow when we may hear that there is to be a debate on this matter. I fully understand the anxieties that hon. Members on both sides of the argument expressed.

Mr. Andrew F. Bennett (Denton and Reddish): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. You will be aware that there is a time-honoured tradition in the House that the only way in which seats can be reserved is by placing prayer cards. You will also be aware that, according to another tradition, the first seat below the Gangway is always reserved for former Prime Ministers. As we now have two former Prime Ministers, would you perhaps suggest to the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) that she might take up the seat on the second row back so that she can keep an eye on both the Prime Minister and the right hon. Member for Old Bexley and Sidcup (Mr. Heath)?

Mr. Speaker: That was a good try. I can say with my hand on my heart that that is not a matter for me.

Mr. Stuart Bell (Middlesbrough): Further to that point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would not wish the House or those who read our proceedings to be misled. There is absolutely no tradition on this side of the House of placing prayer cards. That goes back to the end of the last century when the first Labour Members of Parliament came from the north. They found that prayer cards had been placed by their honourable colleagues from the south and removed them. From that time to this, Labour Members have removed prayer cards.

Mr. Speaker: The House knows that there is a convention on the matter. We should now get on.

Orders of the Day

Statutory Sick Pay Bill

Considered in Committee.

Clause 1

REDUCTION IN THE AMOUNTS RECOVERABLE BY EMPLOYERS WHO HAVE PAID STATUTORY SICK PAY

4.39 pm

Mr. Archie Kirkwood (Roxburgh and Berwickshire): I beg to move amendment No. 1, in page 1, line 11, leave out from 'payments' to 'and' in line 15, and insert

'after the words "prescribed circumstances", there shall be inserted the words "and in the circumstances in paragraph (aa) below.".'

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Miss Betty Boothroyd): With this it will be convenient to discuss the following amendments: No. 2, in page 1, line 15, after 'payments,' insert—

(aa) there shall be added, after paragraph (a), the following provision:

"(aa) entitling, except in prescribed circumstances, any employer employing twenty or more persons, who has made one or more payments of statutory sickpay in a prescribed period to recover an amount equal to 80 per cent. of the aggregate of these payments.";'.

No. 3, in page 1, line 21, leave out from 'made' to the end of line 23 and insert

'there shall be added at the end, the words, "or, where applicable, the amounts which they are entitled to recover by virtue of paragraph (aa) above.".'.

No. 4, in page 1, line 26, leave out '1(a)' and insert '1(aa)'.

Mr. Kirkwood: I know that some of the arguments about the Bill were rehearsed on Second Reading, but I cannot understand why it is necessary to complete the Bill with such speed. Second Reading took place on Monday, when, unfortunately, I was unable to attend, but my hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and Shetland (Mr. Wallace) spoke. Why is it necessary for the Bill to be considered in Committee today?

The speed with which we are proceeding with the Bill has caused some suspicion, to put it mildly, among those who will be directly affected by it. They believe that the Government's undue haste is suspicious. The Minister furrows his brow at that, but the story behind the argument goes back before my time to 1982 when the old sickness benefit was changed into the statutory sick pay scheme. I am told that those changes led to hard-fought arguments that continued for many months. Although small businesses, the Confederation of British Industry and other interested parties were not entirely happy with the final result, they felt that their arguments had been heeded and that they had had a fair crack of the whip.

I do not believe that the current consultation has been satisfactory in terms of the changes that were first brought to the attention of the House in the uprating statement made a few weeks ago. I do not use unmeasured language often, but it is deplorable and a matter for the House if the Government proceed with the Bill—admittedly it is small and technical, but the changes are far-reaching—at such speed. There are only 15 Bills in the Queen's Speech, and

[Mr. Kirkwood]

I cannot understand why we should proceed with such haste. Since we are discussing the first group of amendments I hope that it will be in order for the Minister to say something about that. It would be helpful if he could reassure those interested parties that there was no untoward reason for such indecent haste.

I know that hon. Members have urgent business to attend to in other parts of the House and I accept that the Bill is small and technical, but it is disappointing that more of our colleagues are not present to consider the issues. The statutory sick pay scheme, however, in common with other parts of the social security system, is now so complex that it takes experts to work out the implications of any changes for small businesses, employers and employees. Surely that is another reason for moving slowly on the Bill. It is important to remember that the Bill will have far-reaching effects for businesses and employees.

The Second Reading debate made it clear that the function of the Bill is to reduce the statutory sick pay rebates from the current level of 100 per cent. to 80 per cent., which is a big jump in one go. It will also remove the additional rebate for national insurance contributions that are paid on statutory sick pay, and it gives the Government the power to cut the rebate again without primary legislation. The Bill also increases the threshold for the higher level of statutory sick pay from £125 to £185, but that higher level will not be uprated, but frozen at £52·50.

The net effect of the changes will be to put a disproportionate burden on those businesses with a much higher incidence of sickness. That is bad news for small businesses, which will see them as the thin end of the wedge.

4.45 pm

In the uprating statement, the Secretary of State spoke about a new partnership between the Government and employers, but in reality it is a new partnership between the treasury and the Department of Social Security. The Treasury required cuts to be made and the Department has found a mechanism for offloading those cuts and their impact on to employers' shoulders.

An important principle that is buried in the Bill should not go unnoticed. If employers are to be directly responsible for the provision of sick benefits in the future, it should not happen piecemeal. If the Government are intent upon that, they should say so openly, so that we can discuss it properly. The withdrawal of redundancy rebates is an obvious example of what can happen by default. I hope that that change is not part of a trend.

The amendments are designed to exclude from the Bill firms that employ fewer than 20 people; after all, the proposed changes will have a far greater impact on small businesses than on larger ones. There are precedents in employment law for distinguishing among companies based on their size. That principle should be accepted as there are compelling reasons for questioning whether the full-blown provisions of the Bill should be visited on small businesses that employ fewer than 20 people.

The general economic climate faced by small businesses is much harsher than that faced by larger businesses. That factor should also be taken into account.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I ar interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but I hope that he with me, as I am new to this. The hon. Gentlema to businesses with fewer than 20 employ amendment No. 2 speaks of
"any employer employing twenty or more persons
I assume that either a mistake has been made missing something—probably the latter—so pe
hon. Gentleman can enlighten me.

Mr. Kirkwood: I asked the same question this My hon. Friend the Member for Orkney and
(Mr. Wallace) is a distinguished advocate at th
Bar and has chosen to draft the amendments s
Bill's provisions affect those who employ mor people. Therefore, by implication, they exclud firms with fewer than 20 employees. However, th of the hon. Member for Newham, North-W Banks) was perfectly fair.

Do not ask me what motivates advocates. If more time, I think that I could have dr amendments more simply—that sounds like a vicious attack on my hon. Friend the Member fo and Shetland, and I withdraw it. The Minister generous soul and I know him so well, that I a that he would not let the legislation founder on technicalities. Having said that, it was a perfect question to ask. As I said, I asked the same que morning; I am glad that I did because otherwi have been completely floored by the hon. Ge intervention.

There is a case for considering the special circ in the economic climate. The uniform busi provisions, changes in business rates and inte and the administrative impact of VAT have disproportionately hard effect on smaller busines of the research undertaken by the Governme provision, extent and incidence of occupationa schemes is flawed. Will the Minister say someth that? I know that a study was produced which is Library, but it is vigorously contested by the org representing small businesses. They believe research was selective and produced results th reflect reality. I make no comment on that, but the question to the Minister. Had there be consultation in advance of the Bill's introdu might have been able to deal with such issues.

People who run and work in small businesses me repeatedly that they were given a clear u that additional costs would not be visited on more than they were under the scheme introduc That is as valid now as it was then. I know that was made at some length on Second Reading, b it because it is of particular relevance to small which employ fewer than 20 people.

About 96 per cent. of United Kingdom employ fewer than 20 people. Such business cannot afford statutory or other occupationa schemes. It is not economically feasible for then The figures that I have been given show that th be anything up to £11 a week, and can run fo under the Bill's provisions. If such costs were v one or two-person business, it could face diffic

If one or two of the people involved in two-person business are sick for 28 weeks, th reclaim national insurance contributions becau not paying any contributions to recover. What are the people in business at that sort of level expected to do in the context of the new provisions? It is all very well if one is running a major company with professionals to advise on such matters, or if one's national insurance contribution of £1,000 or £2,000 is billed each week so that one can deduct and divvy up and, in the fulness of time, everything works out in the wash. The arguments are fairly suspect even at that level, but when applied to businesses that are self-owned or have a sole proprietor, the Bill's provisions have some frightening consequences.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security, the hon. Member for Norfolk, South-West (Mrs. Shephard), provided a useful answer to a parliamentary question tabled by the hon. Member for Coventry, South-East (Mr. Nellist) on 24 January. The question involved the number of changes in the statutory sick pay scheme and its administration since its introduction—there have been 19. I shall not detain the Committee by reading out the list, but they are all of some significance. That is all very well for someone who works in the accounts department of ICI because he or she can cope with it very well—I do not complain about that. But it must have been difficult to keep up with that pace of change since March 1985. I concede that the changes included uprating of statutory sick pay rates, so we can subtract five from the total of 19, but that still leaves a significant number of changes for a small business confronting the Bill's provisions. I see that the ministerial brows is again furrowed.

The changes will have major effects on employers, particularly those in small businesses. They will encourage the small number of businesses which perhaps do not play to the rules as they should and are guilty of malpractice, to opt out. That will have a direct adverse impact on the employees of the small firms. I read the debate on Second Reading carefully and it contained well-rehearsed arguments about the Bill's impact—which will be big enough—on part-timers, women and disabled employees. However, it will have a particularly great impact on people in smaller firms. The employees in such firms are totally reliant on statutory sick pay and the Bill will have serious consequences for them.

This is an important debate and I could go on at great length, but I do not want to repeat points made on Second Reading. This is one of the most crucial amendments and unless I receive some fairly convincing answers, I reserve the right to invite the House to divide on it. I shall be grateful if I have some support. It is often a lonely furrow to plough in the modern Liberal Democrat party and I am grateful for support from wherever it comes. If I may be facetious, the three Conservative Members present should look carefully at the Bill's impact because the Conservative party often beats its chest about what it has achieved for small businesses. To use fighting talk, if they are not careful, the Government will get beaten in the jaw at the next election, and will not be easily forgiven. They must be cautious if they want to introduce such a measure with impunity. I say that with some passion, because the argument has been put to me with great force.

I shall encapsulate my argument by giving a quote from Mr. Ian Handford, the employment affairs chairman of the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses. I know that the briefing was probably sent to other Members. It states:

"The Government is shifting the welfare state onto the backs of the business community. Small businesses just cannot take on board state benefits out of their present meagre profits."

The sting is in the document's tail, which states:

"If only 10 per cent. of all businesses take evasive action to defend themselves from this attack then there will be a loss of some 350,000 jobs."

Rather than take on the additional hassle of the financial and administrative burden of the Bill, companies may simply divest themselves of employees. If that happens it will be a tragedy, not just for the employees and the firms, but for the British economy. Those are the stakes involved in the group of amendments. I hope that the Minister will seriously consider the arguments put to him before he decides to rule out the amendment.

Mr. Peter Thurnham (Bolton, North-East): The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) spoke about dividing the Committee. He does not need to go that far, but he is right to put down a marker, because the Bill makes a change to the arrangements that were originally agreed. People would be worried if there were further changes. I spoke on Second Reading, but I had to leave the Chamber before the end of the Minister's opening speech and did not hear his comments about the Bill's effect on smaller businesses. I was concerned when I read in Hansard that he said:

"it was not possible to engage in advance in substantial consultation."—[Official Report, 26 November 1990; Vol. 181, c. 644.]

If there is any intention to move further down this road, I hope that there will be time fully to consult small businesses on all the issues raised by the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire.

5 pm

When I spoke on Monday, I declared an interest as a small employer. I consulted my company about the effect of the Bill and received a fax just before the debate, saying that the effect would be insignificant. My arithmetic suggests that it will mean £5 per annum for each employee. That means that, for a firm employing 10 people, the cost would be £50. Of course, all firms will pass on the cost in order to survive and that may have a small inflationary effect. I hope that no more such costs will be imposed, because they could lead to price rises. The swings and roundabouts effect does not always work for small employers, and it will be necessary to see to what extent employers will need to have insurance to cover the costs.

Yesterday I attended a meeting with members of the Electrical Contractors Association. They are worried about the Bill's effect on smaller employers and especially about the way in which it could encourage such employers to use self-employed people who work on 714 certificates. They were not happy about the effect of the changes on the structure of the industry; it would encourage some companies to put their work in the hands of self-employed people. That can have an effect on the relationship between the trade association and the industry as a whole.

Britain is almost unique in having no statutory regulation of the electrical industry in the way that such regulation works abroad. Generally speaking, electrical contracting abroad is subject to statutory regulation. However, in Britain the trade association polices standards. If that association's standing were to be eroded by legislation that would change its structure, such legislation would be viewed unfavourably. If the Government intend to move further down this road, I hope that they will allow proper time to consult representatives of industry and that the electrical contracting industry will be included because of its responsibility to ensure standards.

Britain is different from other countries in the Common Market in that it does not have the statutory regulation that I have mentioned, and that creates difficulties for British companies trying to compete in the Community on equal terms. At the moment, foreign companies can compete in Britain because we do not have statutory regulations to prevent them from setting up here. However, overseas countries have restrictions that make it impossible for British companies to compete there. There is no comparability enabling a British company automatically to be accepted in France, Germany or Italy.

Electrical contractors would like to see the industry regulated, but the Government do not like to regulate and prefer arrangements to be voluntary. Such arrangements are threatened by the changes in the Bill. I support the Bill as a whole, but I should like to be assured that there will be full consultation before there are any more changes. Those consultations should be with representatives of smaller firms and with industries that are affected by the Bill.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire was right to table his amendment, but I hope that he will not press it to a Division, because in its present form the Bill has a de minimis effect on employers.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): The speech by the hon. Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham) showed modest courage. Unfortunately, it did not last until the end of his speech. We can understand that, because these are dangerous times for the Conservative party and they are fraught with many anxieties. The Secretary of State is not in his place, but we hope that he will rejoin us before the end of the debate. Who can tell?

The National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses in Wales contacted me and no doubt it contacted hon. Members in other parts of the country. It fully studied our deliberations on Monday and has returned with greater vehemence against the Bill. The federation has not accepted any of the Government's assurances. It says:

"The Government is shifting the wefare state onto the backs of the business community."

That is right, and the process is being carried out in small ways.

A regulation about welfare milk was debated in the House and it was discovered that precisely the same process was going on. All six or seven Conservative Members who spoke in the debate derided the change. One went so far as to describe it as crazy. The Government proposed to push on to the milkman, who is a small business man, £80 million which had previously been provided by the state. The Bill is another move in that direction.

A series of small moves, regulations and changes, passing through Parliament with hardly any attention from outside, are an attempt to privatise the welfare state. Costs have been moved on to the backs of various other agencies. It is good to see that small business men—there is little else in the country except small businesses now—are fighting back. Small business men have had a rough deal from the Government. We are in an economic recession and have high interest rates, and rightly warning us that one of the consequen nasty little Bill could be another c unemployment.

Even at this late stage, the Governme reconsider the Bill. In a modest, persuasive wa Member for Bolton, North-East said gen Government—we shall speak with a stronger there should have been consultation. He said i now, but perhaps there will be consultation in whole process has been a disgrace. It is quite organisations representing small businesses against a Government whom they see as repres and say that this is not government by reason o but the policy of an elected tyranny.

On Second Reading, the Government's case collapsed, but still they forge ahead regard arguments. That is not the way that G throughout the century until the last dark Thatcherism have behaved. There have bee changes in the past 24 hours. There is a new f Government continue to pursue the same old and tyrannical policies. I hope that in the speech we shall be given some hope that the c be postponed or subjected to major modificat

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): As a fo business man, I should like to speak about the faced by small businesses over statutory sick p was running an employment agency in Yo transfer of the administration of statutory sic the DHSS, as it was then, to the emplo horrendous business, because there was d understanding the regulations. In a business several hundred people, it is almost certain that somebody is drawing statutory sick pay.

Every time the part-time employee who ca wages in my firm had to deal with statutory came to see me, the managing director, so that through the regulations again to see wheth applying them correctly. I ask my right hon. Minister to grab a little booklet on this subjec work out how much statutory sick pay has t somebody has had a few days of sick, or has b then come back and then gone off sick again.

I know that we are examining the Bill to se needs amending, but I ask my right hon. Friend fundamental in his approach. The Tory party i revision of many aspects of life. It is strange t a statutory sick pay scheme that provides o amount of the money that somebody in emplo has been sick would normally receive. The pe working out, at the end of the week, what should receive, would normally, if there were sick pay scheme, pay the usual £100 a week, d normal tax and national insurance contributio the Government provide a contribution in statutory sick pay, the firm makes a calculation, ensuring that all the paperwork is makes the wages up to the normal level from The Ministry can examine all the paperwork

The amount of money that the Governm employer is probably less than the c administration of the scheme. I suspect that kn 80 per cent. of SSP off national insurance, ra of it—yet another calculation problem and ca —will result only in more difficulties. If we go down this route—European legislation may be pushing us this way —employers may be forced to bring in a form of sick pay insurance for all their employees. Perhaps we should go a step further and make all employees have some form of insurance that pays all their wages if they are sick or off work on maternity leave or for some other reason.

I know that Labour Members may be upset about the thought of fully comprehensive insurance schemes, but the Government insurance scheme is an insurance scheme only for a small part of what people expect when they are in employment. Therefore, we have the worst of all worlds instead of the best of all worlds. People should know what they are paying for, rather than, as they do with the employers' national insurance, piling in the money and——

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I hate to interrupt the hon. Member, but he is going very wide of the amendments.

Mr. Bruce: I am sorry that you interrupted me, Miss Boothroyd, because I was about to finish, and then I would have stopped being out of order.

I started by addressing my remarks to the specifics of the small business, but began to go far wider. To attack this problem in its minutiae may be the wrong approach. Perhaps we should be looking at the way that the business works. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Minister will take note of what I am saying. Many of the small business men whom I know are upset; perhaps because they have got hold of some incorrect publicity about what the scheme will cost them. We should look at SSP provisions again. If the Government want to move this away from being an additional Government expenditure and towards loading it on small businesses, we should perhaps go the whole hog and go for a private insurance scheme rather than a statutory sick pay system.

Mr. Allen McKay (Barnsley, West and Penistone): The thrust of Government policy, in general and in the particular with this Bill, is towards private insurance schemes for everybody. That is what it is all about and it would be better if the Government came out and said so. Both the Labour party and small businesses have long been asking for consultations, but the Government have adopted a drip, drip, drip approach, introducing Bills such as this. In my constituency, small businesses are unhappy about the Bill because they are running on a shoestring.

The Government repeatedly tell us that the rise of small businesses is important. If that is so, why are they loading these extra burdens onto small businesses? The Government say that small businesses will increase in number and employ more people, but Bills such as this make small businesses look again at the bottom line of their costs and decide either not to take on more people or that they have too many people already, and so spend too much on employees. Furthermore, they are uncertain about the future.

5.15 pm

There should have been consultations about the Bill, but there was not, because last time the Government introduced such a Bill, there was a great furore, which forced the Government to retract what they intended. That is why we have had a two-day debate on the Bill—to mak sure that the furore, which has started, will be too lat when its get going.

The Government should look seriously at the effect tha the Bill will have on businesses. It is bad enough to load o them administration of a sick pay scheme, which rightl belongs to the state benefit system, because there are s many different employers, different sizes of employers an different possibilities. Now, the Government are going little bit further and making firms bear not only the cost o administration but part of the cost of paying sick pay Firms should be reimbursed 100 per cent., because, unles we adopt the Japanese idea of manufacturing, with all th benefits that go with that, piecemeal changes such as thi should not be introduced. If there is to be an employer sick pay scheme, there should be full consultation and i should be introduced properly.

Mr. Tony Banks: I thank the hon. Member fo Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) fo explaining the thinking behind the amendments. I wa slightly confused when I looked at them, but I nov understand everything, as he has explained that they wer drafted by a Scottish advocate. I suppose that the theor that, by mentioning large firms, only one automatically excludes small firms has a certain logic. Perhaps the hon Member, as an advocate, submits his bills by sending th client the change and allowing him to deduce from tha how much the bill would be. That is a strange way to d it.

I agree with the hon. Gentleman's comments about th haste with which the Bill is being pushed through. It i rather perverse that we shall have less time for th Committee stage, when we are supposed to look at th clauses in great detail, than we did for Second Reading, th debate on which included repetition of a number of points We do not understand why there should be such haste, an I hope that the Minister, in his usual courteous way, wil explain that to the House.

The Minister must excuse us for feeling rathe suspicious, because we have seen the way in which th Government, under the previous Prime Minister, wer wont to deal with opposition by riding roughshod over it We are about to have a rerun of this, although we have a new Prime Minister. It is clear from the speeches of th hon. Members for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham and for Dorset, South (Mr. Bruce) that they are unhappy about the Bill.

When the hon. Member for Roxburgh an Berwickshire puts the amendment to the vote, th Opposition will support him, but Tory Members will com flooding in from outside, not knowing what the argument are, and will be whipped through the No Lobby. Th Minister should pay heed to debates in the Committe dealing with a Bill. As all the speeches so far have, to some extent, shown concern, ranging through to outrigh opposition, the Minister should reconsider his positio and introduce amendments at a later stage. However, a the Bill's remaining stages will be taken tonight, it will b difficult for him to do that. He seems to have boxed himsel into a corner, but I suspect that that is a position into which he wanted to be put.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire said that it takes experts to work things out in this area, and I do not pretend to be an expert. However, I had some sympathy with the hon. Member for Dorset, South when he was explaining the problems that small businesses experience as more and more administrative burdens are laid upon them while they try to get on with making some money.

[Mr. Tony Banks]

For the Opposition to come in so heavily in support of small businesses may seem rather strange to Conservative Members, but we do support initiative and enterprise, particularly among those who, by the efforts of their hands and brains, are trying to make a decent living. When I try to complete my tax return at the end of the year and have to look at all my office accounts, I realise what it is to be a small business man. If I had wanted to be a shopkeeper, I could have aspired to being one. I find it tedious dealing with all the invoices and I can well imagine why, with all these changes, small business people feel so frustrated.

The hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire said that we must rely on experts and when it comes to the Bill's impact we must rely on the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses. On Second Reading, it was said that, when making their submissions to the Government, many organisations tend to overstress the difficulties as a negotiating position from which to try to pull the Government back a bit. But the federation is not exaggerating; it is being straightforward. I am reinforced in that belief by the contributions by the hon. Members for Bolton, North-East and for Dorset, South. They made a number of good points.

If I recall correctly, when the views of the federation were dealt with on Second reading, the Secretary of State said that perhaps it did not know the full extent of the proposals and that when it knew the full extent of the national insurance contributions it might feel happier. The federation has sent further details to most hon. Members who took part in that debate, so it has had a chance to study the points made by Ministers on Second Reading and it is still not happy. Indeed, it is even more unhappy than it was on Second Reading.

It may be that Mr. Handford, speaking on behalf of the federation, is being over-alarmist, but I do not think that he would be happy with such an accusation. In his press release, he says:

> "The Government is shifting the welfare state onto the backs of the business community. Small businesses just cannot take on board state benefits out of their present meagre profits. If only 10 per cent. of all businesses take evasive action to defend themselves from this attack then there will be a loss of some 350,000 jobs."

I should like to know exactly what that means because it is a rather threatening note to put in a press statement. Does it mean that 10 per cent. of small businesses will lay off workers who are sick? If so, that is alarming. It is surely not something that the Government want to happen. I hope that there will be some reconsideration of the matter.

Labour Members and small businesses suspect that this is part of an onion-peeling exercise which the Government so often adopt when making changes, particularly in social welfare, and that this is one small step which will be followed by other small steps. The Bill clearly gives the Government the opportunity to make even further reductions. There is a great deal of suspicion that the payment of workplace benefits will, in the end, be moved on to the backs of all businesses. If that is the objective, the Government should come clean and tell us, but I suspect that they will not. I am sure that the Mi often believes passionately, that honesty but at times he is not prepared to give in

In those circumstances, we are r amendments and to pay attention expressed by the federation. I hope tha received them because the federation n points with which he should deal when not appear to have done so, so let me various points.

The document says that the federati
"estimates that if only 10 per cent. of the s were to take defensive action against the n will be a loss of some 350,000 jobs."
Secondly, it says:

"An extra 350,000 unemployed woul
more in benefits than the Government's £100 million not to mention the social co
Thirdly, it says:

"The NFSE is not concerned about the suffers the average three-week sick pay.
about the small business with one or two e suffer the full 28 week sick leave."
Lastly, it says:

"Such a business would suffer costs scheme of over £300. The reduction in insurance will only save the small busin small businesses of over £200."

The federation represents the sort o the Government are often pointing to s economic miracle is happening. The believe them, and nor, it would app business people.

I hope that when the Minister replie reply specifically to the points made suffer the most—the small businesses.

The Minister for Social Security an
(Mr. Nicholas Scott): The hon. Member Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) complai that my brow was furrowed. He should with responsibility for social security.
Friend the Foreign Secretary said, o equal, I expect that my brow will conti for some time to come as I deal with w complex area of Government policy.
never be simple and straightforward, respond to a range of different needs society who, one way or another, fall

The hon. Gentleman asked why we quickly. I do not want to bore the H what my right hon. Friend the Secretary on Second Reading only about 48 hours reason for proceeding quickly was to maximum possible notice so that arrangements, adjust their software or to do, to ensure that all the arra implemented by April 1991.

We had no ulterior motive and we ha way to alert employers, their organisa what we were proposing. I cannot ren letters I have signed in reply to ho forwarded to me the concerns of the organisations and other bodies so that to consider those replies and, if necess me.

It is only tangential, but I was aske were only 15 Bills in the Queen's Spe proceed at a slightly more relaxed pace.

er realises, and
the best course,
the temptation.
to table the the opinions
e Minister has es a number of eplies. He does him about the

l business sector
SSP regime there

ost considerably mated saving of ge company that are concerned oyees that could

er the new SSP
ployers national £100. A cost to eople to whom where the real position never do the small

e will direct his those who will

Disabled People
Roxburgh and
, I think twice,
being Minister
my right hon.
r things being to be furrowed is essentially a al security can use it seeks to individuals in on hard times.
e proceeding so e by reiterating
State and I said
o, but our main employers the could make tever they have ments can be gone out of our s and so on to ber how many Members who mall employers'

will have time
, come back to

hy, since there
, we could not
ust remind him

that there were only 15 Bills in the previous Queen's Speech, but about 40 reached the statute book that Session. The Queen's Speech does not necessarily cover every contingency that arises during the parliamentary Session.

5.30 pm

The hon. Gentleman suggested that the Bill will result in savings, and of course that is true. Government and Social Security Ministers will have to reassess their priorities constantly, and the savings that flow from the Bill will play some part in meeting the cost of the special provision for poorer pensioners and of uprating residential care and nursing home limits in the coming year. There is nothing wrong with asking businesses to accept a modest increase in the contribution they make to meet the sickness costs of their employees.

Mr. Kirkwood: Does the Minister have any information about the cost of limiting the measure according to the size of the firm? That calculation may be almost impossible to make, but it would help the Committee if the right hon. Gentleman could say what the cost of the amendment would be.

Mr. Scott: I will deal shortly with the specific impact of the Bill, but I shall first answer some of the more general points that have been made.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) used the phrase "onion peeling" and other hon. Members asked whether, by introducing this measure in the current Session, we are embarking on a process of steadily reducing the percentage of sickness pay that will be met by the Government. On Second Reading, both my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and I said that we have no plans to go down that route.

Ms. Clare Short (Birmingham, Ladywood) indicated dissent.

Mr. Scott: The hon. Lady may not take my word for that, but I assure her that I am speaking the truth. I say the same to my hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, North-East (Mr. Thurnham).

Mr. Thurnham: The point has been made to me that firms which cover their sickness costs by an insurance scheme will now face higher premiums, so the Bill will contribute to inflation—although I accept that the amount involved will be quite tiny.

Mr. Scott: That money will be spent one way or another, either by the Government or by businesses.

The assumption is often made that sickness payments are always for a period of 28 weeks, but as was made clear on Second Reading, the average spell of sickness is only three weeks. Ninety per cent. of absences end within eight weeks, and many end earlier, after only one or two weeks.

I dispute any suggestion that the IFF survey was slanted towards larger firms. It covered a range of businesses, from small to much larger firms, and the patterns of sickness that occurred in them all were taken into account.

The Department gives maximum assistance to employers in helping them to cope with the undoubted burden of administering statutory sick pay, in the form of videos, seminars, wall charts and other aids, so that they can make their calculations as simply and accurately as possible. The help given by the Government to small firms in a variety of ways far outside the scope Department has encouraged the growth in businesses over the past few years.

My hon. Friend the Member for Bolton, Nor asked about the electrical contracting indust recollection of that industry, from long before I the House, is that it was in the forefront of provid and holiday coverage to small contractors. I imag that continues. I have a great deal of admiration industry's innovations in that respect, and if m Friend will convey to me the detail of the concern expressed, I will give him a considered reply.

The amendments seek a restriction on the redu reimbursement from 100 per cent. to 80 per c employers with 20 or more employees. They woul two reimbursement rates—one for firms with few 20 employees, which would recover all the SSP the and another of 80 per cent. for the remaining firms not surprise the hon. Member for Roxburg Berwickshire that, while appreciating the concerns has expressed, the Government are unable to acc amendments.

When my right hon. Friend the Secretary o examined the national insurance fund to establish w its ingoings and outgoings were in balance, and w contributions could be reduced in any way, he wa of the intention to follow the route that we have fo in respect of SSP, and consciously made extra and provision within the alterations to national ins contributions, to devise a package that woul particular help to smaller employers.

The reductions are specifically geared to contri payable by employers in respect of employees sub the lowest rates—that is, earning £185 or less a From April 1991, the lower rates of 5, 7 and 9 per ce be reduced by 0·4 per cent. to 4·6 per cent., 6·6 pe and 8·6 per cent. respectively. That compares w much smaller reduction of 0·05 per cent. in the emp contribution in respect of employees earning mo £185 a week. Concentrating reductions on the low will give extra help to small employers in particul

The precise implications for individual employ vary considerably, according to the rates of pay th employees enjoy and the level of sickness experie their work force. Assuming the normal incide sickness, in many small firms any extra SSP costs offset by reductions in the employers' national ins contributions. On Second Reading, my right hon. gave examples of the positive savings that will accr least some employers. Therefore, we do not believe t amendments are either justified or necessary.

Mr. Tony Banks: The Minister describes w believes will happen, but it might not turn out like t what extent will the new arrangement be monitored Department, so that if some of the claims made b Members prove to be true, amendments can be pro

Mr. Scott: Elizabeth I said that when she die would find Calais engraved on her heart. When "monitoring" will be found engraved on my hea constantly monitor every aspect of the social s system, and that is often done by independent re organisations that the Department commissio monitor the impact of social security changes.

Mr. Ian Bruce: As someone who has argued that employers' national insurance contributions should be lower, I ask my right hon. Friend to say whether employers as a whole will incur less cost under the new arrangements. The note on the financial implications of the Bill says that it will save my right hon. Friend's Department £250 million each year, but will the national insurance fund stand to lose that £250 million—or an even higher sum?

Mr. Scott: Broadly, the savings that employers will gain as a result of reductions in national insurance contributions will offset a large part of the extra costs that they will incur because of the reduction in their reimbursement for statutory sick pay. There will be a saving which will help to fund other improvements in the social security system. Many small employers will find that, because of the way in which we have altered the structure of national insurance, there is no cost to them. Some may see some savings as a result of the changes that we are making.

There are two other reasons why I do not believe we should accept the amendments. It is quite common for Ministers to stand at the Dispatch Box and to plead administrative difficulties with any changes. In this case there will not merely be administrative difficulties for the Department of Social Security and the Inland Revenue in operating a dual system of reimbursement. There would be practical problems and increased costs for employers were we to go down that route.

Many companies, especially small businesses, have fluctuating work forces—they may employ 20 people one week and take on 20 people the following week. Different levels of reimbursement for statutory sick pay would severely complicate the employer's work. Also, monitoring checks have to be carried out by the Department of Social Security and the Inland Revenue to ensure that the right contributions were being paid by employers and that the correct amount of statutory sick pay was being paid to the employees. Administrative difficulties would look quite large in the public sector and for the employers.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West asked me to cover the question of additional costs. I do not think that the Committee would expect me to overlook that point. The latest figures suggest that about 85 per cent. of businesses—2·5 million firms operating in this country—have under 20 employees. It is estimated that, if we went down the road proposed in the amendment, the public expenditure savings that we will make because of the Bill would be reduced by about £45 million, which is a far from insignificant sum.

For all the reasons that I have outlined, we do not believe that that is the right course. Bearing in mind the fact that the average absence of sickness is only three weeks and that 90 per cent. of absences are over within eight weeks, we do not believe that the implications for employers will be significant.

As I said in response to an earlier intervention, we shall of course monitor the position, but I have to invite the Committee to reject the amendments.

5.45 pm

Mr. Kirkwood: That was a genuinely disappointing response. I get a clear impression—although I do not necessarily put the blame on the Minister—from the Minister's reply that he has no idea of the difficulties which are being thrust upon small businesses. He may say, quite reasonably, that it is a matter not of hi of the Department of Employment and no impression that he understands the Bill will cause.

At the end of his speech he helpful excluded businesses with fewer than 20 e in the amendment, it would cost £45 m is not worth a candle—it is not worth th and administrative inconvenience and d cause. Out of a departmental headline —£55 billion next year—£45 million is compared to the stress, anxiety and ang throughout the country in small busines measure.

I warn the Minister that I shall s speeches to people who send complaint that he is writing to organisations businesses. However, they have difficul with their membership. By the time down to the shop floor or to the corner will have been done and the anger will blame them for being angry. The Hous and I urge hon. Members to reflect that on the amendment and voting against refusal to accept the amendments.

Question put, That the amendment

The Committee divided: Ayes 128, N

Division No. 13]

AYES

Allen, Graham	Fields, Ter
Alton, David	Fisher, Ma
Anderson, Donald	Flannery, M
Archer, Rt Hon Peter	Flynn, Paul
Ashdown, Rt Hon Paddy	Foot, Rt Ho
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)	George, Br
Barnes, Harry (Derbyshire NE)	Gilbert, Rt
Barron, Kevin	Gordon, Mi
Battle, John	Grant, Ben
Beckett, Margaret	Griffiths, W
Beggs, Roy	Grocott, Br
Benton, Joseph	Hardy, Pet
Bermingham, Gerald	Hattersley,
Boyes, Roland	Haynes, Fr
Bray, Dr Jeremy	Heal, Mrs S
Brown, Nicholas (Newcastle E)	Hinchliffe,
Buckley, George J.	Hogg, N. (C
Caborn, Richard	Home Robe
Callaghan, Jim	Howarth, G
Campbell, Menzies (Fife NE)	Howells, G
Campbell, Ron (Blyth Valley)	Hughes, Jo
Campbell-Savours, D. N.	Hughes, Ro
Carlile, Alex (Mont g)	Hughes, Ro
Clay, Bob	Hughes, Si
Clelland, David	Janner, Gr
Clwyd, Mrs Ann	Jones, Bar
Coleman, Donald	Jones, Mar
Corbett, Robin	Kilfedder,
Corbyn, Jeremy	Lambie, Da
Cousins, Jim	Leadbitter,
Cox, Tom	Leighton, R
Crowther, Stan	Lestor, Joa
Cryer, Bob	Lewis, Ter
Cummings, John	Litherland,
Davies, Ron (Caerphilly)	Livingstone
Davis, Terry (B'ham Hodge H'l)	Livsey, Ric
Dixon, Don	Lloyd, Ton
Doran, Frank	Lofthouse,
Dunwoody, Hon Mrs Gwyneth	Loyden, Ed
Eadie, Alexander	McAllion, J
Eastham, Ken	McFall, Jo
Evans, John (St Helens N)	McKay, All
Ewing, Harry (Falkirk E)	McWilliam
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)	Mahon, Mr

Marek, Dr John
Meacher, Michael
Meale, Alan
Michael, Alun
Michie, Bill (Sheffield Heeley)
Michie, Mrs Ray (Arg'l & Bute)
Molyneaux, Rt Hon James
Morley, Elliot
Morris, Rt Hon A. (W'shawe)
Mowlam, Marjorie
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Paul
Nellist, Dave
Oakes, Rt Hon Gordon
O'Brien, William
O'Hara, Edward
Owen, Rt Hon Dr David
Pike, Peter L.
Prescott, John
Primarolo, Dawn
Quin, Ms Joyce
Redmond, Martin
Richardson, Jo
Rooker, Jeff
Rooney, Terence
Sheerman, Barry
Sheldon, Rt Hon Robert
Shore, Rt Hon Peter
Short, Clare
Skinner, Dennis
Taylor, Mrs Ann (Dewsbury)
Taylor, Matthew (Truro)
Thomas, Dr Dafydd Elis
Turner, Dennis
Wareing, Robert N.
Williams, Rt Hon Alan
Williams, Alan W. (Carm'then)
Wilson, Brian
Winnick, David
Wise, Mrs Audrey

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Archy Kirkwood and
Mr. A. J. Beith.

NOES

Alison, Rt Hon Michael
Allason, Rupert
Amos, Alan
Arbuthnot, James
Arnold, Jacques (Gravesham)
Ashby, David
Atkinson, David
Baker, Nicholas (Dorset N)
Beaumont-Dark, Anthony
Bellingham, Henry
Bennett, Nicholas (Pembroke)
Benyon, W.
Bevan, David Gilroy
Blackburn, Dr John G.
Body, Sir Richard
Boscawen, Hon Robert
Bottomley, Peter
Bowden, A (Brighton K'pto'n)
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Bowis, John
Brandon-Bravo, Martin
Brazier, Julian
Bright, Graham
Brooke, Rt Hon Peter
Brown, Michael (Brigg & Cl't's)
Browne, John (Winchester)
Bruce, Ian (Dorset South)
Buck, Sir Antony
Budgen, Nicholas
Burns, Simon
Butcher, John
Carrington, Matthew
Carttiss, Michael
Chapman, Sydney
Churchill, Mr
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Colvin, Michael
Conway, Derek
Coombs, Simon (Swindon)
Cormack, Patrick
Couchman, James
Cran, James
Critchley, Julian
Day, Stephen
Dickens, Geoffrey
Dunn, Bob
Durant, Tony
Eggar, Tim
Evennett, David
Favell, Tony
Field, Barry (Isle of Wight)
Fishburn, John Dudley
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Fowler, Rt Hon Sir Norman
Fox, Sir Marcus
Franks, Cecil
Fry, Peter
Gale, Roger
Glyn, Dr Sir Alan
Goodlad, Alastair
Goodson-Wickes, Dr Charles
Grant, Sir Anthony (CambsSW)
Greenway, Harry (Ealing N)
Greenway, John (Ryedale)
Griffiths, Peter (Portsmouth N)
Ground, Patrick
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hanley, Jeremy
Hargreaves, A. (B'ham H'll Gr')
Hargreaves, Ken (Hyndburn)
Harris, David
Haselhurst, Alan
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Sir Barney
Hayward, Robert
Higgins, Rt Hon Terence L.
Hill, James
Hind, Kenneth
Hordern, Sir Peter
Howard, Rt Hon Michael
Howarth, G. (Cannock & B'wd)
Howell, Ralph (North Norfolk)
Hunt, David (Wirral W)
Hunt, Sir John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Irvine, Michael
Jack, Michael
Janman, Tim
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Robert B (Herts W)
Kellett-Bowman, Dame Elaine
King, Roger (B'ham N'thfield)
Kirkhope, Timothy
Knapman, Roger
Knight, Greg (Derby North)
Knight, Dame Jill (Edgbaston)
Knox, David
Lawrence, Ivan
Lester, Jim (Broxtowe)
Lightbown, David
Lloyd, Peter (Fareham)
Luce, Rt Hon Richard
Macfarlane, Sir Neil
MacGregor, Rt Hon John
McLoughlin, Patrick
Madel, David
Mans, Keith
Maples, John
Marshall, John (Hendon S)
Marshall, Sir Michael (Arundel)
Martin, David (Portsmouth S)
Mates, Michael
Meyer, Sir Anthony
Mills, Iain
Mitchell, Andrew (Gedling)
Mitchell, Sir David
Montgomery, Sir Fergus
Morrison, Sir Charles
Moss, Malcolm
Mudd, David
Neale, Gerrard
Neubert, Michael
Newton, Rt Hon Tony
Nicholson, David (Taunton)
Nicholson, Emma (Devon West)
Norris, Steve
Onslow, Rt Hon Cranley
Oppenheim, Phillip
Page, Richard
Pawsey, James
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Porter, Barry (Wirral S)
Porter, David (Waveney)
Powell, William (Corby)
Price, Sir David
Raffan, Keith
Raison, Rt Hon Timothy
Renton, Rt Hon Tim
Roberts, Sir Wyn (Conwy)
Rossi, Sir Hugh
Sackville, Hon Tom
Scott, Rt Hon Nicholas
Shaw, David (Dover)
Shaw, Sir Giles (Pudsey)
Shaw, Sir Michael (Scarb')
Shelton, Sir William
Shephard, Mrs G. (Norfolk SW)
Shepherd, Richard (Aldrid
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)
Speller, Tony
Stanbrook, Ivor
Stern, Michael
Stevens, Lewis
Stewart, Andy (Sherwood)
Taylor, Ian (Esher)
Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Tebbit, Rt Hon Norman
Temple-Morris, Peter
Thompson, D. (Calder Vall Thompson, Patrick (Norwi
Thornton, Malcolm
Thurnham, Peter
Townend, John (Bridlingto
Tracey, Richard
Twinn, Dr Ian
Viggers, Peter
Waddington, Rt Hon David
Walden, George
Ward, John
Watts, John
Wheeler, Sir John
Widdecombe, Ann
Wilkinson, John
Wilshire, David
Winterton, Nicholas
Wood, Timothy
Woodcock, Dr. Mike
Yeo, Tim
Young, Sir George (Acton)

Tellers for the Noes
Mr. Tim Boswell and
Mr. Irvine Patnick.

Question accordingly negatived.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): On a poi order, Miss Boothroyd. Do you know whether the H is to receive a statement later today? Now that the hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) has been n Secretary of State for the Environment, he may like to this opportunity of making real the promises he mad the dying hours of yesterday morning's contest whe said that he intends to abolish the poll tax.

The Second Deputy Chairman: The House is alw happy to be kept abreast of the news, but that has not to do with our Standing Orders or the Statutory Sick
Bill, discussion of which we shall continue.

Mr. Michael Meacher (Oldham, West): I beg to m amendment No. 8, in page 1, line 14, leave out from 'o
'and' in line 15 and insert

'so much of each of those payments as was made in respe the first two weeks of

(a) a period of incapacity for work, or
(b) two or more such periods separated by a perio not more than two weeks, and 100 per cent. o remainder of those payments.'.

The Second Deputy Chairman: With this it will convenient to consider new clause 1—Limitation restricted reimbursement of statutory sick pay.—

'The provisions of this Act, insofar as they amend sec
9 of the Social Security and Housing Benefits Act (recovery by employers of amounts paid by way of statu sick pay) shall only have effect to the extent of amount by an employer in respect of statutory sick pay paid t employee during the first three weeks of his absence f employment.'.

Mr. Meacher: One of the worst aspects of the Bill is it puts at risk the employment prospects of those with p health records. In his reply to the Second Reading deb

[Mr. Meacher]

the Minister of State said that he acknowledged the importance of that point, but he sought to reassure the House about the work of the Department of Employment in trying to promote the job opportunities of the disabled.

That misses the point. All that work, such as it is, is undermined by the Bill. The Bill will act as a greater deterrent to employers taking on disabled or chronically sick people than all the positive efforts of the Department of Employment taken together. That is what we are trying to redress, and it is the reason why we have tabled the amendment.

The amendment will retain the 100 per cent. remimbursement rate for any sick pay period after the first two weeks of sickness. For that purpose, we propose that two spells separated by an interval of two weeks or less will be treated as a single spell—a reasonable proposal—so that the 80 per cent. reimbursement rate would apply for only two weeks.

The amendment does not imply—one must always be careful to meet the procedures of the House, and although we cannot table an amendment to negate the purpose of the Bill we must get as close as possible to doing so while keeping within the rules—that we would be in favour of reducing the reimbursement rate to below 100 per cent. for any period. To prevent that, Parliament would have had to have rejected the whole Bill, but, unwisely, it did not do so on Second Reading.

Therefore, we tabled the amendment to draw attention to one of the Bill's worst effects—the fact that employers will be unwilling to employ not only people who have had prolonged or repeated periods of sickness but those whom they believe, rightly or wrongly, may have poor health prospects. In future, such people will clearly be at risk.

6 pm

There is plenty of evidence of job discrimination against disabled persons or those who suffer from poor health. On Second Reading, I quoted the study carried out by the Spastics Society entitled "An Equal Chance for Disabled People? A Study of Discrimination in Employment". I said that its findings were that there was

"systematic evidence of the most blatant discrimination by employers."—[Official Report, 26 November 1990; Vol. 181, c. 649.]

Although I did not say this on Second Reading, in the further analysis of this debate I shall quote its report more fully:

"Employers were sent identical pairs of applications to jobs advertised, the only difference being that one application was a non-disabled person and the other from someone who mentioned that they had a disability of some kind. It was found that able-bodied applicants were 1·6 times more likely than disabled applicants to be offered an interview. On the basis of these tests, the researchers concluded that 'disabled applicants had far less than an equal chance.'"

Those are the facts about employers being prepared to offer an interview to disabled persons or to those with chronic ill health. The disparity in offering jobs to disabled or chronically sick people is far greater.

On Second Reading, the Minister of State mentioned a survey entitled "Employment and Handicap" by Patricia Prescott-Clarke of Social and Community Planning Research, which was published this year. It found that there was strong evidence that people who become sick or disabled while in employment are already in a very vulnerable position. For example, nearly one third of those who had to leave their job for health reasons had been dismissed or had felt pressurised into leaving because of impairment.

The study found:

"Employers appear to be more likely to dismiss employees of short acquaintance who had acquired an impairment that affects their work than those who have worked for them for several years."

If that is the attitude of employers to disabled or chronically sick people already in their employment, what will be their attitude to those applying for jobs? That is the issue that the amendment addresses. There is clear evidence of substantial discrimination against those already in employment. We believe that the Bill will create a much higher and more difficult recruitment hurdle for disabled people.

Another vulnerable group whom we do not discuss as much as we should is those with a record of mental illness. Many people who have a degree of mental illness are capable of entering at least the fringes of the job market if they have support. Responding to the Government's proposed extension of the statutory sick pay scheme to 28 weeks, the National Association for Mental Health gave this warning:

"Shifting the payment of SSP to employers will add to discriminatory practices and make employees vulnerable to dismissal if the employer chooses to investigate the health records of those with a history of mental illness."

I could go on giving much more evidence, but the picture is perfectly clear: disabled people are at a considerable disadvantage.

It was inveighed on Second Reading that I have it in for employers and that I think that all employers are bad. Many employers take their responsibilities seriously and try to employ people who have a measure of disability, but many are reluctant to do so, and if given any incentive, encouragement or excuse not to do so will be only too pleased to take it. We must give employers an incentive to employ people with chronic health or disability problems, not a disincentive. That is the force of the amendment.

I have been commenting on the position as it is now, but what will be the position for those highly vulnerable people when the Bill gives employers an added real financial deterrent to employing them? Perhaps the Under-Secretary's reply will be along the lines of what the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People said on the last amendment. She may argue that having to bear 20 per cent. of any sick-pay cost will not make very much difference to employers' recruitment practices.

The Minister for Social Security and Disabled People seemed to be saying that the effects of the Bill would be fairly minimal and would not act as much discouragement, even to small employers. We dispute that. It is true that the effect will be fairly small for many employers. One can quote averages, but for every favourable case quoted by the Minister or the Secretary of State on Second Reading, there are many employers who will clearly suffer significant cost disadvantages, and one must take account of the less favourable cases.

The Secretary of State is always fair when he makes these points, so I admit that I am quoting one extreme —the last 10 per cent. for whom sickness lasts more than eight weeks. Adding 20 per cent. of 28 weeks' statutory sick pay at the highest rate comes to £294, which for a small employer is certainly not a negligible sum. Moreover —this is an important point—if the Government are right about a high proportion of employees being covered by occupational sick pay schemes, the £294 that small employers will have to pay may be added to the much larger sum that he is already committed to paying.

We dispute the figure given by the Government because we believe that they have been exaggerating, but if they are right—I put it ad hominem to them—that about 90 per cent. of people are covered, the effect on the small employer is not only when there is a significant period of sickness costing him up to about £300 per employee but also the cost of occupational sick pay, which the Government say will apply in the vast majority of cases.

The effect on employers recruiting disabled and chronically sick people will be all the greater in the future if further reductions in the re' 'ursement rate are made. All the arguments are prem . on the 80 per cent. rate applying, and of course that will be the rate for a time.

Many of us have listened to the Secretary of State choose his words carefully and say that he has "no plans to do so". I admit that my memories of Whitehall are somewhat distant, although they are soon to be refreshed, but I remember that when Governments do not wish to admit to something they say, "We have no plans to do so." Technically, being somewhat economical with the truth, that is probably correct—there are no immediate plans lying about. Ministers have used such phrases but, a few years later, we have been told, "Circumstances have changed", "Different conditions prevail", "There has been a further review". Perhaps there has even been a new face in the Department—these things do happen. What we were assured would never happen has somehow come about. Under the amendment, if there are further reductions in the reimbursement rate, the disadvantageous effect—the deterrent to the recruitment of chronically sick or disabled people—will be all the greater.

I admit that I am not talking to a packed Chamber. I wish that more people were listening to the argument. Under our amendment, whatever changes are made in the reimbursement rate for the third and subsequent weeks, there will still be 100 per cent. reimbursement for the first two weeks. I hope that I have made the case that this is a serious point. I should be the first to admit that Conservative Members are concerned about the employment prospects of disabled people. I therefore hope that they will accept this as a non-partisan amendment. We believe that the Government are putting the employment prospects of disabled people at risk. They are an important section of the work force. We believe that the Government's measure is unnecessary. I hope that they will reconsider the amendment.

Mr. Kirkwood: I support the comments of the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher). New clause 1, which was tabled in my name and that of my hon. Friends, is another attempt to limit the damage that will be inflicted by the Bill on employers and employees. Estimates have been made of average periods of sickness and so on. The new clause is an attempt to restrict the Bill's provisions to cope with the average periods of sickness in firms and businesses. Any opportunity to limit the damage that will be caused by the Bill is welcome. The new clause is a probing measure to get the Government to justify seeking wide provisions which will damage small and large businesses. I am happy to leave my comments on that basis, and I await with interest the response by the Under-Secretary of State.

Mr. Flynn: It is difficult to concentrate on this fascinating business when we have information about the remarkable appointments being made by the new Prime Minister, who is proving that at least he has a sense of humour. One of his appointments has been the right hon. Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) as Secretary of State for the Environment—one of the most remarkable appointments since Caligula appointed his horse as consul

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I think that we should get on with the business.

Mr. Flynn: Indeed, Miss Boothroyd.

My hon. Friend the member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) referred to a debate on Second Reading which, unfortunately, did not reach a conclusion. The debate concerned the report by IFF Research Ltd. and how many firms had been covered by occupational schemes. We should bear in mind what the report said and find guidance from it. I am sure that hon. Members used their time usefully in the past 48 hours to read that report. Two days ago, the Secretary of State for Social Security said that the Government did not know exactly how many people were covered by sick pay schemes—a nice confession of the ignorance on which the proposition is based. He went on to say that 90 per cent. of firms have such schemes.

The IFF report provides the clearest evidence we have. Paragraph 2.5 states:

"The proportion of private sector establishments offering sick pay schemes cover is as follows".

The report shows that for short-term cover only, it is 42 per cent.; for short and long-term cover, it is a mere 14 per cent.; and for long-term cover, it is less than 1 per cent. The key figure is 14 per cent., which would be comparable.

The Secretary of State for Social Security (Mr. Tony Newton): I cannot see why that is the relevant figure. We are talking about what counts as short-term sick pay. It is clear from the report that the coverage of short-term sickness is much greater than coverage of long-term sickness.

6.15 pm

Mr. Flynn: I said that it is the key figure because it will be important when the Bill comes into effect. The Bill gives the Government greater powers by order to make cuts over a long period until, in effect, the scheme disappears. I could argue at length with the right hon. Gentleman on this point, but I intend to speak briefly. That percentage is a long way from the 90 per cent. figure which Ministers repeatedly trumpet.

Every organisation that represents people with disabilities is genuinely worried that the Bill will harm the job prospects of such people. I should love to hear about any such group that supports the Bill. The opposition from those organisations has not been dulled by Monday's debate. They still vehemently oppose the Bill. I hope that the Under-Secretary will say that the Government have taken this into account.

The only measure that we have of the proportion of people with disabilities in employment is the number of registered disabled. The record of industry and Government Departments is shameful. Half the target of 3 per cent. has been achieved by the Department of Social Security, which is presenting the Bill. I should have thought that that Department would blaze a trail by employing at least that target of 3 per cent.

[Mr. Flynn]

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Social Security (Mrs. Gillian Shephard): The Opposition alleged that if 80 per cent. reimbursement applied for the whole period for which SSP is payable, it would lead to employers not employing or discriminating against people with disabilities or people who suffer from health problems. I should have thought that, on Second Reading, my right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People laid that argument to rest.

The Opposition quote a report compiled by Patricia Prescott-Clarke entitled "Employment and Handicap" and published in June this year. That report states that, for the majority of disabled people,

> "The time taken to get a job was relatively short. It was shortest for those not in work at onset—(64 per cent. got a job within two months of looking compared to 56 per cent. of those having held an onset job.)"

Clearly, it must take some disabled people some time to get a job, but the problem is by no means as widespread as the Opposition have said.

The report to which my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State referred extensively on Second Reading, showed that half the people with disabilities in work took less than five days a year off for sickness or treatment. As my right hon. Friend pointed out then, in general, people with disabilities have work records as good as, if not better than, those of the able-bodied. The figures certainly do not suggest that the SSP liabilities of employers will be any greater in relation to employees with disabilities than they will be for other employees.

Of course, many factors other than SSP are important in the determination of job opportunities for the disabled, and our Department and the Department of Employment have developed policies to promote the employment of such people—not least our own proposals for a brand-new benefit, the disability working allowance, to be introduced in April 1992. Having listened carefully and with interest to Opposition Members' proposed solutions to the problem, I can find little logic in them; certainly, the administrative complexities that an employer would incur in operating different rules for different employees, depending on how long they had been ill, hardly bear thinking about.

Speaking to the earlier group of amendments, the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood) complained about the complexity of the SSP scheme, and I am therefore astonished that he should be prepared to support the introduction of yet more complexity. Let us think what the implementation of new clause 1 would mean in practice. Each month, when an employer paid his tax and national insurance contributions to the Inland Revenue, he would need to establish which payments of SSP attracted 80 per cent. reimbursement and which attracted 100 per cent. He would also have to work out whether he could claim additional compensation. In the worst scenario, he might have to try to apportion a monthly SSP payment for an employee between the part on which he could claim 100 per cent. and the part on which he could claim only 80 per cent.

Attempting to enforce the proposals in either the amendment or the new clause would be an administrative nightmare for employers. Indeed, the Department and the Inland Revenue would encounter just as many difficulties in trying to ensure that the correct deductions in respect of SSP were being made for employers' national insurance contributions, and that the right amounts were being paid to employees. I accept that some employers may be unhappy about the move from 100 per cent. to 80 per cent reimbursement—I understand that—but I suspect that they would be even less happy if they had to operate the Opposition's proposed arrangements.

Although I do not want to accuse the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) of tabling a wrecking amendment, I am bound to say that he seemed to imply that that was his intention, and I can certainly think of no better way of wrecking the operation of SSP—which does involve some complexities—than the system that he has proposed.

Hon. Members have mentioned the problems that small employers may experience, although that was the subject of the first group of amendments. We have costed the proposals in amendment No. 8 and new clause 1: the cost of the amendment would be about £107 million in 1991-92 and those of the new clause about £89 million. Cost is by no means an insignificant factor, but the main point is that the administrative nightmare proposed by Opposition Members—apparently in all seriousness—is not worthy of consideration, and should be rejected.

Mr. Meacher: I find the Minister's explanation unconvincing. I know that the Opposition are expected to say that every time, but I genuinely mean it: I do not think that the Minister has answered our case at all.

Quoting from a survey from which I, too, quoted, the Minister suggested that it took a relatively short time for most disabled people to obtain a job. I am glad to hear it. She also said that the great majority of disabled people took fewer than five days off for treatment, and, in general, had good work records. If that is true, it is very reassuring but, as I have said to the Minister of State and repeated today, it really misses the point. We are not discussing whether disabled people take a long time to find jobs under the current arrangements or whether they take only a few days off in a working year; the point is whether the Bill will act as a strong financial deterrent, dissuading employers from taking on disabled people. The survey from which the Minister quoted is entirely irrelevent in that context.

I said all this on Second Reading, and I hoped that what I said had been taken on board. One likes to think that one's remarks are mulled over in the bowels of Whitehall after Second Readings, but apparently that is not the case. I am very disappointed. Let me repeat, then, that we are considering the effects of the Bill. The Minister has said nothing that diminishes our anxiety and apprehension: we fear that the Bill will have a considerable effect in reducing recruitment of disabled people. The Minister of State may shake his head, but we need some evidence.

I appreciate that we are talking about a system that will operate in the future—that, to that extent, the scheme is hypothetical, and that it is therefore impossible to produce any factual, empirical evidence. The likelihood is, however, that the scheme will act as a considerable disincentive.

Mr. Scott: All these scares were put about when the SSP scheme was introduced, and exactly the same arguments were advanced at the time of the extension to 28 weeks

There is absolutely no evidence that the scheme has had such an effect. Given all the pressures designed to encourage the employment of disabled people that I mentioned on Second Reading, I do not believe that these proposals will make so much as a ripple on the pond.

Mr. Meacher: That is a very complacent forecast. The right hon. Gentleman says—I do not know whether this has been factually verified—that the introduction of the scheme and the extension to 28 weeks had little effect. Even if that is true, in neither instance was there any disincentive for employers. What we are discussing today, for the first time, is a significant disincentive for a number of employers—not all, but a significant number—particularly small employers. Small employers have to keep a close watch on the margins if they are to survive, especially in today's declining market. The right hon. Gentleman underestimates the probable negative impact of the Bill.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard rose——

Mr. Flynn rose——

Mr. Meacher: I will give way to my hon. Friend first, and then to the hon. Lady.

Mr. Flynn: I drew attention to at least one ripple on Second Reading. I do not claim that my evidence was entirely convincing, as it was based on some questions that I had tabled the previous week. The most detailed answer that I received showed a decline in the number of people with disabilities who were employed by the Welsh Office, coinciding with the introduction of SSP in 1983. I am not suggesting that the two events are necessarily connected; it is a case of "post hoc, ergo propter hoc". But the Government are trying to make their case, and I feel that we should at least be given the complete picture. That ripple may well be a flood.

Mr. Meacher: I think that that constitutes significant evidence. My hon. Friend has admitted that the decline in recruitment of disabled and chronically sick people may not be solely—or even mainly—a result of the introduction of SSP, but the Minister should accept that, just as I cannot prove a causal relationship, he cannot prove the opposite.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard rose——

Mr. Meacher: I know that the hon. Lady has been desperately trying to get in, so I will give her a chance.

Mrs. Shephard: Most of the hon. Gentleman's comments have been based on the question whether our proposals introduce a disincentive. Does he not accept that the administrative nonsense that he has proposed would be the greatest possible disincentive?

Mr. Meacher: I was coming to the second part of the Minister's argument. At first, she drew an irrelevant analogy when she referred to previous experience with regard to the time taken to get the job and time off. Her other argument against the amendment is that it would be administratively complex and quite costly. She said that it would cost about £100 million.

We are not recommending the ideal solution. We believe that a cost of £100 million as opposed to allowing the Bill to progress without amendment would still be advantageous in net terms. On the other hand, we would be the first to say that it is not ideal to drop to 80 per cent. and then to try to protect a vulnerable section of the market by way of an administrative complexity at a cost of £100 million. That is not the ideal solution. Ideally, we should stay as we are with 100 per cent. reimbursement.

6.30 pm

The Minister's arguments about administrative complexity and cost are not the point. She forces us to use the amendment as a device. We have been prevented from negating the Bill as a whole, so we have to produce a second best. I readily admit that, but is not that a great deal better leaving the Bill unamended?

Will the Minister look me straight in the eye and say that she believes that there will be no disadvantage to the recruitment of chronically sick people, the disabled, people with poor health records and older workers who are desperately trying to regain a place in the employment market if the 100 per cent. reimbursement of sick pay is reduced to 80 per cent.? I do not see how she can possibly say that. If she can and she honestly believes it, she deserves to defeat the amendment. However, we believe that the amendment should stand.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I agree totally with the points made by my right hon. Friend the Minister of State on Second Reading when assurances were given on that particular point.

Amendment negatived.

Mr. Kirkwood: I beg to move amendment No. 5, in page 1, line 27, leave out 'or lesser'.

The First Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Sir Paul Dean): With this it will be convenient to consider amendment No. 10, in page 1, line 27, at end insert—

'(1ZB) A statutory instrument containing an order under subsection (1ZA) above shall not be made unless a draft of the instrument has been laid before Parliament and approved by a resolution of each House.'.

Mr. Kirkwood: I recognise the unanimity of view on the Opposition Benches about my amendment. Independently, and without collusion, the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) and his colleagues and my colleagues and I decided that it would be sensible to table amendment No. 5.

The amendment is designed to leave out two small words, but their omission would make a great difference to the way in which employers and their representatives consider the Bill. The purpose and thrust of the amendment is crystal clear. It will restrict the power that the Government are taking in clause 1 to vary the rebate. The amendment would make it impossible for the Government to reduce the rebate level beyond 80 per cent.

In contemplating that, a number of important points should be made. The fundamental point was raised on Second Reading. Why do the Government need to take this power at all? By virtue of changing circumstances and the extent and complexity of the social security system, we know that the Department faces the prospect of updating, improving and amending social security law on a yearly basis. In relation to another matter the Secretary of State said the other day that he thought that there was a need for consolidation because of the complexity of the numerical labelling of some of the amendments. I do not know whether he meant that as a threat.

The Government have regular opportunities every year to make amendments to primary legislation relating to social security. There is a suspicion that, if they are looking for the ability to make those changes by order, they are doing that with a purpose in mind. They are trying to make it easier for themselves. I suspect that they will give themselves an enabling power to introduce secondary legislation and then do just that. If they do that, the Bill gives them the power both to increase and to decrease the rebate. The amendment would remove by statutory instrument their ability to reduce the percentage level of the rebate.

[Mr. Kirkwood]

Employers' representatives believe that that power is not in the Bill by accident. They believe that it is designed to be used and that it will be used. They quote precedents like the redundancy rebate schemes which they had to endure in the past. They are deeply suspicious of this part of clause 1. There was some discussion about this on Second Reading. However, the Minister should consider it again and give us specific guarantees, if she will not accept the amendment, that there is no intention now, and no intention in future, to reduce the level of rebate that goes back to employers. I hope that she will go that far, but even if she does, she will know that Ministers, on this day of all days, are transient creatures.

Mr. Newton: It was announced some minutes ago that, for the moment at least, I am not a transient creature.

Mr. Kirkwood: The Secretary of State has put the House out of its collective agony. I am genuinely pleased to hear what the Secretary of State has said, and I look forward to many constructive hours of debate with him and his ministerial team.

There is no linkage between the level of rebate and the level of employers' national insurance contributions. The Government could perfectly properly say that they have tried to balance the effect of the changes in the rebate by making marginal and balancing adjustments to compensate for the extra additional cost for employers. There is no guarantee in any legislation that in future, if the rebate is reduced further—perish the thought—compensation will be paid in a balancing way by an alteration in the employers' rate of national insurance contribution.

We are looking for clear assurances about that. It is not just a matter of the Government taking powers that we do not think they need and which if they are to use them, they will do so to the detriment of employers. There is no balancing provision or power. I have heard no statements from responsible Ministers to the effect that if the rebate is reduced in future there will be a guaranteed equalisation of the effect through a change in the level of the rate of national insurance contributions.

It is blatantly obvious what the amendment seeks to do. It is glaringly obvious to Opposition Members and to the employers' organisations that the Government will have the power to introduce things in an unnecessary way. The Government have not yet made a case in any statements made by the social security team that the fears that have been expressed to me by employers and their organisations are not well founded on that important issue. I hope that the Government will take the opportunity of this amendment to try to allay some of the fears that are being expressed with great passion and vigour by employers and their organisations.

Ms. Short: I support amendment No. 5. Great minds think alike and both main Opposition parties tabled an amendment on the same lines. Amendment No. 10 is le robust, and it will be indefensible if the Government not accept it. They would then have to admit that t whole structure of the Bill is intended to enable them any future Government to erode over time and by steal the statutory sick pay scheme. I hope that th Government will not get the opportunity, but it dangerous to allow on to the statute book powers th could be misused by any Government.

As we said on Second Reading, when there w agreement between the Opposition and the hon. Memb for Beverley (Mr. Cran), who does not seem to attending to the debate at the moment although he is in place, it is impossible to understand why the Governme should have introduced the Bill unless the thinking behi it is, in the long term, to erode the reimbursement employers and to privatise sick pay over time, handing t burden ov to the employers.

I know that the right hon. Member for Chelsea (M Scott) was a little annoyed when I said that I found difficult to accept his word that there are no such plans. course, I accept those words in their tightest and small meaning and I know that he would not deliberate mislead the House. However, as my hon. Friends ha said, the fact that the Government do not have a detailed plans to implement right now does not mean th they do not have that strategic long-term intention.

On Second Reading, the Secretary of State went to a l of trouble to stress that the cost to employers—we kn that employees will lose £100 million—was neutral. laid a lot of stress on that, saying that his first stateme had suggested that the reimbursement under the n formula for employers might amount to only £200 millio but that since then he had firmed up the details of t national insurance proposals, amounting to £250 millio which meant that the package was neutral.

The right hon. Gentleman said that he thought that the complaints from small employers would go away on they understood the details of the national insuran compensation. We now know—I think that the right ho Gentleman accepts this—that the complaints have n gone away and that, as my hon. Friend the Member f Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) said earlier, t National Federation of Self Employed and Sm Businesses has not been reassured by our Second Readi debate and is still angry and deeply hostile to the packa

There is no point in the Government introducing t Bill. As we know, they could have saved £100 million changing the thresholds and the uprating figures relati to the amount of statutory sick pay. The Bill has nothi to do with the saving that the Government were seeking make from sick pay so that they could fund other nee groups, such as poor pensioners and elderly people livi in residential homes. The Government have taken t opportunity to introduce legislation that opens the door the erosion over time of a state-protected natio insurance sickness benefit scheme for people at work.

6.45 pm

I prefer honesty in these matters. There is gra disagreement across the House on social security issu but I know that the DSS Ministers are honourable peop Nevertheless, I am totally perplexed, because the makes no sense whatsoever, unless what I have suggest is the Government's intention. It is unacceptable for the Government to say, "We have no plans, but never say never."

The Government have tried this sort of thing before. They have made it clear that they want to move the burden of sick pay on to employers. They had a big fight with the employers' organisations the first time round and were forced to give in.

Although we have been told that this is wrong, I firmly believe that the indecent haste with which the Bill is being handled is designed to prevent that resurgence of opposition from the employers' organisations. I can think of no other reason. It is extraordinary to have a Second Reading on Monday and Committee stage on the Floor of the House on Wednesday. I am sure that that is deliberately intended to prevent the resistance that previous Bills have engendered from building up again.

I cannot see any other reason, although Ministers have said that the Government have moved with such haste because they are anxious to give the employers' organisations the full details in plenty of time for them to prepare for the implementation of the provisions. I cannot believe that. Although I can understand a certain amount of speed, this indecent haste does not make sense. Having analysed what the Government are doing, it is my belief that the intention to erode sick pay provisions by stealth is the whole explanation for the Bill.

We know that when the Secretary of State says that the effect will be neutral this year, it will not be neutral next year or the year after, unless the right hon. Gentleman can give us the assurance that the £250 million reimbursement to employers will increase steadily as the years go by—[Interruption.] I think that the right hon. Gentleman is seeking to give that assurance.

Mr. Newton: We are talking about figures that are related to a percentage of earnings. We are talking about reductions to 4·6 per cent. and whatever the other figures are—from 5, 7 and 9. The figures are a percentage of earnings, so as earnings rise, the figures will rise.

Ms. Short: Good. That is the logic and we now have another commitment on the record which, I am sure, will be gratefully received.

However, that does not remove from the Bill the power to change the percentage and to reduce it from 80 per cent. over time without the Government even seeking an affirmative resolution in the House. We are seeking two amendments. The first is more robust and is preferable. It seeks to remove that power and to require any Government who wish to change that 80 per cent. reimbursement to come back to the House with new legislation and to argue their case properly. Any such proposal would be so serious that that must be the right course.

If the Government cannot stomach amendment No. 5, we also have a gentler proposal, but that would mean the Government admitting that they are wrong, which is something that Governments rarely do. Indeed, the Government would change Prime Minister rather than do that. Amendment No. 10 could be more easily conceded by the Government because it simply seeks a positive resolution of the House for any change from the 80 per cent. reimbursement. I hope that the Secretary of State will say that he accepts amendment No. 10.

On Second Reading, the right hon. Gentleman said that a Prayer could be tabled against such a resolution and that, if determined, the Opposition could bring the matter to the Floor of the House, but surely he and the Government will admit that the proposal to move to a lower than 80 per cent. reimbursement is serious and significant to our social security policy and to the way in which we provide for the protection of employees who are sick. Surely, therefore, in the framework of the statute, such a change should be debated in the House as a matter of course.

I hope that the Government can reassure us somewhat. I am not trying to accuse them of having such intentions over time simply out of opposition to their proposals. My intellect can see no reason for the Government taking the trouble to prepare and table the Bill unless that is their intention over time. I hope that, at the very least, the Government will concede amendment No. 10, which would mean that they could not bring about such a change by stealth because it would have to be debated in the House.

Mr. Newton: The hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) ranged fairly widely over many of the points that were made on Second Reading and which have been reiterated in some of our debates earlier today. In view of the pressure on time, I hope that hon. Members will understand if I do not again go over all the ground covered in my extensive speech on Monday afternoon. Indeed, many of those points have been made by my right hon. Friend the Minister for Social Security and Disabled People.

My next point may seem unduly provocative, but that is not intended to be the case. I find something slightly odd in the spectacle of the hon. Members for Ladywood and for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) and their colleagues presenting themselves this afternoon and this evening as defenders of the interests of employers, when the Labour Government invented and introduced the selective employment tax as a major tax on all jobs. When they were finally pushed out of that tax, they invented the national insurance surcharge.

If I remember rightly, by the time that we took office and abolished it, the surcharge amounted to about £3 billion. I have not checked the figure, but my recollection is that £3 billion of additional costs were imposed on employers, both small and large. It had absolutely nothing to do with insurance. It was simply an impost designed to finance the Labour Government's spending ambitions. Yet the hon. Lady and the hon. Gentleman make an interesting song and dance about sums of money measured at about 0·05 per cent. of labour costs throughout the economy. It is extraordinary.

It is important that the hon. Lady should understand that the proposals in the Bill have no effect of any nature on the entitlement of any employee.

Ms. Short: The Minister speaks about a Conservative Government who doubled VAT as soon as they took power and increased inflation massively. Every survey of small business shows that VAT tends to be their biggest problem. In a constituency such as mine, there are many small businesses and small employers. They tend to vote Labour and they prosper when the people who live in Ladywood prosper. It is not the case that small businesses belong ideologically with the Government. Their interests lie much more closely with the ordinary people in society, for whom Labour speaks. That is our position.

[Ms. Short]

Mr. Newton: I shall return to a more light-handed mode and simply observe that if the hon. Lady really believes that, she will believe anything.

Mr. Kirkwood indicated assent.

Mr. Newton: I am glad to see that at least on that point I have the support of the Liberal Democrats. I am duly grateful to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire (Mr. Kirkwood).

I hope that those perhaps unwise remarks have not unduly disturbed the scene, Sir Paul. I see you looking at me with a faint air of disapproval. I shall return more directly to what the hon. Lady said. As reference has been made to it, perhaps I should begin by quoting from my remarks on Second Reading on Monday afternoon. I said:

"We have no plans to make further changes, but given the way that matters have been developing and the continuing need to examine priorities across the whole spectrum of social security, it seems sensible to have a provision that is capable of being changed. . . . A large part of the social security system, including nearly all the rates of benefit—quite apart from the whole range of other rules—is in a form that does not lock it into primary legislation, so that changes can be made by secondary legislation. Governments of all complexions have acknowledged that that is a sensible way of dealing with social security matters."—[Official Report, 26 November 1990; Vol. 181, c. 651-52.]

Similar arrangements apply to national insurance contributions. There are powers to vary them by secondary legislation, subject to certain parameters.

The words that I quoted were not scripted. They were in response to a request by the hon. Member for Oldham, West to comment on that point. To be honest, when I read them I thought that they were rather good and perfectly sensible, so I decided to repeat them in my speech this afternoon.

Mr. John Battle (Leeds, West): I am not sure whether I prefer the Minister in his ideological or sympathetic mode. It does not seem to make too much difference. Does he accept that there is a crucial difference between simply altering the rate and altering the structural relationship between employer and employee contributions? To level down the percentage from 80 per cent. to 60 per cent. would change the relationship. It is a question not simply of uprating or downrating, but of changing the structural relationship. Why did the Government decide to move away from the affirmative to the negative procedure?

Mr. Newton: It is not a question of moving away from the affirmative to the negative procedure in this case. I shall come to that in a moment. The hon. Gentleman's first point was that it would be appropriate to use a different procedure for a structural change. That is precisely why we are debating the legislation today. A structural change—if that is the phrase that we want to use—is what the Bill proposes. It would create a move away from 100 per cent. reimbursement—for practical purposes the contribution is now 107 per cent.—to less than 100 per cent., or 80 per cent. It is entirely proper that we should come to the House with primary legislation to effect that change. Indeed, that is the primary legislation that we are debating.

The Bill proposes to make a structural c introduce a percentage figure. It then see reasonable to take powers to enable the perce varied in secondary legislation in exactly the s across a wide range of provisions in the social s national insurance systems.

Mr. Meacher: Before the Minister pu argument further, I suggest that there is a majo between changing the national insurance rate often reasonably changed by marginal percen light of increasing benefit levels, increasing c state of the fund—and reducing the reimburse employer from, say, 80 per cent. to conc without coming back to the Houses of Parlia the affirmative procedure. That is an entire matter, and there is no precedent for it.

Mr. Newton: Again, I do not wish to p discussion unnecessarily because I hope to say marginally helpful to the hon. Lady in a fe
There is not much point in describing changes insurance contributions as marginal, and secondary means, when what seem to be smal employers' national insurance contributions—been adverted to many times during this disc amount to substantial sums.

The standard rate of employers' contributi reduced only from 10·45 per cent. to 10·4 per c 0·05 per cent. One cannot get more marginal t is worth about £100 million out of the £250 mi reduction. Whatever arguments the hon.
adduces, he should not suggest that we can marginal changes by secondary means in security and national insurance systems. Some substantial. However, I shall not dwell furt point.

I cannot advise the House to accept amend tabled by the hon. Member for Rox Berwickshire, and with which the Opposition team has tagged along, if I read the amend correctly.

Ms. Short: We tabled amendments indepe

Mr. Newton: Oh, they tabled the same am the same time. I do not wish to dispute precedent. I am sure that the amendments we exactly the same moment. I certainly do become involved in an argument about which I accept that both parties had the Even-handedly, I tell both parties that I cann amendment that would involve more primar before further change could be made in the changes proposed in the Bill.

The hon. Member for Ladywood reasonab weight on amendment No. 10, suggesting tha at least consider adopting the affirmative rat negative procedure. It would not be appropria in respect of a proposal to increase the perc highly unlikely that an increase would controversial. This is another rash remark, Si suspect that if, in the wake of the legislation, a proposal to increase the percentage, I would by the hon. Member for Oldham, West for giveaway for our rich friends, the employers then be faced with a totally different argume

Mr. Meacher: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman would like to be my speech writer?

Mr. Newton: I am not volunteering to do that; my style is much too calm, measured and low key to have any chance of qualifying for that post.

There is force in the argument for Parliament to take a positive further decision about any significant reductions in the percentage were such a change to be contemplated.

In the light of recent events, I approach today's proceedings with even greater magnanimity than usual. Although I am not ready to advise the House to accept the amendment, I am willing to give an undertaking that I shall bring forward in another place an amendment to provide for the affirmative procedure were a further reduction in the percentage proposed.

7 pm

Mr. Kirkwood: Can the right hon. Gentleman foresee any circumstances in which, were the rebate reduced, there would not be a corresponding compensatory allowance through a reduction in employers' national insurance contributions?

Mr. Newton: I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the exact assurance he seeks, for practical and legal reasons. My statutory duty, which I hope I have faithfully fulfilled this year, is to look at the rates of contribution in relation to the balance in the national insurance fund. My prime responsibility is to be concerned with the balance in the fund and I must bear that in mind when considering employers' contributions. For that reason, I cannot give the hon. Gentleman the direct guarantee he seeks.

In the light of the experience gained from what I proposed this year, and with a reasonable degree of conviction that I shall carry the hon. Gentleman with me, I should certainly expect, were any further changes to be made to the percentage—we have no such plans now—to take into account the balance in the national insurance fund. I note that the hon. Member for Ladywood is smiling. I accept that that undertaking falls short of the straightforward, clear-cut guarantee which the hon. Gentleman sought. I hope that the hon. Gentleman understands why I cannot give that guarantee.

I always seek to be open with the House about such matters and it is not inconceivable that this Government, or any future one, might make a judgment in particular circumstances that it was reasonable to propose a further change in the percentage without compensation, or whatever, through the national insurance system. After all, the previous Labour Government came to believe that it was right to impose billions of pounds of extra costs on employers with a national insurance surcharge. They did not compensate those employers in some other way. Governments necessarily must make judgments about where the burden of taxation and the like should lie at any given time and where money is to be raised to fulfil particular social or spending objectives. The Government cannot and will not be able to escape that.

I intend to introduce an amendment in the other place to provide for the affirmative procedure where any further reduction in the percentage is proposed. In the light of that and of what I said to the hon. Member for Roxburgh and Berwickshire—I accept that it fell short of the undertaking he sought—I hope that the hon. Gentleman and the Opposition will withdraw the amendments.

Mr. Kirkwood: Although I am not satisfied with the Secretary of State's reply, it would be churlish not to acknowledge the concession that the right hon. Gentleman made to the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short). On that basis, I shall withdraw the amendment.

The First Deputy Chairman: Order. Before the hon. Gentleman does that, I believe that the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) wants to speak.

Ms. Short: Half a loaf is better than no bread and, on the basis of the Secretary of State's undertaking, I shall not press amendment No. 10.

Mr. Kirkwood: I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. Tony Banks: I beg to move amendment No. 11, in page 2, line 1, leave out subsection (3).

The First Deputy Chairman: With this it will be convenient to take the following amendments: No. 6, in page 2, line 4, at end insert

'in respect of an employer, employing twenty persons or more.'.

No. 7, in schedule, page 4, leave out lines 4 to 19.

No. 14, in schedule, page 4, line 5, column 3, leave out paragraph (a).

No. 15, in schedule, page 4, line 6, column 3, leave out paragraph (b).

No. 16 in schedule, page 4, line 12, column 3, leave out paragraph (d).

No. 17, in schedule, page 4, line 17, column 3, leave out paragraph (e).

No. 18, in schedule, page 4, leave out lines 20 and 21.

Mr. Banks: Subsection (3) abolishes employers' entitlement to compensation for the national insurance contributions they must pay on statutory sick pay.

Statutory sick pay was originally paid at three rates and for the first eight weeks of sickness only. In the autumn statement of 12 November 1984, the right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson), then Chancellor of the Exchequer, announced that the SSP would, in due course, be extended to 28 weeks. At the same time, he announced that employers would be "relieved of the burden of contributions on payments under the statutory sick pay scheme".—[Official Report, 12 November 1984; Vol. 67, c. 417.]

The implication was that that would compensate employers for the extra burden and cost of 20 more weeks' payment.

The Social Security Act 1985 provided for the reimbursement of the national insurance contributions on SSP, which came into effect in April 1985 and the extension of the duration of the SSP from eight to 28 weeks, which came into effect in April 1986. Employers are not reimbursed the precise amount they pay in national insurance contributions. The additional compensation is actuarially calculated to reflect the aggregate amount of secondary contributions paid on SSP and, since 1987, on statutory maternity pay. At present, the national insurance contribution compensation rate is 7 per cent. of the gross SSP paid. If it was right to give that compensation in 1985, the onus is on the Minister to explain why it is now right to take it away.

[Mr. Banks]

A number of things have been said tonight about the way in which small businesses in particular believe that the Bill is part of a "salami" approach to change. I used onions earlier, now I am using salami. Those businesses believe that the Government are working towards an undisclosed objective in a hidden agenda.

Although we might be accused of being cynical, we have some basis for it—for example, the way in which the Government sold the idea of the sale of council houses. Many objections were raised, but the idea was sold to local authorities on the basis that 100 per cent. of the money received would be used to build new accommodation. However, the percentage to be used thus was gradually reduced to 40 per cent. and, most recently, to 25 per cent. The Government advanced a number of supporting arguments to limit the opposition to the sale of council houses, and, once the opposition was out of the way, they proceeded further with their plans. We believe that that is the philosophy behind the Bill.

Since the national insurance compensation is 7 per cent. of the amount of SSP paid by the employer, abolishing it means that, with the reduction of the reimbursement rate to 80 per cent., the total burden falling on employers will be equivalent to 27 per cent. of SSP. When an employee is sick for 28 weeks and is entitled to the higher rate of SSP, the cost to the employer will be £396·90, made up by £294 for the reduction in the reimbursement rate and £102·90 for the loss of compensation for national insurance contributions. It is calculated on the basis of 28 weeks.

I feel sure that the Minister will address a subject that has been mentioned a number of times—the fact that we are talking about an average of three weeks. The National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses said that it was worried not about the large company suffering the average three weeks sick pay, but the small businesses with one or two employees which could suffer from someone taking the full 28 weeks' sick leave.

One is always in great danger when talking about averages. There is no such thing as the average person, who is always someone else. If the figure is 28 weeks, a small company with only one or two employees will suffer an horrendous impact. Legislation should take that into account rather than fall back on comforting talk about averages.

The objections to that proposal are precisely the same as those to the reduction of the reimbursement rate. The amendment would simply delete the whole subsection.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) made a lot of play of hidden agendas. In relation to that, and the point he made about additional compensation, I should like to reassure him about the Government's intentions.

On Second Reading, my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State clearly stated that the additional compensation arrangements have been of limited success in relation to statutory sick pay. The intention of the arrangements was to compensate employers for national insurance contributions they have to pay on SSP. However, in the interests of simplicity, compensation is available on all SSP, even where the amount of sick pay payable falls below the lower earnings limit for national insurance contributions and does not attract liability for contributions in the first place. Therefore, people are receiving compensation for national insurance payments that they have not ma unsatisfactory, and the position was fully c
Second Reading on Monday.

As my right hon. Friend made clear c despite the relative simplicity of the calculat extensive publicity given to it, almost 25 per additional compensation goes unclaimed.
Department, a great deal of work is done wit often those in small firms, on statutory sick pa are held and there are help lines for employer is being elaborated and extended by the new c unit that is being set up in Newcastle. The makes every possible effort to explain to em the system works and, even then, about 25 pe additional compensation is unclaimed. Given are receiving compensation for something fo have not paid, the scheme is unsatisfactory a should be changed.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-We more general remarks about the plight c business employer, a motif that has recurred the debates. The changes in the rates of natio contributions that employers will pay from A go a considerable way towards compensatin for the measures in the Bill. Obviously, emplo always come out ahead, because the prop clearly depend on individual levels of pay a However, with the proposed reductions insurance contributions, the increased costs f employers will be modest. That point has number of times this afternoon.

On Monday, my right hon. Friend the State described the effect of the changes. He

"Those changes will reduce employers' costs million and ... are likely to be especiall employers, often smaller employers, whose e among the less highly paid."—[Official Report, 1990; Vol. 181, c. 642.]

He gave two illustrative examples, which I sh because the hon. Member for Newham, No present on Monday and will have heard the will also have heard my right hon. Friend clearly that he was giving examples whe would gain, and there would be othe particularly where employees earn more than where some employers would lose. We bel compensatory measures in the reduction insurance contributions that will come into will go a long way to meeting the concerns and of the hon. Member for Newham, Nort

7.15 pm

Amendments Nos. 6 and 7 would give em fewer than 20 employees a continuing right compensation for SSP. As has been repeat have acknowledged that the changes in the B more heavily on the small business employ why we structured the reductions in the natio contributions as we did. By reducing th national insurance contributions for rates £185 by 0·4 per cent., as against a reductio cent. for those earning above that level, we weight the contributions reductions in respec paid. That will mean that the savings to s employers, who are more likely to employ t

paid, will be proportionally greater than for other employers and, in some cases, will fully match the extra costs resulting from the changes proposed in the Bill.

It would be inappropriate for me to go further, as the hon. Member for Newham, North-West wishes and give smaller business employers the continued right to additional compensation. That would cost about £18 million a year and would clearly have implications for what has been a carefully constructed package. That would be an unwelcome complication in a scheme which we have been trying to keep as simple as possible. We would have to obtain and keep up to date details of the numbers of employees in the relevant firms. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State made that point during the debate on the first group of amendments, which have a similar effect. We believe that the amendments could affect the employment patterns of employers with a work force numbering approximately that of the threshold figure. For all those reasons, I urge the Committee to reject the amendment.

Mr. Kirkwood: I am particularly grateful to the Minister for replying to amendments Nos. 6 and 7, which were originally considered to be consequential. The ministerial response provoked one or two thoughts.

I do not think that, in all conscience, the Minister can describe the measure as a carefully considered package, if for no other reason than that the timetable has been so constrained, whereas the Bill's impact will be wide-ranging. Parliamentary consideration of the Bill has taken place with unusual haste. The legislation will create difficulties for organisations seeking to represent small business employers that do not have the benefit of a sophisticated trade union structure or the Confederation of British Industry's resources and expertise. They do their best and do a good job with the professional help that they receive, but they face a mamonth task because they cover so many sectors and different businesses with employees in jobs at various levels. Therefore, given the timetable that the Government have set them to consider the Bill, it is virtually impossible for them to undertake proper consultation and make constructive suggestions on how to alter the measure.

We are all in the hands of the business managers, and the timetable is not necessarily a departmental matter entirely under Ministers' control, but will they give us an absolute assurance in the remaining few days, or indeed hours, left before the Bill goes to the other place and on to the statute book, that, if approaches are made by bona fide organisations representing small businesses, they will be given every conceivable opportunity to meet Ministers and officials, and make the points that are being fed back to them and through Members' postbags? I hope that the ministerial team will consider constructive proposals. That would go some way to reassuring us that there is no nefarious purpose behind the indecent haste with which the Bill is proceeding.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Hon. Members have spoken about the timetable. My right hon. Friend the Minister of State has said that monitoring is engraved on his heart. I assure the Committee that bona fide organisations will be welcome when they come to meet the ministerial team and officials. That is always the case, irrespective of the cause.

Mr. Tony Banks: It would have been more useful if discussions had taken place before the proposals came to us. Perhaps there were such discussions, but if that is the case why are there so many alarming noises from the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses? The legislation is detailed and technical and we can see that it has not grabbed the imagination of the great majority of our colleagues.

The Minister is reasonable and emollient, but, of course, that is normal. Perhaps we should feel assured, but I have a rather nasty sinking feeling in my heart that, although she is certainly not misleading us, the implications are such that when some small businesses feel the full impact they will be even more angry than they are now. By that time it will be too late. The Minister of State said that he had "monitoring" engraved on his heart. I hope that that is for some good purpose because monitoring is important when the Committee is being asked to agree to technical proposals.

We have been assured that the Bill will not have any great implication for small businesses. I suppose that we can all repent at leisure if the Minister is wrong about that. I hope that, if monitoring reveals the difficulties that small businesses have talked about and which we have tried to amplify, there will be changes. In such areas it is perfectly correct for the Government to say that an administrative mistake might have been made.

I was disappointed by the Under-Secretary's reply, even though she put it over in a reasonable way. She said that the compensation scheme had had only limited success and that compensation had been paid on payments that had not been made by employers. She also said that 25 per cent. of additional compensation is unclaimed. That is obviously true, because the Minister said it, but the corollary is that 75 per cent. of it is claimed. Rather than scrapping the scheme because 25 per cent. of compensation is unclaimed, it would be better to get through to those who are eligible to claim and tell them that they are missing something.

The Minister was precise about the percentage of unclaimed additional compensation, but did not tell us in figures how much compensation was paid to employers who had not already made payments. As I understood it, we were being told that they were getting something for nothing. The Minister should quantify that, or we shall be left with generalities that sound all right in debate. We are not responsible for keeping the books of small companies and trying to make ends meet, and they say that they are finding that increasingly difficult.

We are disappointed that the Minister is not prepared to accept the amendment, but we shall not push it to a vote. I beg to ask leave to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Ms. Short: I beg to move amendment No. 12 in page 2, line 18, at end insert—

'(6) in section 22(3) of the Social Security Act 1989, in the definition of "relevant benefits", at the end there shall be inserted the words "but, in the case of statutory sick pay, only such proportion of any payment as is recoverable by virtue of section 9(1)(a) of the Social Security and Housing Benefits Act 1982".'.

The amendment seeks to prevent the DSS from recovering the whole of the statutory sick pay from compensation for personal injury when only 80 per cent. of statutory sick pay will be reimbursed when the Bill becomes law. Section 22 of the Social Security Act 1989 provides for the recovery of benefits paid as a result of personal injury by deduction from any compensation payments. We debated that issue at great length in 1989 when the Social Security Bill was going through. We felt passionately that it was wrong to reclaim compensation that might have been paid, for example, for pain and suffering in order to reimburse the DSS. That is not the issue contained in the amendment and, therefore, the matter is narrower.

[Ms. Short]

The amount recoverable under the 1989 Act is the "gross amount of any relevant benefits paid or likely to be paid to or for the victim during the relevant period". Section 22 leaves the relevant benefits to be defined by regulations, and the Social Security (Recoupment) Regulations 1990 list a wide range of benefits, including some which have little or no connection with personal injury, for example, family credit and unemployment benefit.

The new disability living allowance and disability working allowance may be added to the list in due course. Perhaps the Minister will tell us about that. The list already includes statutory sick pay. Presumably the justification is that although statutory sick pay is paid by employers, they are reimbursed by the DSS. However, in future the reimbursement will be only partial—80 per cent. in 1991-92. It cannot be right for the DSS to recover benefit that it has not paid. That is the point of the amendment, which proposes that only the amount actually reimbursed by the DSS should be recoverable from any compensation payment.

If the long title of the Bill had allowed, we would have tabled an amendment removing statutory sick pay from the list of benefits recoverable under the 1989 Act. The treatment of sick pay for these purposes is chaotic, different parts of sick pay being treated in different ways. However, the long title is tightly drawn and it was not possible to amend it.

We seek to ensure that a minor injustice is put right. It would surely be wrong if the DSS were allowed to claim back 100 per cent. of statutory sick pay when people receive compensation as a result of an accident, even though the DSS had been responsible for only 80 per cent. of that sick pay. I hope that the Minister will concede the point.

Mr. Scott: As the hon. Member for Ladywood said, the amendment seeks to change the amount of statutory sick pay recoverable under the compensation recovery scheme which we discussed at great length during the passage of the Social Security Act 1989. At present, the scheme provides for an amount equivalent to the sum of statutory sick pay paid to be recovered from any compensation payment. As we know, the Bill proposes to reduce Government funding of SSP from 100 to 80 per cent. I listened with great care and attention to the hon. Lady, but I do not think that an amendment on the face of the Bill is the correct vehicle for introducing any change that might be required.

Section 22(3) of the Social Security Act 1989 refers to benefits in broad terms and provides that individual benefits covered by the scheme should be prescribed in regulations. The list of benefits is contained in the Social Security (Recoupment) Regulations 1990. For the sake of consistency, therefore, we wish to pursue that line and see whether an amendment to regulations is required. I am advised that there is no need to take any primary powers additional to those contained in clause 2 of will therefore undertake to consider implications of the changes, paying close att hon. Lady's comments.

I hope that the Committee will accept this our intention to look at the matter with urgency, care and sympathy. In the li undertaking, I hope that the hon. Lady will amendment.

Ms. Short: This is getting better as the n On the basis of that undertaking, I beg to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 1 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clauses 2 and 3 ordered to stand part of t

Schedule agreed to.

Bill to be reported, without amendment.

Order for Third Reading read.—[Queen' behalf of the Crown, signified.]

7.30 pm

Mr. Tony Newton: I beg to move, That th read the Third time.

In the interests of the time of the Hous understanding that if the hon. Member for (Mr. Meacher) says anything to which I s respond I shall have the leave of the Hou confine myself to commending the Bill to th

7.31 pm

Mr. Meacher: That was the shortest spee ing the Third Reading of a Bill that I have he time. I do not know whether it is in anticipati of words from me or because the Secretary find so little to commend in the Bill.

The Opposition are clear about the Bil soothing and emollient atmosphere that de went rather rapidly through the Com problems remain. There is a good argumen small group of activists going through the n Bill because they do so with a precision understanding that is often helpful. Howe reason not to return to my initial judgment mean and nasty little Bill, the sole purpose make one group—the sick and disabled wo those concessions in social security po Government have been forced to make so public opinion.

After freezing child benefit for thre Government were forced this year to m uprating for the first child and, as evicti residents from private residential and n increased, the Government were forced to increases in income support, although nothi to eliminate the shortfall.

It is now clear where the money to enforced concessions is to come fro employers' recovery of statutory sick pay f per cent. will save £80 million in 1991-92, million in 1992-93, although that is of employers by a compensatory reduction national insurance contribution. On top of the package, freezing the higher rate of stat and raising the threshold above which it is £100 million in 1991-92.

In effect, the Bill makes one poor group pay for the increase in benefits to another. Apart from the Treasury, no one gains from it. It is also a Bill that is uniquely without friends. I cannot recall any recent Bill with the same distinction. The CBI, the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses, the TUC, the trade unions and the voluntary sector do not have a good word to say about it.

No doubt it is a coincidence that the remaining stages of the Bill are going through the House on the first day of the new premiership. Whether the new Prime Minister is son of Thatcher—something that is disputed, although the Opposition have a clear view of it—we can say that this package is son of Thatcher. It is mean in its dealings with the low-paid and sick, particularly women. It is a further whittling away of workers' basic sick pay rights, which even employers agree—the National Federation of Self Employed and Small Businesses argues this—should be undertaken by national insurance. I never thought that I should see the day when smaller employers would argue the case for the welfare state and national insurance. The Bill is being forced on employers and employees alike without consultation, as several Tory Members have pointed out.

The Bill has been rushed through to prevent small employers' organisations from mounting the kind of intensive lobbying that stopped the Government in their tracks 10 years ago. I cannot think of a recent example of a Bill that has had Second Reading on a Monday and its remaining stages two days later. No emergency or external conditions require this haste. It is simply to serve the Government's convenience and to block off the opposition that they know exists. Furthermore, by doing this, the Government have reneged on promises and commitments given by the previous Secretary of State in 1981 when the Government clearly accepted that they should stick to 100 per cent. compensation.

The only rationale that the Secretary of State has been able to offer for this wretched little measure is the alleged spread of occupational sick pay schemes. The survey on which this supposed finding is based has been scoured to elicit the statistic that 91 per cent. of the work force is employed by companies with occupational sick pay schemes. Therefore, cuts in statutory sick pay by adjusting both thresholds and levels of benefit could be justified. It is on that that the Bill depends, and it is closely linked to that figure of 91 per cent.

If the right hon. Gentleman does not yet have the message, I point out again that that 91 per cent. figure has been comprehensively discredited in even these brief proceedings, both on Second Reading and today. The survey showed that 44 per cent. of private sector employers did not offer any form of occupational sick pay and, worse than that, more than half of all firms with fewer than 10 employees have no occupational sick pay provision. With those facts, the rationale behind the Bill collapses. We have had no answer to that point, and that is a critical and decisive judgment of the Bill.

The losers under this Bill and this package—I must remember that I should use this wider word, although on Third Reading we keep more closely to the detail of the Bill—are the 3 million employees with earnings of between £125 and £185 a week who will no longer be eligible for the higher rate of statutory sick pay. About one fifth of them —more than 500,000—are expected to claim statutory sick pay every year, and they will lose on average £9 a week, and the majority of them are women.

The disabled will also lose, as will those with chronic ill health, and those who have poor health prospects. The last mentioned is a wide group and includes many older workers, all of whom are having an employment warning pinned on them by the Bill. If the Bill is passed, employers everywhere, but I suspect particularly smaller employers, will have a strong financial incentive to be wary of recruiting anyone who has a health risk. The answers given by the Under-Secretary on this critical point of the Bill were thin and unconvincing. That is an important effect of which we have had no explanation.

Small employers are also losers. We are told that 19 out of 20 businesses employ fewer than 20 people. There are many small employers in Britain now. Many of them will be significantly out of pocket as a result of the Bill when, at a time of accelerating recession, they can ill afford it. The federation made that point clearly. The losers will be those penalised with costs of up to £200 which they can ill afford and which may well entail a significant rise in unemployment. All are losers; there are no winners except the Treasury.

For all those reasons, we strongly repudiate the Bill. It is based on a selective and grossly misleading interpretation of the evidence that is used to justify it. It creates only losers. It is unanimously rejected by all the relevant parties outside the House. It has been introduced without consultation and it is being propelled through the House—I think that all hon. Members will agree—with unseemly haste. I submit that that is to preclude an offensive, similar to that in 1979-80 when the Government were derailed, being mounted against it. The Bill will undoubtedly pin on hundreds of thousands of chronically sick and disabled people the sign "Employment risk—you have been warned" when they are seeking recruitment in the labour market.

Few Bills have less to be said for them than this one. On those extensive and convincing grounds, we shall strongly and unequivocally repudiate the Bill in the Lobby tonight.

7.41 pm

Mr. Kirkwood: I shall concentrate on how the Bill affects employers, particularly small employers, but, in doing so, I do not want in any way to diminish the important points made by the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) about its effect on employees, because they are well worth considering.

The Government do not fully appreciate the Bill's impact on businesses throughout Britain. My small rural constituency has thousands of small businesses, all part of the Border economy in south-east Scotland, and the Bill will have a profound impact on their future ability to prosper. The Government have not considered the Bill's full implications and ramifications. If they had consulted the kind of businesses that we have in my constituency they would have come to a different conclusion. I have no doubt that the Bill will be deeply inimical to business interests.

The Secretary of State was at pains to say that only the Labour party takes billions of pounds out of the pockets of business. To a certain extent I agree, but in the fulness of time the Bill will result in a top-line saving of about £250 million. Not too many years have to pass before £250 million amounts to billions being taken from the pockets of British business, so the right hon. Gentleman is not in such a strong position as he might think.

[Mr. Kirkwood]

The Government's defence for proceeding with such speed cannot be believed. People outside will not believe that the Bill has been brought forward in this way for the convenience of small and big businesses which would have found it difficult to make the necessary administrative changes if the Government had waited until after Christmas. It is a bit like sentencing an accused before the case for the defence has been properly heard.

The federation and, to a lesser extent, the CBI, feel that they have not had a proper hearing. Consultation has been inadequate. The Bill is being hung round their necks without a proper consideration of its implications. They tell me, and I have every sympathy with them, that, had more time been available for discussions with the Secretary of State and others in the Department, they might have been able to prevail upon them to mitigate the damage or even to prevent it.

In recent years, the courts have had great difficulty in interpreting social security legislation that has been rushed through the House and the full weight of the appeal procedure has had to be brought into play to remedy the defects in statutes that have not been properly considered. By any objective test, this Bill has been pushed through too fast for its own good, as well as for the good of those whom it will affect.

It is still, at this late stage, open to the Secretary of State to say that he will not push through the remaining stages in another place. If he were to say that he would hasten more slowly, the consultation process could proceed and even at the eleventh hour that would be beneficial.

The Department's package to help small business men become familiar with the Bill adds to the confusion. The 50 per cent. reduction in the rebate is another complication adding to the burdens on small businesses.

Some years ago the Government made great play of the fact that they were reducing the burdens on businesses. They produced glossy publications to show that they were aware of the problems and were doing something about them. Their rhetoric will ring hollow tonight if the Bill receives its Third Reading.

The compliance costs have been largely underestimated by the Government. As the hon. Member for Oldham, West said, nobody is in favour of the Bill, because there is nothing to be said in its favour. The Bill is unfair, damaging and unnecessary. It is a deliberate and calculated move which will damage British business interests. The Secretary of State will never be able to allay that charge and I hope that it comes back time and again to haunt him. If it does, it will be entirely justified.

7.48 pm

Mr. Battle: When the House debated the introduction of the "next steps" agencies by the Treasury, the Secretary of State for Social Security was keen to distance himself from any idea that the method of providing social security would be privatised in any way. The Bill might not privatise the method, but it is a classic case of the privatisation of the provision of social security.

This measure is another example of enforced privatisation, pushing responsibility for statutory sick pay on to the employer. The Government are away from returning to the House to arg longer necessary because it merely du provision. That argument has been made debated pensions and the shift away from that the Government will be back to redu reimbursement still further.

The very nature of SSP is being chan benefit to a mixture of state and employ hon. Members on both sides of the Cham out, ultimately low-paid workers will pay Bill. The Social Security Advisory Comm that SSP is intended to replace lost earni an income maintenance function for thos through sickness. That should be a basi welfare state, provided by the taxatio insurance system.

It will be interesting to see whether it there will be talk of collective responsi have endured 10 years in which words suc "common provision", "public", "societ have become pejorative terms and been b political vocabulary. It will be interes whether the Government will start to collective responsibility. We say that collective responsibility for providing maintenance system for all workers, re level of pay and the nature of their wor

Far from SSP being an important an income for low-paid workers who, thr their own, are unable to work, un Government those benefits will be wi chipped away at until they provide only of third party, fire and theft coverage—ra of a comprehensive actuarial plan.

The Government claim that cover is the private sector, but I invite the Secr examine who will be affected by exclusion and rates of pay. Guess who is exclu part-time workers and manual grades rec

West Yorkshire traditionally has the l in the whole of the British Isles. They a with those in Northern Ireland. Leeds h and small-sized firms. It does not have o such as coal and steel, nor is its employ one large company. Instead, Leeds owes a myriad of small and medium-sized firm do not pay high wages. We have see employment to unemployment—and, m shift from comparatively secure wo temporary and low-paid work, particula

We are seeing a further shift to m Government call it targeting, but it structural step away from universal bene many of them left. Child benefit has alrea death, and we now have another quiet security budget to save the Treasury mon passed over to employers.

I am not convinced by the Governmen the disabled will not be penalised and th possibly contribute to positive discri disabled and long-term sick people. O people will again be axed from benefit can be given to another. We have seen th with housing benefit.

It is clear that the Bill is being squeezed through the House during an interregnum for the change of Tory leadership. We are told that the Government are changing their policies, but the Bill proves that they are not pulling back from a Thatcherist approach. The Bill demonstrates that Thatcherism remains intact and is on course. It is a further step in the Government's plans for privatisation and for making the poorest pay.

7.54 pm

Mr. Flynn: My hon. Friend referred to the interregnum, black hole or news vacuum in which we find ourselves at this moment. New benefits—and there are some—are being introduced by the Government with a great fanfare of trumpets and trombones, while they make cuts elsewhere.

I will be generous to the Secretary of State because he has been re-employed in his old job. The kindest interpretation that we can place on the right hon. Gentleman's actions is that he does not understand the basis of the report on which the Bill is founded. The Secretary of State laughs. I will not draw any conclusions from that, because I refuse to be sidetracked. Nevertheless, the right hon. Gentleman has tonight admitted his unabashed admiration for some of his own extempore words during the Second Reading debate. He quoted them with some satisfaction. However, he may find some of his other statements less admirable on reflection.

When we hit on the great misconception behind the Bill, and when we question the figure of 91 per cent., relating to the number of employers offering sick pay schemes, the Secretary of State said:

"Under some schemes, some new employees may have to serve a qualification period before becoming eligible for occupational sick pay. A typical qualifying period for short-term sickness cover is three months. However, it is worth remembering that half all private-sector schemes . . . have no exclusion clauses at all."

The original IFF survey qualifies that argument:

"However, those schemes which are more likely to have exclusion clauses are the larger private establishments, (72 per cent.) and public sector organisations (67 per cent.). Thus, almost three quarters (72 per cent.) of employees working in establishments offering short-term cover are potentially affected by eligibility factors. Schemes in the finance business services sector are least likely to have any exclusion clauses."

Occupational schemes do exist, but many are far from adequate.

On Second Reading, the Secretary of State said also: "where there is a qualifying period, it would typically be about three months—perhaps, in some cases, six months".

He gave the impression that three months is the norm, but that in some instances a six-month term might apply. However, the IFF report states:

"The factor which most frequently affects employees' entitlement to short-term sick pay is length of time with the company. The qualifying period is typically between 3-12 months. It is the larger employers . . . who are more likely to have this exemption clause. As a result, about half (50 per cent.) of the work force is potentially affected."

The Secretary of State was wrong, because a typical exclusion is not three months but between three and 12 months.

Arguing that the qualifying period should be compared with state sickness benefit, the Secretary of State said: "where there is a qualifying period, it would typically be about three months—perhaps, in some cases six months—which is substantially less than the qualifying period for state sickness benefit."—[Official Report, 26 November 1990; Vol. 181, c. 633-34.]

That comparison is totally meaningless. State sickness benefit entitlement does not depend on length of service with a particular employer.

From day one of their employment, everyone is qualified, provided that they have enough national insurance contributions credited to them in the past two years and regardless of whether they have been working for that employer or not. A more relevant comparison would be with statutory sick pay, which is payable from day one of the period of employment, with no contribution conditions.

Those misunderstandings by the Secretary of State strike at the root of the Bill and the justification for it. I was recently speaking to a total stranger who happened to read the deliberations of the meetings of the Standing Committee that considered the Social Security Bill last year. He identified me by a label I was wearing—as we often do. He told me that he had read the proceedings on the Social Security Bill and—as a student of history—he thought that it was similar to an account of what had happened in the Reichstag in the 1930s. The Opposition are constantly attacking Bills, in good faith. We undermine the rationale of the Government's case, but we do not get a reply. We merely have the Government's steamroller, bulldozing through legislation, using the muscle of their majority.

Social security legislation has followed two main trends in the past decade. That is the way that people see it. Year after year we have been copying the Americans and repeating the mistakes made by the Reagan regime. The result of all the myths that fed the Reagan mythology is that 3 million homeless people are now on the streets of America—the people whom Bush has described as "America's shame". Visitors to the most prosperous cities in the United States see—side by side with obscene riches—groups of people, many of whom are mentally ill, camping out. We are progressing blindly and stupidly in that direction year after year.

The second trend is a return to the last century. We are being compelled in that direction by the falsely named No Turning Back group. Much of what has been argued in the debate would take us back to the era before 1911, when the social welfare programme started in this country for very good reasons. Perhaps we should return to the justification for our social welfare programme, which has been built up over that long period of time. We are gradually tearing it down and turning back to a cruel and unfair past.

The Bill will re-establish all the uncertainty and anxiety of sickness, made worse by the knowledge that one does not have a secure income. The Bill is mean, malicious and ill-conceived, and it hits most strongly at the people who have been short-changed by life—those who have been cheated by disability or who are daily under-rewarded with low pay. The Bill is a disgrace.

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Will the Secretary of State make it clear that he has signified the Queen's Consent?

8.4 pm

Mr. Newton: I am glad to confirm that I have signified giving the Queen's Consent—[Interruption.] If the hon. Member for Birmingham, Ladywood (Ms. Short) wants an explanation of the Queen's Consent, I invite the Chair to give it because I cannot remember it. I know that it is not lese-majesté, and that I have to do it, and I think that I have satisfied the Table that I have done so.

[Mr. Newton]

I am glad that I am not the speech writer for the hon. Member for Oldham, West (Mr. Meacher) but I am even more glad that I am not the speech writer for the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn). After I had listened to the former, I thought that it would be impossible to incorporate any more exaggeration, hyperbole and general overstatement into a speech, but then I heard the hon. Member for Newport, West, who took the biscuit.

In the interests of brevity I shall not seek to answer all the nonsense trotted out in the past few minutes. I merely observe that it is mildly ironic that—in view of the new-found European enthusiasm sometimes to be found on the Opposition Benches—on a number of occasions Opposition Members urge us to go in the direction of the more generous provisions of this kind in Europe. The remarks of the hon. Member for Newport, West about returning to the 19th century should be considered against the background that Denmark is the only European country that provides a cash benefit for sickness which is solely funded by the state, and that, of the other 11 EC countries, six provide no state subsidy and in most countries, the major payment comes from the employer.

The Low Pay Unit report, which I suspect is the source of much of the stuff that we have heard in the House in the past few days, quotes Luxembourg where employees get 100 per cent. of earnings for a year when they are sick. That is fine. Compare that rhetoric which has been used in the debate. One discovers that that benefit is paid entirely by the employer. The only state involvement is 50 per cent. of the administration costs.

Mr. Allen McKay: I am sure that the right hon. Gentleman does not wish to mislead the House. When he quotes information like that, he should also take into consideration the employees' work contracts and the salaries that they receive to make up for it.

Mr. Newton: I am also taking employers' rights here into consideration, as well as the fact that a large part of the work force is covered not only by the sort of arrangements that we are talking about tonight, but by occupational sick pay schemes.

I am not going to return to that argument. I merely point out that anyone who reads the IFF report and its clear-cut conclusions about the growth in coverage of occupational sick pay schemes, would have grave reservations about some of the remarks made in the debate. I shall not return to that subject because it is largely irrelevant to the Bill, which—as is common consent between the Front Benches—does not affect the rights of any employee. No-one's entitlement to statutory sick pay will be affected by the Bill. All that will be affected is the way in which statutory sick pay is funded, and the balance between funding it by the state and by the employer—it is a change in balance.

That change, which amounts to about £250 million, is accompanied by reductions in employer national insurance contributions of broadly the same amount. Although that is not in the Bill, it is clearly associated with the argument for it. In that context, against the background of those figures, and the fact that no employees' rights are affected by the Bill, I reject many of the arguments put to me in the past few minutes out of hand. I reject the accusations made, and I commend the Third Reading of the Bill to the House.

Question put, That the Bill be now read the Third time:—

The House divided: Ayes 156, Noes 114.

Division No. 14] [8.07 pm

AYES

Adley, Robert
Alison, Rt Hon Michael
Allason, Rupert
Amess, David
Amos, Alan
Arbuthnot, James
Arnold, Jacques (Gravesham)
Arnold, Sir Thomas
Ashby, David
Atkins, Robert
Atkinson, David
Baker, Rt Hon K. (Mole Valley)
Baker, Nicholas (Dorset N)
Beaumont-Dark, Anthony
Bellingham, Henry
Bennett, Nicholas (Pembroke)
Benyon, W.
Bevan, David Gilroy
Blackburn, Dr John G.
Boscawen, Hon Robert
Boswell, Tim
Bowden, Gerald (Dulwich)
Bowis, John
Bright, Graham
Brown, Michael (Brigg & Cl't's)
Bruce, Ian (Dorset South)
Burns, Simon
Butcher, John
Carrington, Matthew
Carttiss, Michael
Chapman, Sydney
Chope, Christopher
Churchill, Mr
Clark, Sir W. (Croydon S)
Coombs, Simon (Swindon)
Cormack, Patrick
Couchman, James
Cran, James
Curry, David
Davis, David (Boothferry)
Day, Stephen
Dunn, Bob
Eggar, Tim
Evennett, David
Favell, Tony
Field, Barry (Isle of Wight)
Fishburn, John Dudley
Forman, Nigel
Forsyth, Michael (Stirling)
Forth, Eric
Freeman, Roger
Fry, Peter
Gale, Roger
Glyn, Dr Sir Alan
Goodson-Wickes, Dr Charles
Grant, Sir Anthony (CambsSW)
Greenway, Harry (Ealing N)
Greenway, John (Ryedale)
Gregory, Conal
Griffiths, Sir Eldon (Bury St E')
Griffiths, Peter (Portsmouth N)
Hamilton, Neil (Tatton)
Hanley, Jeremy
Hargreaves, A. (B'ham H'll Gr')
Hargreaves, Ken (Hyndburn)
Harris, David
Haselhurst, Alan
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Sir Barney
Hayward, Robert
Heathcoat-Amory, David
Hind, Kenneth
Hordern, Sir Peter
Howard, Rt Hon Michael
Howarth, G. (Cannock & B'wd)
Howell, Ralph (North Norfolk)
Hunt, David (Wirral W)
Hunt, Sir John (Ravensbourne)
Hunter, Andrew
Irvine, Michael
Jack, Michael
Janman, Tim
Jones, Gwilym (Cardiff N)
Jones, Robert B (Herts W)
Kellett-Bowman, Dame Elaine
King, Roger (B'ham N'thfield)
Knapman, Roger
Knight, Greg (Derby North)
Knight, Dame Jill (Edgbaston)
Knox, David
Lang, Ian
Lawrence, Ivan
Lennox-Boyd, Hon Mark
Lightbown, David
Lloyd, Peter (Fareham)
Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
Maclean, David
McLoughlin, Patrick
Madel, David
Mans, Keith
Maples, John
Marshall, John (Hendon S)
Marshall, Sir Michael (Arundel)
Martin, David (Portsmouth S)
Mates, Michael
Meyer, Sir Anthony
Miller, Sir Hal
Mills, Iain
Mitchell, Andrew (Gedling)
Mitchell, Sir David
Moate, Roger
Morrison, Sir Charles
Moss, Malcolm
Neale, Gerrard
Neubert, Michael
Newton, Rt Hon Tony
Nicholson, David (Taunton)
Norris, Steve
Page, Richard
Paice, James
Pawsey, James
Peacock, Mrs Elizabeth
Porter, David (Waveney)
Portillo, Michael
Price, Sir David
Raffan, Keith
Raison, Rt Hon Timothy
Rhodes James, Robert
Rifkind, Rt Hon Malcolm
Roberts, Sir Wyn (Conwy)
Sackville, Hon Tom
Shaw, Sir Giles (Pudsey)
Shephard, Mrs G. (Norfolk SW)
Shepherd, Richard (Aldridge)
Smith, Tim (Beaconsfield)

Speller, Tony
Spicer, Sir Jim (Dorset W)
Stevens, Lewis
Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Tebbit, Rt Hon Norman
Temple-Morris, Peter
Thompson, D. (Calder Valley)
Thompson, Patrick (Norwich N)
Thornton, Malcolm
Thurnham, Peter
Tracey, Richard
Twinn, Dr Ian
Waddington, Rt Hon David
Walden, George
Waller, Gary
Ward, John
Wardle, Charles (Bexhill)
Wheeler, Sir John
Widdecombe, Ann
Wood, Timothy
Yeo, Tim
Young, Sir George (Acton)

Tellers for the Ayes:
Mr. Irvine Patnick and
Mr. Timothy Kirkhope.

NOES

Allen, Graham
Alton, David
Anderson, Donald
Ashdown, Rt Hon Paddy
Banks, Tony (Newham NW)
Barnes, Harry (Derbyshire NE)
Barron, Kevin
Beith, A. J.
Bellotti, David
Benton, Joseph
Bermingham, Gerald
Blunkett, David
Boateng, Paul
Boyes, Roland
Bray, Dr Jeremy
Buckley, George J.
Caborn, Richard
Campbell, Menzies (Fife NE)
Campbell, Ron (Blyth Valley)
Campbell-Savours, D. N.
Carlile, Alex (Mont'g)
Clay, Bob
Clelland, David
Clwyd, Mrs Ann
Coleman, Donald
Cook, Robin (Livingston)
Corbett, Robin
Cousins, Jim
Cox, Tom
Cryer, Bob
Cummings, John
Davies, Ron (Caerphilly)
Davis, Terry (B'ham Hodge H'l)
Dixon, Don
Doran, Frank
Dunwoody, Hon Mrs Gwyneth
Eadie, Alexander
Evans, John (St Helens N)
Ewing, Harry (Falkirk E)
Ewing, Mrs Margaret (Moray)
Field, Frank (Birkenhead)
Fields, Terry (L'pool B G'n)
Fisher, Mark
Flannery, Martin
Flynn, Paul
Foot, Rt Hon Michael
Foster, Derek
Galloway, George
Gilbert, Rt Hon Dr John
Golding, Mrs Llin
Gordon, Mildred
Griffiths, Win (Bridgend)
Hardy, Peter
Heal, Mrs Sylvia
Hinchliffe, David
Hogg, N. (C'nauld & Kilsyth)
Home Robertson, John
Howarth, George (Knowsley N)
Howells, Geraint
Hughes, John (Coventry NE)
Hughes, Robert (Aberdeen N)
Hughes, Roy (Newport E)
Jones, Barry (Alyn & Deeside)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S W)
Kilfedder, James
Kirkwood, Archy
Leighton, Ron
Lestor, Joan (Eccles)
Lewis, Terry
Litherland, Robert
Livingstone, Ken
Livsey, Richard
Lloyd, Tony (Stretford)
Lofthouse, Geoffrey
Loyden, Eddie
McAllion, John
McKay, Allen (Barnsley West)
McWilliam, John
Mahon, Mrs Alice
Marek, Dr John
Meacher, Michael
Meale, Alan
Michael, Alun
Michie, Bill (Sheffield Heeley)
Michie, Mrs Ray (Arg'l & Bute)
Morley, Elliot
Mowlam, Marjorie
Mullin, Chris
Murphy, Paul
Nellist, Dave
O'Brien, William
O'Hara, Edward
Pike, Peter L.
Prescott, John
Primarolo, Dawn
Quin, Ms Joyce
Redmond, Martin
Rooker, Jeff
Rooney, Terence
Ruddock, Joan
Sheerman, Barry
Short, Clare
Skinner, Dennis
Smith, J. P. (Vale of Glam)
Steel, Rt Hon Sir David
Taylor, Rt Hon J. D. (S'ford)
Thomas, Dr Dafydd Elis
Thompson, Jack (Wansbeck)
Turner, Dennis
Wallace, James
Wareing, Robert N.
Williams, Alan W. (Carm'then)
Winnick, David
Wise, Mrs Audrey
Young, David (Bolton SE)

Tellers for the Noes:
Mr. Frank Haynes and
Mr. John Battle.

Question accordingly agreed to.
Bill read the Third time, and passed.

Development Board for Rural Wales Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

8.19 pm

The Secretary of State for Wales (Mr. David Hunt): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The purpose of the Bill, as effected by clause 1, is to increase the statutory financial limit for the Development Board for Rural Wales from the present level of £100 million to £175 million. It may assist the House if I explain the background to the limit.

The Development of Rural Wales Act 1976 set a limit of £25 million, which was raised to £40 million in 1980 and further increased to its current level of £100 million by the Industry Act 1981. At the end of the current financial year, expenditure counting against the financial limit will be some £90 million. Present forecasts suggest, therefore, that the limit will be reached during the 1991-92 financial year. It is therefore necessary to raise it now so as not to inhibit the development board's contribution to the redevelopment of that region in Wales for which it is responsible.

The development board's key objective is the expansion and diversification of the economy of mid-Wales. Its area covers the district of Ceredigion in Dyfed, Meirionnydd in Gwynedd and all three districts of Powys, Montgomeryshire, Radnorshire and Brecon. The area covers some 40 per cent. of Wales. About 8 per cent. of the Welsh population reside in it and, according to the mid-year estimates, since 1981 the number has risen from 203,100 to the 1988 level of 213,500.

There is little doubt that a winning pace has been set for the economic and social development of mid-Wales. During 1989-90, more than 260,000 sq ft of factory space was allocated, some 50 per cent. of which was taken by businesses already established in mid-Wales. Those projects are expected to create more than 1,000 jobs in the next three years. During 1989-90, just under 140,000 sq ft of factory space was built, and a further 165,000 sq ft is being built under the 1990-91 programme.

Despite the slowdown in the economy, factory allocations in mid-Wales have shown an increase on the first six months of last year. About 57 units, representing 182,074 sq ft of factory space, have been allocated from April to September this year, which compares more than favourably with 49 units totalling 154,624 sq ft in 1989. Those allocations are expected to create 680 jobs in the next three years.

The chairman of the development board, Mr. Glyn Davies, said at the presentation of the half-yearly report in October:

> "There is still encouraging growth in the region, with many companies forging ahead with expansion plans, supported by the Development Board's attractive grants and loans."

I understand that inquiries for factories are significantly higher than last year.

The development board holds some 473 factories—1·9 million sq ft—and has sold a further 96—1·3 million sq ft. They provide more than 8,500 jobs, in the main for the indigenous population of mid-Wales. About 40 per cent. of the development board's stock has already been sold to the private sector and by 1993-94 it is expected that 47 per cent. of the floor space will have been sold.

The board's activity is focused on encouraging and strengthening the private sector within its area. Its economic strategy is contingent on a thriving private sector, creating jobs and prosperity. With that in mind, I have taken a particular interest in the launch of the board's recent policy document, "Strategy for the 90s," which contains details of its investment plans for the next three years and its increased commitment to the more remote western half of its area. We can have no doubt about the success of its policy on the eastern side, an area which enjoys a fair degree of prosperity and low unemployment. The Government's approach is to consolidate recent success by helping to build better businesses and to help ensure a better life style for all in the board's area. The result will be a significantly stronger and more diversified economy.

[Mr. David Hunt]

It is appropriate to mention how important it is for there to be continued close co-operation between the board, the Welsh Development Agency, the Welsh tourist board and, of course, local authorities and all public bodies. The development board is particularly keen to build on its achievement and I applaud that approach.

Hon. Members will be aware that there are two major economic challenges in rural areas: first, rural decline and the exodus of population from rural to urban areas; and, secondly, the difficulty of sustaining communities in the most vulnerable areas. Unless rural Wales can achieve a viable economic base, outward migration of young people will continue. I believe that we are making good progress on that front.

In 1972, on the night of the creation, the development board area had a population of 185,000. The 1988 mid-year estimates show that the population in the area is now 213,000, which is an increase of 15·2 per cent. That increase coincides with the development of the board's policies since its creation in 1977. However, the Minister of State and I are well aware of the continuing difficulties with the loss of young people from the area, continuing depopulation of the most remote rural areas and the challenge of a worsening age structure, with high dependency ratios and a relatively high proportion of people of pensionable age. Without continued net inward migration, the population of mid-Wales would not be able to replace itself.

Our policies help to create an environment in which young people can find new jobs in manufacturing industry, tourism and the service industries, providing a much greater diversity of employment opportunities. Such achievements help the creation of a much-improved quality of life for local people as well as attracting inward investment. All that helps to create a new confidence in the region.

There is little doubt that entrepreneurship has been cultivated and is beginning to flourish in rural Wales.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): The Secretary of State seems to have moved from the challenges facing the Government in rural mid-Wales without referring to the difficulties being experienced in agriculture, which have become more pronounced since the development board considered its strategy for the 1990s. What new account will be taken of those agriculture difficulties, and will the Secretary of State refer to them in his speech?

Mr. Hunt: I certainly will. I assure the hon. Gentleman that agriculture as an industry is vital for the whole of Wales. However, that is not part of the work of the Development Board for Rural Wales; it is very much concern of the Welsh Office and its Agricult Department. It is part of an overall picture. There must a continuing welding together of policies in this import area if we are to ensure the continued revival of the r areas of Wales. I agree with the hon. Gentleman in t respect.

There is little doubt that entrepreneurship has b cultivated and is beginning to flourish in rural Wales. I pleased that last year nearly 700 people took part in development board's "Getting into Business" cou operated through the network of seven local busi centres. Some 5,300 inquiries were handled, 2,000 of wh were from new clients. It is estimated that about 400 businesses were formed in 1989-90.

It was just over a year ago that the development bo launched its western initiative with the determinatio ensure that the prosperity, employment and busi confidence seen so clearly on its eastern side should spread to the more rural areas on its western side.

Mr. Christopher Gill (Ludlow): My right hon. Fri mentioned the board's success in improving circumsta in the eastern part of Wales. Does he concede that som the problems which he described as coming within responsibility exist in parts of England adjoining Wa The effect of the assistance that he can give to enterpr in Wales can impinge, sometimes seriously, on enterpr in England which do not have access to the same fu Perhaps my right hon. Friend can give some comfor that point.

Mr. Hunt: I wish that I could give my hon. Fri comfort, but this is a matter not for me but for my r hon. Friends in England. Tonight we are addressing problems of rural Wales, not those of Ludlow and o adjoining parts of England. My hon. Friend's point matter for another occasion, but I recognise that he had an opportunity to draw attention to the import always of looking at the overall impact of policies suc those that we are purusing in Wales and their impac adjoining areas of England. I sympathise with my Friend, but I hope that he will understand if I ca answer his point.

The development board therefore diverted som million of its existing resources to its areas on the wes edge of Brecknock, Radnorshire and Montgomeryshir well as the whole of Meirionnydd and Ceredigion. initiative has many strands including the allocatio more staff by the development board, the creation of r business premises, enhanced promotional marketing o areas, and the intensification of the business start-up business growth programmes, including the opening satellite office in Machynlleth staffed by Welsh spea and offering business advice.

I am encouraged by the progress which has alr been made and we need now to consolidate and buil this impressive start. The development board has prep a special rural action programme which will enable work of the western initiative to be carried forward increased factory construction and economic and support measures. I have been convinced by the quali the case put forward by the chairman and members o development board and have, therefore, in addition £400,000 increase in baseline provision, agreed tha extra £1 million will be available in 1991-92 for the sp rural action programme. The budget contribution from the Welsh Office to the board will now rise from £12·7 million to £14·1 million—an 11 per cent. increase in its budget.

Dr. Dafydd Elis Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for making that announcement at the start of the debate. Will he confirm that this is new and additional funding to the board and that it is not a recycling of promises made earlier?

Mr. Hunt: I always have difficulty when I am asked about recycling of promises made earlier because I have been Secretary of State for Wales for only six months. So far as I am concerned, this is extra money for these plans next year over this year and I hope that it will give an extra boost to the special rural action programme.

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): Will the right hon. Gentleman give us a breakdown some time tonight as to where the money will go and how much of it is new money?

Mr. Hunt: As I explained, there will be an increase in the total resources for the Development Board for Rural Wales from £12·7 million to £14·1 million—an 11 per cent. increase. I believe that that will be more than enough to cope with the board's objectives. I have identified one aspect—the special rural action programme—but I should be happy to give the hon. Gentleman any further facts and statistics later.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): The Minister made it clear that he was not responsible for the actions of his predecessor. Will he reflect on the unfortunate acronym for the rural action programme, where he is inviting people to take the RAP? Will he give us some guarantee that these action programmes are in line with modern thinking and that they will be environmentally friendly? It is important that any new agriculture programmes are benign towards the environment.

Mr. Hunt: I have two points to make in answer to the hon. Gentleman. First, I take full responsibility for the actions of my predecessors—although not those going back beyond 1979—and I am not seeking to avoid responsibility. I was merely being a little cautious in response to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas), which I think was justified in the light of experience. I was extra-cautious so that I did not miss some comment that might have been made before I became Secretary of State for Wales.

Secondly, on RAP, of course I shall bring the hon. Gentleman's remarks to the attention of those who administer the programme. It is important that we relate such programmes to modern-day circumstances and requirements.

I confirm that I shall take a close and great interest in the development board's package of measures designed to help the western part of the region. I am certainly confident that, in using this "fine brush" technique, the development board will be able to achieve greater success.

The board's primary objective is the creation of a self-sustaining economy and this is being achieved by providing an ever-widening manufacturing base to create high-quality jobs which can complement the quality of life in terms of culture, language and the scenic beauty of mid-Wales.

I should like to return to the comments by the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) about agriculture. Yesterday, I was with several hon. Members who attended the Royal Agricultural Society's winter fair. I had the opportunity to say some words about agriculture. I reaffirm how vital is the provision of a healthy agricultural economy in Wales. It underpins the economic, social and environmental structure of Wales.

I think that you would be quick to point out, Madam Deputy Speaker, that we are dealing with the Development Board for Rural Wales, not with agricultural policy; but, in so far as you allow hon. Members to raise points relating to agriculture, I shall—with the leave of the House—try to respond to them at the end of the debate.

I urge the House to support the Bill, so that the development board can continue its fine work and achieve the objectives that the Government have set it.

8.39 pm

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): I welcome the extra £1 million. It can, I think, be defined as new money; we shall hear confirmation of its newness later if the Secretary of State catches your eye, Madam Deputy Speaker, and perhaps also learn for what purposes it will be earmarked.

I agree with the right hon. Gentleman's identification of the major problems—not least rural decline, the exodus and the difficulty of sustaining communities. The former chairman, Mr. Leslie Morgan, did some very good work, and I think that rural Wales will also miss the work of Dr. Iain Skewis, whom I knew for many years. I understand that the new chairman is making himself very accessible, and trying to be helpful to Members. Much good work has been done and is still being done, and we shall continue to support and encourage the board in the same way as the right hon. Gentleman.

I remind the House that it was a Labour Government who enacted the legislation to set up the board——

Mr. Donald Coleman (Neath): Will my hon. Friend also remind the Secretary of State that, had it not been for the work of his predecessors before 1979, he would not be at the Dispatch Box this evening, announcing the granting of this welcome new money?

Mr. Jones: My hon. Friend has a long memory; he is also a skilled parliamentarian. He knows that, when the Bill to set up the Development Board for Rural Wales was in Committee, the attitude of the then Opposition—the right hon. Gentleman's party—was less than encouraging, and the stance and style of the then hon. Member for Pembroke—now Lord Crickhowell—less than welcoming. Perhaps it was the effect of the hot summer; he was occasionally choleric.

From my perusal of Hansard, I note that members of the Committee included the hon. Members for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) and for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas). Time has passed: some of the others have retired, some have died and some have been ennobled. It was my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. Morris), however, who conceived the measure and pushed it through. Perhaps his inspiration was the great Mr. Jim Griffiths.

Dr. Dafydd Elis Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): I recollect that the board was conceived in Llandyssul by Viscount Tonypandy, at a particularly difficult time—the time of the 1970 general election.

Mr. Jones: The identification of my former right hon. Friend Viscount Tonypandy with the conception of legislation is indeed apposite. I remember the welcome that the hon. Gentleman gave the measure: he used the word "unique".

The Bill concerns such towns as Blaenau Ffestiniog, Newtown, Welshpool, Llandidrod Wells, Builth Wells, Brecon, Rhyader, Aberystwyth, Penrhyndeudraeth, Llanfyllin, Hay, Crickhowell and Ystradgynlais. These are small, isolated and beautiful towns, and their citizens, whose quality and standard of living we are now to debate, are some of the finest citizens in the British Isles. All is not well; the position is not exactly as the Secretary of State described it. Given the present rate of increase—on which I agree with the right hon. Gentleman—the £100 million limit will probably be reached in 1991-92. More money is therefore needed if the current plans for the funding of the board next year are to proceed: that is why we are here, and why we want to give a fair wind to the Bill.

An increase in the financial limit, however, will not of itself provide any guide to the future level of expenditure or Government funding. I hope that the Secretary of State does speak later, so that we may hear about the various headings under which he intends the new money to be spent.

Page 23 of the annual report draws attention to continued high interest rates, and to the uncertainty of national economic indicators. Page 24 emphasises that the availability of more land that can be developed to meet future needs is an urgent priority; from my reading of the report, I judge that there is a problem there. It also refers to an acute housing shortage in the area of the board's jurisdiction. Another sobering passage refers to the effects of a tightening economy and to business failures. I feel that I should stress that, given that the Secretary of State chose to present the position in the best possible light—as he is, of course, entitled to do. I hope that the Government can assist the board by meeting these difficult challenges.

Rural Wales needs to hold on to its young people. It needs more, and lasting, job opportunities; it needs stronger and more diverse businesses; it needs a better transport infrastructure; and it demonstrably needs more help from the Government. It needs much more support and much more leadership. I hope that the Bill will mean positive change.

The new money relates to the board's priorities, which should be emphasised again and again. We need to target manufacturing industry—the board refers to "focus development". It also mentions the creation, or maintenance of 1,500 jobs a year. I welcome the news of the new Machynlleth office and the co-operation that has taken place with other bodies; I also welcome the special action in the west. Those are laudable objectives and I think that the Bill will help to achieve them.

I hope that ministerial financial backing will improve communications in Wales. I see Powys as the bridge between north and south Wales; without a shadow of a doubt, there is a pressing need for improved road links between north and south. The journey time is appalling, as the Secretary of State has found out, and he may agr the quality of the roads between the two communities is also unacceptable.

I think that the north-south link militates bringing the two Wales together. Better road links mean better social, cultural and economic links. A link would help to unify Wales and we want mor there. The country faces many challenges, not leas of 1992, the channel tunnel, the bewildering cha eastern Europe and the many changes presaged Common Market.

We need to end the near permanent division of caused by poor communications. A better road wou to more unity. As the end of the century draws ne after the receipt of £87 billion worth of North revenue, we still have not improved the communi between north and south Wales. That is not good e The Secretary of State should devise a strategy as possible.

I also hope that the Bill will help the many lo workers in rural Wales. Rural Wales has a lo problem every bit as bad as that in the industrialise and north of Wales. Powys is the heart of rural Wa I am sorry to tell the House that it has the proportion of very low paid manual workers in Wal House will not like the statistics that I have obtaine the Library's research division. They show that the gross normal weekly earnings of workers in Pow £220, compared with a Welsh average of £258 national average of £295. The Library statistics sh the average for Powys was the lowest among the counties.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radnor): Is it that over the past five years the Welsh Office stati have been unable to publish the figures and t Gentleman had to go to the Library to get them to the low wages in Powys?

Mr. Jones: I warmly agree with the hon. Gentle far as these matters are concerned, the extreme mo the Welsh Office is curiouser and curiouser. In Apr 36 per cent. of male employees in Powys earned und a week compared to 26 per cent. in Wales and 19 p in Great Britain as a whole. The situation is eve than that. Only 12 per cent. of male employees in earned more than £320 compared to 22 per cent. fo as a whole and 31 per cent. in Great Britain. The Powys was the lowest among the Welsh counties.

Among full-time male employees reporting weekly hours, the average hourly earnings in Pow £5·18 in comparison to the Welsh average of £5·95 national average of £6·89. Again, the figure for Po the lowest among the Welsh counties.

The Government have had almost 12 years of o those incredible statistics have had to be dragge them. That is a disgrace. I hope that the Gov Front-Bench spokesman will respond to that an what policies the Government will follow.

Mr. Gill: Would the hon. Gentleman care to h the other significant figure which he obviously obtained from the Library, which is that the co charge in Powys will be about £170, compared w in the adjoining county which it is my priv represent?

Mr. Jones: That was an asinine and unwelcome intervention. The poll tax is hated in Wales. It has been rejected. Many people in mid-Wales have been hit greatly by the imposition of the poll tax. The Welsh people realise that a Conservative Government have imposed that unjust tax on our people.

Mr. Gill: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Jones: No, sit down.

The rural economy faces immense challenges in the short term as a result of the Government's economic mismanagement and in the longer term from the uncertain future facing farming. The upland farmer needs urgent help. He faces a genuine and deepening crisis. Does anything in this legislation offer help to the upland farmer? He struggles alone with his family in an inhospitable climate at considerable altitude for little profit, but with much physical hard work. Those farmers can only raise sheep. There is no alternative.

The National Farmers Union and the Farmers Union of Wales have told me about the plight of their members. I have met them and they were convincing. If that farming community does not receive help, it will be bankrupt. If the family farm folds, so will the village garage, the village shop, the village school, the village surgery and the village carrier. Communities in that part of Wales which are centuries old are now at risk. This is an unhappy time and for once perhaps the poetry of R. S. Thomas may be appropriate. Certainly "bitter is the taste".

Will this legislation spark an imaginative and practical response from the Government? So far the Government have been lethargic and evasive on those issues. This debate is about a way of life, a culture, a language and a landscape which are at risk and under severe pressure. As the common agricultural policy is dismantled, Welsh Office Ministers should produce a regime to sustain the upland population.

Why has the Secretary of State not been to Brussels to fight his corner for those communities? When my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for Aberavon was Secretary of State, he went, did his best and was successful. I remember my journey to Brussels with the then Minister of Agriculture, the late Mr. John Silkin. We were also successful and we kept the milk marketing board in being.

How sorry I am to see the predicament facing the Secretary of State. He backed the wrong horse in the leadership stakes. Clearly he has been under the spell of his still substantial colleague, the right hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Walker), the former Secretary of State. Perhaps his colleague threw some dust in his eyes or gave him one of the many press releases that he produced when he was Secretary of State. I am sorry to note the right hon. Gentleman's predicament. I remind him that yesterday he said:

"The best person has won and we are all united behind John Major".

I should like the right hon. Gentleman to set the record straight because the Western Mail states:

"Mr. Poll Tax Hunt backs Heseltine".

That was one day, but the next day the right hon. Gentleman said that the best person had won. Well, has the best person won? The Secretary of State and his team did not vote for the best man——

Madam Deputy Speaker (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. We can all have a little fun with these matters, but the hon. Gentleman is straying a long way from the Bill. I am very tolerant, but I am sure that he will come back to his text.

Mr. Barry Jones: A charmingly made point, Madam Deputy Speaker. I shall obey your silken stricture and conclude simply by saying, "O ye of little faith," in the knowledge that other right hon. and hon. Members wish to speak.

My criticism is not of the board. It is doing its job effectively and with dedication. My criticism is of the ministerial team. Clearly, there is a lack of direction and, because of the Ministers, rural Wales is missing out at a time of crisis. Farming is facing major challenges. The employment scene is fragile. The schools service, the health service and the transport service are all buckling under the intense pressure. The poll tax is proving oppressive to our people. It is blighting their lives. The Bill is a stark reminder that Ministers must face up their responsibilities. I insist that they devise a strategy that will lead to success in rural Wales. I want them to give a lead, but so far they have failed.

9 pm

Mr. Keith Raffan (Delyn): The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) should know all about backing the wrong horse. He was the parliamentary private secretary to the right hon. Member for Leeds, East (Mr. Healey), who—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. What is good for the goose is good for the gander.

Mr. Raffan: Exactly. I could not agree with you more, Madam Deputy Speaker and I am delighted to hear that. That was my one sentence on the subject. I could not resist the temptation of knifing the hon. Gentleman good and proper.

I shall speak only briefly, because my constituency is not covered by the Development Board for Rural Wales. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas) for the dispensation so generously given. My excuse for making this brief speech is that, together with other hon. Members present in the Chamber, as a member of the Select Committee on Welsh Affairs I have, on several occasions, taken oral evidence from the DBRW. I join the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside in paying tribute to its previous chairman, Mr. Leslie Morgan, and to Dr. Iain Skewis, who is a fellow Scotsman. We are everywhere in Wales. I am glad that the hon. Gentleman agrees that Scotsmen do such good work in the Principality. I pay tribute also to Mr. Glyn Davies, the new chairman of the DBRW.

I shall refer later to the Select Committee hearings of 9 May 1988 at Powys castle, which the hon. Members for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) and for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy will remember. That was the first time that I met Mr. Glyn Davies, who was then the chairman of the finance committee on Montgomeryshire district council. He is an impressive character, who has been extremely energetic in his post as chairman of the development board.

I want to outline the problem of how we define "rural Wales", a problem which arose again and again in the Select Committee. The DBRW has a synonym—it is the acronym MWD—because the Development Board for Rural Wales is also known as Mid Wales Development.

[Mr. Raffan]

Indeed, the previous chairman consistently referred to that body as Mid Wales Development, but the Bill is entitled the "Development Board for Rural Wales Bill".

In those Select Committee hearings at Powys castle on 9 May 1988, Mr. Leslie Morgan, the then chairman, made it clear that he preferred being described as the chairman of Mid Wales Development. He did not regard that organisation as purely a rural body because he would then be faced with an odious comparison as the country cousin of the Welsh Development Agency. Mr. Morgan wanted his organisation to be seen as a regional development agency. I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will address the real problem of defining rural Wales because there is confusion. The DBRW's boundaries are not and cannot be as clear as those of the Highlands and Islands Development Board in Scotland. Some of the worst unemployment spots in rural Wales lie outside the boundaries of the board. That means that rural areas outside the DBRW boundary do not have equal treatment when compared with the rural areas within it.

There are two ways of dealing with that problem. One way is to review the boundaries of the board. In hearings of the Select Committee the previous chairman said that he was keen that there should be a detailed review of its boundaries. I ask my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State seriously to consider that. The chairman was keen to see the boundaries reviewed, provided that his resources would be increased as the boundaries were extended. He was not keen to see his boundaries extended if his resources remained the same.

I have read a document, which I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has seen, produced by the Institute of Welsh Affairs. The institute does some valuable studies not only for Members of Parliament but for everybody in the Principality. It has produced an interesting study entitled "Rural Wales". It tackled the definition of the rural parts of the Principality. I shall not go into that in too much detail, but basically, although it is a statement of the obvious, the document classed rural Wales as "excluding industrial or urban South Wales and North-East Wales, whilst using district council boundaries to delineate rural Wales."

The institute preferred to use district council boundaries because that allowed the use of official statistics, which clearly are important. It defined rural Wales as:

"Colwyn, Glyndwr and Rhuddlan in Clywd"—

I was somewhat surprised at the inclusion of Rhuddlan, but I go along with it because the institute has studied the matter much more than I have—

"Dyfed except Llanelli plus Gwynedd and Powys."

If we are to stick to a definition of the DBRW as representing rural Wales, we must consider a review of the boundaries. If not, the way in which the Welsh Development Agency deals with rural Wales must be reviewed. That is important because, as the then chairman of the board, Leslie Morgan, said in a hearing two years ago implying a criticism of the performance of the Welsh Development Agency:

"It requires an act of will and decision from the WDA to determine that it will do more in its rural areas."

I represent a constituency which is predominantly urban, although it appears rural. A good two thirds of my electorate reside in towns. However, we have many of the problems that confront rural areas more severely. As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will kn experienced one particular problem recently. to him for his quick help and speedy action proposal to close the Laura Ashley factory [Interruption.] I should be grateful if the hon. Alyn and Deeside, having opened the debate, to the speeches. It would be polite if, instead the hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek listen to what I have to say. I am making a point. It is not a party point. I am not ma political broadcast, as he did. I am seeking to the debate on rural Wales. I believe that it is is good at plagiarising. Who knows?—he m ideas in his next manifesto.

Now that I have the attention of the hon. Alyn and Deeside, I refer him to the Laura A at Leeswood. I am particularly grateful that attention because, of the 330 who were made the factory, more than half are resident in his as he will be aware. That is why I was rather s he was chatting and not paying attention. I thought that he would be worried about e constituency being made unemployed.

I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the State for what he did in the event of the closu speedily. He got in touch with the Welsh Agency chairman, Dr. Gwyn Jones, whom I met to see what could be done to help the ar only about a third of the employees were re constituency, one relatively small communit —a former mining village—had 62 reside there. When 62 people in a relatively small co their jobs it hits the community hard.

My worries about the overlap and l definition of the roles of the Development Bo Wales and the Welsh Development Agency in examples such as that of the Laura As Expertise in dealing with rural affairs lies p with the Development Board for Rural particularly good at and has a long experienc of establishing starter units in rural areas t unemployment, which can hit small commu am not certain that the same kind of expertis the WDA. I am not seeking to criticise the does a good job in many ways, but hon. Me myself, whose constituencies are not co development board, are concerned.

We believe that the constituencies of the h for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey), for C Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells), for Meiri Conwy (Dr. Thomas) and the hon. and lea for Montgomery (Mr. Carlile)—I am sorry and learned Member is not present, but I ar has good reason to be absent on this impor for his constituency—which are covered by have two bites of the cherry in terms development in their areas and the steps tha to tackle rural unemployment and depopula us whose constituencies contain rural areas, not covered by the board, do not have the c enjoy such two-tier treatment.

Dr. Thomas: I am following the speech Gentleman with great interest, especially his interface between the two agencies and the WDA has a rural arm. What is the hon.

thinking in terms of medium and long-term development? Does he envisage that the DBRW will take in the whole of rural Wales, as normally defined by the Welsh Office, or does he believe that the rural arm of the WDA will take over from the DBRW?

Mr. Raffan: The hon. Gentleman sat next to me in the Select Committee and he will recall that I was somewhat anti the DBRW because of the two-tier treatment meted out to the rural areas that it covered which meant that they had an advantage in comparison with the rural areas outside its boundaries. Often, these are the rural areas with the highest unemployment. They do not have the advantage of the two-tier treatment. I was leaning towards the view that the DBRW conferred an unfair advantage, but the hon. Gentleman knows that I am never dogmatic and I am open to persuasion and good argument—usually such good argument comes from the Benches behind the Opposition Front Bench.

I hope that my right hon. Friend will be in office for a long time, as it is important that he should tackle the issue of the boundaries of the DBRW and what the WDA does to help rural areas.

The Laura Ashley closure at Leeswood revealed that there was no clear strategy on the part of the WDA to deal with the problem, but the closure had a great impact on that small rural community. There were two options available to deal with it. The first was to open starter units close to the village community and the second to develop one or two larger units of between 10,000 and 15,000 sq ft at the Nercwys road industrial park estate near Mold, some miles away.

Laura Ashley was a great boon to one rural area of my constituency, but perhaps its location was not the most advantageous for that company. Nevertheless, it was an important source of employment to the rural community. I accept, however, that there is no point having starter units close to the village if they are not filled. The strategy of the WDA appears to favour larger units in industrial estates or business parks closer to the towns rather than developing starter units closer to villages. Certainly the DBRW has greater experience of developing such nursery units near villages.

This debate should be about getting to grips with such problems. I am proud of the fact that I am occasionally labelled a corporatist, I am not a socialist or a crypto-socialist, but certainly I am a corporatist. I would not dream of applying to my right hon. Friend a label of which he was not proud, but the way in which the Government have pursued their policies in Wales is something from which the rest of the country can learn a great deal. That is especially apparent in my constituency where, in the past two years, unemployment has dropped dramatically by 56 per cent. That is a measure of the success of our policies.

I pay tribute to the work done by the DBRW. I do not think that, simply because of the success of its work, it should take over every rural area of Wales, but its boundaries should be reviewed in detail. The definitions used by the Institute of Welsh Affairs are a good starting point and worthy of further examination by my right hon. Friend. I also look to my right hon. Friend for a reassurance that the rural arm of the WDA and its efforts in rural districts are not overlooked, but developed. That sector of the WDA's work should not be allowed to grow stale or stagnate. It is important for those of us in parts of Wales not covered by the DBRW that the rural arm of t WDA is active, vigorous and innovative. I hope that m right hon. Friend will pay heed to what I have said.

I also hope that we can develop this debate on a futu occasion. We have few Welsh debates on the Floor of t House but perhaps we can develop this discussion in t Welsh affairs debate on 1 March next year. There a important issues for the Principality, for my constituen who are not covered by the DBRW as much as f constituents of Opposition Members who are.

9.16 pm

Mr. Roy Hughes (Newport, East): I welcome the Bi and the marginal additional spending power that provides for the Development Board for Rural Wal which, over the years, has done some good work. As th Secretary of State said in his opening remarks, it covers 4 per cent. of Wales's land mass, but only 8 per cent. of i population. Sheep outnumber people by 20 to one. Th Bill comes before us on the first day of a new Prim Minister's term of office and at a time when the country moving deeper into recession, with Wales, as usual, at th sharp end. The additional scope for the Developmer Board of Rural Wales is a mere flea bite, welcome thoug it is.

We must face the fact that the unhappy state of th British economy has a major detrimental effect on rura Wales. In housing, mortgage rates stand at about 14·5 pe cent.—an extraordinarily high rate that is way above tha which ordinary people living in mid-Wales can afford. Is any wonder that young people pack up and go? Empt houses are left for better-off people, usually from acros the border, who often turn them into holiday homes and in the process, Welsh culture and language ar undermined. The solution to that problem lies in th Government's hands and, presumably, they are at leas recognising the problem by giving this small extra fundin for the Development Board for Rural Wales.

Some people cross the border into mid-Wales a permanent residents. They should be given a traditiona Welsh welcome, but I get a bit nauseated when some o them start bellyaching when their children are taugh Welsh at school. Surely that is what they should expec when they come to live in Wales.

Rural Wales has tended to rely on agriculture which over the years, has shed many jobs. Consequently, th depopulation of that region has been quite dramatic. Fron 1891 to 1981, the population of mid-Wales fell by 23,500 whereas the total population of Wales in the same perio increased by 1 million. The mid-Wales populatio decreased from 12·6 per cent. of the Welsh population i 1891 to only 7·2 per cent. in 1981. That shows a fall i absolute and relative terms.

The big issue of jobs is essentially what the rura development board is all about. I said earlier that th board had done some good work. For instance, since 197 it is reckoned to have created 12,000 much-needed jobs However, Mr. Glyn Davies, the board's chairman recently said that the prosperity of mid-Wales would b determined by the success or otherwise of the United Kingdom economy as a whole. The single European market and the channel tunnel will also play an important part. My guess is that both will tend to increase the regional imbalance in Britain. In that sense, they are likely to aggravate the problems of mid-Wales. There must be Government support to counteract such tendencies.

[Mr. Roy Hughes]

Let us look at what has been happening to the Welsh economy as a whole. According to the most recent official figures, manufacturing investment in Wales has fallen by more than 19 per cent. in the past decade and over the same period regional preferential treatment has been cut by £166 million. Is it any wonder that unemployment in Wales is still 6·7 per cent. of the work force, even on the basis of the Government's adulterated figures? In mid-Wales, the partial collapse of Laura Ashley has not helped. Equally, the decision to move the headquarters of that company from mid-Wales will not help to engender confidence in the area.

The new Prime Minister, when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, clamped down on the economy, and that has had evil side effects. For example, in the past year business failures in Wales have increased by 4 per cent. That is a spectacular rise. Further evidence of the regional imbalance affecting mid-Wales can be seen in living standards. The official figures show that, although Wales has had a 3 per cent. increase in living standards over the past 10 years, that is only one ninth of the increase that has occurred in Greater London. What a contrast.

Most indicators show that Wales is at a disadvantage compared with other regions of Britain. However, when my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) speaks about some of those basic facts, he is accused of spreading doom and gloom. I do not agree with such accusations against my hon. Friend. He should be congratulated on exposing the real situation in Wales.

The infrastructure in mid-Wales is sadly lacking, and that is one of the principal causes of poverty and depopulation. The rural development board does not have the funds to do much about that, but the Government, through the Welsh Office, can improve matters. British Rail is reluctant to electrify main line services to Wales and passengers on our rural lines suffer deplorable conditions. In mid-Wales, British Rail seems to use everybody's cast-off rolling stock. The Government should show that they care about our rural communities by being prepared to subsidise transport services.

The eastern towns of mid-Wales, such as Newtown and Welshpool, are fairly close to the motorway network, which gives them an advantage. In the 1960s and 1970s, the concentration was on building the M4—what we would do without it today, I do not know. In more recent years, road building for Wales has tended to focus on the A55, the north Wales coastal road. In future, we should pay more attention to north-south road links which could do nothing but good for mid-Wales. The Minister will be aware that I tabled a spate of questions on this matter. The Western Mail, the daily newspaper circulating in Wales, has campaigned on this issue. The road network between the north and the south is a relic from the horse-and-cart age.

We are told that the demand is just not there, and that the number of journeys travelled do not justify such large-scale public expenditure. I feel that people do not make the journey between north and south because the facilities are so poor. For example, I am fond of Llandudo as a resort; it is a wonderful place. However, I do not go there as often as I would wish because journe Wales are so difficult. Some do not wish the improvements, which could so benefit Wale The same people expressed opposition t Severn crossing. They have what I would mentality, but I find their attitude detriment mid-Wales but to the interests of Wales as

I have only recently returned from a visit which reminded somewhat of mid-Wa fascinating to hear the Welsh language still Some of the traditional Welsh chapels we Tabernacle, Moriah, Bethel and so on. Pe have put up a tremendous fight to keep the W and culture. In Wales as a whole, we must fig share of the cake. If we achieve this, we shall position to fight for the Welsh language support the Bill. Minimal though it is, at lea step in the right direction.

9.27 pm

Mr. Richard Livesy (Brecon and supporting the Bill, I begin by paying tribu Emrys Roberts, the first chairman of the Board for Rural Wales, who sadly, pass months ago. He did sterling work in startin and he was a former Liberal Member of Merioneth. He has been followed by Mr. and now Mr. Glyn Davies, an energetic ch development board, who is using his time e

I am particularly interested in the devel because I was brought up in rural development board area. I think that I am that I and the hon. Member for Bridgend are the only two hon. Members who hav Chamber tonight who have been depop mid-Wales. That is not a pleasant experien from the area for 14 years, and when development board was operating there and good work.

I gently chide the Secretary of State on population expansion. I recommend that t research into those figures in order to happening to school leavers. I believe that exchange of population is taking place in m some of our most youthful people leavi retired people coming in, giving us a population in terms of its age.

Only last weekend, a young lad of 19 t had applied for a job with the local coun Brecon has only 3 per cent. unemployment good figure, but 72 people, mostly youngste that job. I know from personal experien people have to leave because they cannot statistics conceal a problem. I hope that will be able to investigate further to see going on. I know that there is a project happens to school leavers in mid-Wales and

I welcome the aggregate increase of re board. Looking at the board's annual repor it is noticeable that in 1986 expenditure wa and in 1990 it was scheduled to be £12·9 pleased that the Secretary of State has anno will be increased to £14·1 million. At leas progress.

Mr. Coleman: Does the hon. Gentleman agree that the announcement that the Army is to leave his area means that the development board will be extremely important, because that move will cause considerable problems?

Mr. Livsey: That is an extremely important point. The Army has headquarters in Brecon and it looks likely to be demoted. I have written to the Secretary of State about that. We do not wish to see any reduction in the staff at the Army headquarters at Brecon. I hope that the Secretary of State will campaign to ensure that a major general still commands the forces at HQ Wales and that there is no reduction in status. In that respect, we deserve a similar status to Scotland. The Sennybridge range of 30,000 acres is one of the largest training areas in Wales and in the United Kingdom. Troops returning from Hong Kong and elsewhere could well be accommodated in camps in Wales such as Cwrt-y-gollen camp in Crickhowell.

I should have liked the Bill to make provision for future expenditure for the board to be increased by statutory instrument. I was told that I could not table an amendment to that effect, but I shall discuss that further in Committee.

I should like to see an extension of the board's remit in two particular areas. It is now becoming painfully obvious that, although those areas were excluded from the board's remit when it was founded, times have changed radically. I am sure that the Secretary of State will have noticed the references to the present general state of agriculture in mid-Wales. The board has said that up to 25 per cent. of the population of mid-Wales is employed in agriculture. In my constituency 18 per cent. of the population is engaged in agriculture in one way or another. The present depression in agriculture and the reduction in incomes is forcing young people out of the family farms. We must address that problem. We need more marketing. I was at the winter fair yesterday, to which the Secretary of State referred when dealing with his worthwhile initiative for food from Wales.

It is important to give the development board more resources to increase abattoir and meat packing capacity. Wales has only three abattoirs that meet EEC standards, whereas there are 20 in Scotland. That is a serious shortfall when one considers 1992 and the European single market, and the ability of Welsh farmers to market lamb efficiently and effectively in proper packs. They must compete properly in the supermarkets of not only Britain but France, Germany, elsewhere in Europe, and even Japan —which the Secretary of State visited recently.

Mr. Raffan: I strongly endorse the hon. Gentleman's point about abattoirs in the Principality. There is strong feeling on that aspect among the farmers in my community whom I met recently. New abattoirs would also generate additional employment, and the Government should look at that matter quickly.

Mr. Livsey: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his support, which the Secretary of State would find widely echoed throughout Wales.

The farming community is particularly exposed in the market place at this time. They compete only as individuals, and about 45 per cent. of the British retail market is controlled by five supermarket groups. That does not put farmers in a very good bargaining position. They need to co-operate, and to establish new abattoirs.

I was particularly disappointed when an application to build a new abattoir at Three Cocks did not come to fruition. There were problems about the land, whose owners were not prepared to sell. I understand that the Welsh Office and the development board were able to put up only 30 per cent. of grant aid support. It is well known that on the continent, and in France in particular, grant aid for abattoirs can be as high as 50 per cent., which makes a crucial difference. I shall be grateful if the Secretary of State will closely examine that aspect, to see how the board can assist more in the building of new abattoirs, especially before 1992.

Mr. Alan W. Williams (Carmarthen): The same point was forcefully made by National Farmers Union members in my constituency when I met them in September. They pointed out that Wales would be left in 1992 with only three abattoirs conforming to European standards. Meat processing is a sensible industry in rural areas because of the value-added employment that it offers. Also, rather than export our live sheep in the cruel conditions under which they are transported to the French markets, it would be much more sensible to slaughter them here and then export them as processed meat products.

Mr. Livsey: The hon. Gentleman reinforces my argument, and mentions also the important issue of live exports. Our industry will come under increasing pressure in that respect.

Under present conditions, farming families need to boost their incomes. I know of a number of recent cases in which the single son of a family farm has had to leave the business to find employment elsewhere—not just 10 miles away but hundreds of miles from home. The development board should consider providing part-time jobs to boost the incomes of farming families. Members of the family could work away from the farm two or three days a week, in order to supplement their incomes and to preserve family farms.

The other aspect that the development board has not considered is tourism. That is not in its remit either, but I should like it to be taken into account, and perhaps considered in the future.

Affordable housing is an enormous problem, as other hon. Members have pointed out. The average value of a house in my constituency often turns out be about £60,000, whereas the mortgage that can be obtained on average earnings in the local community is about £20,000. That means that it is impossible for someone on an average wage in my constituency to purchase a house.

Rented accommodation has virtually dried up. Although the development board is doing good work in terms of housing for key workers, it is especially frustrating for young people to see houses that are often empty for up to two years before they can be occupied —it can be a great heartache for them.

The development board programme has been outlined and it plans for the maintenance of 1,500 jobs per year. I note the chairman's statement that 1,000 jobs will be created in the next three years. That will not be adequate to retain a larger part of of the school leaving population, and we need to consider that.

We need to assist young entrepreneurs in central Wales. One of our problems is that we do not have enough home-bred industry. I remember my mother telling me when I was in my early 20s, "There is nothing here for you, my boy. You'll have to go away to earn a decent living". The situation has changed, but there are still too many service industries and too much local government employment compared to employment in businesses. We must encourage young entrepreneurs who are born and bred in mid-Wales. The present strategy can be improved.

[Mr. Livsey]

I note from the report that approximately 18 towns in mid-Wales have been concentrated on to encourage growth, but it needs to spread further afield. I welcome the development board's western initiative. However, we have to spread out into some of the smaller communities and villages to balance employment.

The remarks that have been made about poor infrastructure are very important. I measured my constituency on the mileage clock of my car the other day. I started from Ystradgynlais and ended at the top of the Teme valley. I travelled 92 miles—that is a long way on a very poor road system. As other hon. Members have said, the system needs vast improvements.

We need to be geared up into a higher-waged economy. Wages in the eastern part of the area are too low. Unemployment has been brought down, although there is still a problem in the west, but wages remain very low. Far too many people work for £80 or £100 per week. Averages mean that it is still very much a case of people having their head in the fridge and their feet in the oven. Between those two poles there are bad examples of low wages.

We need to support the development board. There should not be any movement towards co-operating too closely with the Welsh Development Agency. The development board must protect its independence fiercely because it concentrates on rural areas. As the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan) suggested, the case for other areas coming into the development area should be studied carefully. The Welsh Office should appoint a Minister to concentrate on rural areas. After all, they cover a vast area in Wales.

I have been fortunate enough to obtain space in the exhibition area. There will be an excellent exhibition for the development board from 10 to 14 December and there will be a reception on 10 December. I hope that all hon. Members present, including you, Mr. Speaker, and all Welsh Members will come along and see the good work being done by the development board. I am sure that when we next debate the development board we will all wish to increase its funding even further.

9.45 pm

Dr. Dafydd Elis Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): It is a pleasure to debate rural Wales because we do not often have the opportunity of doing so. I associate myself with what has been said by my colleagues from the region, particularly the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey), who spoke of the late Emrys Roberts. As the hon. Gentleman said, he was one of my predecessors as the Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy. I was able to count on him as a good friend. He played a distinctive role inside the House as a Liberal Member of Parliament and outside it in his enterprise, legal and cultural activities. We remember him particularly as the chairman of the Mid-Wales Development Corporation, a predecessor organisation of the development board.

It is appropriate to remember the Development Board for Rural Wales Mid-Wales Development Association, Mid-Wales Industrial Development Ass Authorities, whose leading light was M Edwards, another great Montgomeryshi still very much alive and active in develo consultant for Antur Dwyryd, the ent north-west Meirionnydd.

When the then Government institute legislation and brought it into mid-Wale development corporation, the team a Industrial Development Association p from which the Development Board for established.

I am listing the organisations because plea that we should not look for too mu way in which statutory agencies communities. The hon. Member for D said that at one time he leant towar combination of agencies working tog who have a lifelong interest in rural de leaned towards a concept of integrated that produces some sort of line mana happy hour that I spent in the Mon morning, I tend to take a different app broad brushes and concentration. A agencies are coterminous and overla provide different textures of enterp development activity.

I want an assurance from the Secreta sure that he will be able to give it—that the Development Board for Rural Wale as long as the Governm t continue. gentle rhetoric of the hon. Member for (Mr. Jones) that a Labour Government- to be one—would also continue the acti There has been loose talk in som strengthening the rural arm of the W Agency. That is important in areas of r outside the territory of the Developme Wales. However, strengthening the rura does not mean reducing the powers o board and strengthening the overall Development international does not m development board's marketing rol Kingdom and beyond.

Mr. Barry Jones: I make it clear that cent. behind the Development Board Having heard about his broad-brush that the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Thomas) will consider the royal collect museum in Cardiff and the Mostyn ga where Piper is exhibited. There are g Wales as well as the serial numbers of

Dr. Thomas: I was pleased to see collection, "Rouen cathedral", in the R I am an internationalist, as the hon. M glad to hear his commitment to the fu

I want to consider the interface of a only the WDA and the DBRW—I hop follow all these acronyms—but the W and the Agricultural Development which is the authority for redire diversification in agriculture. Linked with that are the activities of local government economic development officers and, more recently, the enterprise agencies, which are working in the constituency of the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells), which is part of the DBRW area, and in Antur Dwyryd. In addition, there is the activity of large voluntary landowners such as the National Trust and our recently announced Snowdonia appeal, which we hope will bring additional voluntary and private sector funds into the area.

There are other agencies that I have not mentioned, but I list those to emphasise that we have a diversity of organisations and that it should be possible to have an approach that maximises their contribution without looking for a simplistic structure. Therefore, we must consider how we can collaborate on working parties and projects in which the various agencies take the lead role.

In the context of rural Wales, we look particularly to the western initiative of the board and to the activity of its new offices in Machynlleth, which have been successful in answering queries and stimulating interest. The enterprise culture is developing as a bilingual enterprise culture in that part of the world.

We face a number of fairly major crises. In my own patch, there is the future of the energy industry and of the Magnox station at Trawsfynydd. We are still waiting to hear about the extension of the life of that station, which is under the control of the nuclear installations inspectorate. Obviously, we all want to see the maintenance of jobs for as long as possible in environmentally safe conditions, but in the next five or 10 years there will be a major closure involving 600 job losses. Obviously, there will be jobs in decommissioning, which is a complex and difficult technology, but there will be substantial job losses.

We need to plan for that in the same way as we planned for steel and coal enclosures, for which there was a major input of resources. I am aware that Nuclear Electric is not able to do what British Steel and British Coal were able to do, but we need an approach which matches that, and we look for help from the European regional development fund and for further enhancement of DBRW funds. I am sure the local enterprise agency in Antur Dwyryd will have a particular role to play.

We must consider that in terms of a task force and a project-led approach which anticipates and itemises the skills that are already available in the area, encourages people to move into the self-employed or small enterprise sector and seeks co-operative activity. There is a range of possibilities, provided that we are ready in time to anticipate those closures.

I very much endorse what has been said about the need to improve the abattoir facilities in mid-Wales. We must add value to our agriculture produce. I pay tribute to the work of Welsh Lamb Enterprise, which is based in mid-Wales, which has been active in its promotion. We must back that up with investment programmes in abattoir capacity to bring us up to the standard that we need to export our cuts. As I was told when I was last at the Commission talking about these issues, there are still opportunities in the Spanish and Italian lamb markets. Forty per cent. of the German lamb market—there is opportunity for growth—is taken up by New Zealand. That country is not exporting lamb on the hoof to Germany, but it prepares cuts so that they are attractive German housepersons. That is a lesson for us all on ho to produce and market our goods.

One of the first appearances by the Secretary of Sta for Wales in his new post was when he dressed as a wai at a Welsh Lamb Enterprise promotion and wore an apr showing the excellent Lamb Enterprise logo. I know th he is already convinced, so I hope that he will put no money behind his commitment to Welsh lamb.

Mr. Raffan: There is great concern even in the farmi community about the number of sheep farmers wh contribute towards Welsh Lamb Enterprise. We need make the farming community much more aware of t need to market its products. It is pretty appalling when o can go into a butcher's shop in a village in my constituen and find three posters advertising New Zealand lamb.

Dr. Thomas: Far be it from me to suggest that the ho Gentleman should change his butcher.

Mr. Raffan: I did not buy the lamb.

Dr. Thomas: Oh. My hon. Friend the Member fo Ceredigion and Pembroke, North pays 4p at least p animal. Every other Welsh lamb producer should do th same.

I wish to refer to the interrelationship between what th board does in terms of manufacturing and small-sca enterprise and its more general aim to improve the quali of life in mid-Wales—for example, the social developme and infrastructure programmes. In a consultancy capacit the board has produced ideas and has worked with Britis Rail and other major agencies to upgrade amenities an the infrastructure.

I pay tribute not only to the late Emrys Roberts but t an amazing friend, John Hughes, who for 13 years wa secretary of the board and ended his career as soci development director far too young. He was also one o the leading lights of Newtown football club. Hall football pitches and television reception facilitie throughout mid-Wales benefited from the social develop ment programme in which he was involved. I want t ensure that such a programme continues under the boar and that there is no reduction in those activities.

I do not want any of the board's functions privatised moved out of Ladywell house and given to consultant from outside the area. There has been concern that, unde new management in the board, there may be a tendency t look at ways of moving activities out of house an reducing the interface between the board, as a accountable organisation within the community, and th local community. I want an assurance that the cor activities of the board are not privatised. It is not just factory-building or industrial estate agency, but a soci development agency. To return to my impressionis analogy, social development in the countryside is a sof touch technique which relates to the fabric and texture o society.

Dr. Iain Skewis, the board's chief director, was als enthusiastic about soccer tournaments, especially fo young people. He brought skills that only a Scots perso can bring to the development of mid-Wales. His experienc at the Highlands and Islands development board brough into mid-Wales a flamboyant and always straight style Sometimes he created a bit of a stir in certain loca authority planning agencies, but that was all to the good because it gave the board a high profile. I should like to pay as handsome a tribute as I can to his work and the time that he devoted to mid-Wales.

[Dr. Thomas]

The new chairman, Gwyn Jones—whom many of us knew in his earlier incarnation as a very active chair of Montgomeryshire district council—graced the borders of my constituency and Montgomeryshire with a huge, garish sign announcing, "Croeso i Faldwyn" —"Welcome to Montgomeryshire". That was one of his first actions as the council chair, and he has brought the same style to the development board.

Wales is blessed with many quangos. A great triumvirate now runs three of the main ones. Wyn Jones, of the Welsh Development Agency, brings his own Hollywood style to the job of running a Welsh quango; Prys Edwards, of the Welsh tourist board, has brought his own cultural approach to the job—he, too, is always well groomed—

It being Ten o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Ordered,

That, at this day's sitting, the Development Board for Rural Wales Bill may be proceeded with, though opposed, until any hour.—[Mr. Greg Knight.]

Question again proposed, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

Dr. Thomas: As I was saying, we have a triumvirate. The third member, Glyn Davies, has also brought his inimitable style to the development board.

In the absence of an elected Government in Wales, we could do a great deal worse. Those people are giving their time to public service, and providing an upbeat image of what goes on in the country. The Opposition parties are not turning a blind eye to the reality of social deprivation and economic problems such as unemployment and low incomes; we are well aware of those problems. However, we also want to emphasise the good news—not just the positive aspects of Government policy, but the benefits of voluntary activity undertaken by the people. Many are incomers—"born-again Welsh", as I call them—who bring their skills into Wales, making cheese in Dyfed, or honey ice cream in Towyn. I must not leave out Towyn, which contains some of my nicest constituents.

Whatever they may be doing, those people have brought a new energy to Wales. It is all part of the new upbeat attitude. Wales, and mid-Wales in particular, has become a location for inward investment of multinational capital, because of the attractiveness of the area, the skills of the labour force and the existence of a corporate Welsh state—if I may take up the point made by the hon. Member for Delyn.

All this is because of the form of selective intervention that we are operating—the combination of public-sector activity on the part of the Welsh Office and the agencies, and the activities of local authorities and the voluntary sector. Some of the workers have been involved in development for 20 or 25 years. Obviously, the interest of multinationals in making relative profits in the location is part of the equation: people locate in Wales not for reasons of charity, but because it makes economic sense.

The reason for all those developments is not only the decision of the multinationals to locate outside the metropolitan centres and to turn to the regions, but the willingness of Wales and its institutions to play the game. I pay tribute to the Minister of State, not just because he has been in the Welsh Office longer than the Secretary of State; he has been involved in every aspect of inward investment, linking that involvement with his work as Minister for rural Wales. My hon. Friend the Member for Brecon and Radnor says that we do not have such a Minister, but the Minister of State must do that job, because of his brief.

We are celebrating the provision of new money—I am advised that that is what it is, so I am able to welcome it. I hope that my advisers and those of the Secretary of State agree about that. We also welcome the additional borrowing power, and look forward to a long rolling programme for the board, in collaboration with the other agencies. In that, we will be able to build on the massive contribution of people like the late Emrys Roberts and the late John Hughes.

10.4 pm

Dr. John Marek (Wrexham): My comments will not be very different in tone from what other hon. Members have said, and I have no intention of voting against Second Reading. The Bill is important for central and rural Wales and the increases provided will be very welcome.

The Development Board for Rural Wales did not get everything right and there were problems with over-expansion in the new towns and the bringing in of too many people from outside the area and outside Wales. As a result, we still have bad housing shortages. Perhaps more attention should be paid to local growth. We have to bring in businesses to help to advance the economy of rural Wales, but we must do that while bearing in mind the local people first and foremost.

I was slightly worried by the remarks made by my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones). He said that we need more roads to unify Wales. We certainly need more roads, but I am not sure whether we necessarily need them to unify Wales. It is important to unify Wales, but money is extremely limited. If we are to spend money on roads, as we should, we should do so to help the economy of Wales and to help people who travel to and from Wales and different parts of England and those who travel within Wales. If we unify Wales we will simply have roads between north and south Wales so that local government councillors and officers, Members of Parliament and all sorts of administrators can get into their cars and consume petrol, which is a non-renewable resource, instead of travelling by train.

Roads are important. We need better roads from the M4 into Cardiganshire from Carmarthen to Aberaeron or from Carmarthen to Aberystwyth. However, the criteria for building those roads must be right. They should not be built because of status or because of a need to unify one part of Wales with another.

Mr. Raffan: I agree with the hon. Gentleman. I am sure that he would accept what the previous chairman of the DBRW said—I believe that the present chairman agrees with this—which is that the crucial roads to the local economy of mid-Wales are east-west links rather than north-south links.

Dr. Marek: There is a lot in that. Roads from Aberaeron or Aberystwyth to Carmarthen are important because they would join that area to the M4, which runs east to west. I am sure that my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside had that kind of programme in mind.

I agree with nearly every point that has been made tonight. Farming is vital to rural Wales. I disagree slightly with the hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan). It is not a matter of not buying New Zealand lamb and buying Welsh lamb. Of course we must buy Welsh lamb whenever possible, but we survive as a trading nation. We should be able to compete. Many of us would say that Welsh lamb is better than New Zealand lamb, but we should not try to ban New Zealand lamb.

Land in Wales is only good for sheep. Land in New Zealand is certainly good for sheep, too, but the land in other areas like England and France is good for sheep and many other things. If the agricultural system is such that those other things are not produced, the other parts of Europe and especially England, France and Spain might turn to sheep rearing. If that happens, we shall lose out in Wales. That is my great fear.

The Government should be able to regulate the industry so that we are allowed to do the things in Wales that we are best at doing. There is a serious crisis in farming in rural Wales. The Government must consider that carefully and they must fight their corner in the corridors of Brussels on that point.

I am sponsored by the National Union of Railwaymen and want to make two points about the railway connections between Wales and England. Unfortunately, it is no longer possible to make any comments about railway connections between north and south Wales because one has to go into England to make such a connection. There would be nothing wrong with that, provided that the service was good.

The mid-Wales line, from Aberystwyth to Shrewsbury, has had a good service, with InterCity rolling stock. The Cambrian coast express leaves Euston at about 3.40 pm and the public can travel all the way through mid-Wales to Aberystwyth in comfortable InterCity rolling stock. The train leaves Aberystwyth at about 7.20 am and travels back to the capital. I understand that that service is to be withdrawn next May. We should be advancing as a nation, not regressing. Central Wales will have to rely on a sprinter service. It can take about two hours 20 minutes to travel from Aberystwyth to Shrewsbury, but everybody in central Wales will have to make that journey on a sprinter.

Not many hon. Members—apart from hon. Members representing Wales—realise how difficult it is to get to central Wales. If central Wales is to develop, communications must be good. There is no airfield and the roads need improving. They are not very good and the journey gets worse as one travels by car to London, because the motorway cannot cope with the traffic. We must therefore have a good railway system, but it takes five and a half hours to travel from Aberystwyth to London.

I represent Wrexham and it is easy for me to travel from Wrexham to London. I can do it in two hours 50 minutes by the fastest train. I believe that hon. Members representing the north-west coast can make their journey in even less time. If one travels to Aberystwyth from London, one spends over five hours on a train, yet British Rail is proposing to withdraw the only comfortable service from next May. It is the only service that business men would dream of using. I believe that the Bill could help the development board to persuade British Rail to maintain the service. Perhaps the DBRW could even provide some extra funding to help British Rail to do so.

Dr. Thomas: I am sometimes accused in the House of speaking for the Government, but I am certainly not speaking for British Rail. My understanding is that British Rail is to introduce rolling stock for the local haul routes similar to that which is available in the highlands of Scotland which is the super sprinter.

Dr. Marek: The hon. Gentleman may be right and British Rail may introduce the super sprinter—the class 158. Let me disillusion the hon. Gentleman now, because there is no way in which that train will run from Wrexham to Euston. The latest plan is for the train to go via Birmingham to Nuneaton, then on to the overpass at Nuneaton, and to travel to Leicester before proceeding down to St. Pancras. That is a tortuous journey.

The Minister of State, Welsh Office (Sir Wyn Roberts): I have been speaking to senior officials of British Rail this morning and I can confirm what the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas) has been saying, and that it is British Rail's intention to introduce the 158s, which will provide a better service, from next May. British Rail is also taking a look at all its regional services in Wales with a view to improving them.

Dr. Marek: I hope that we shall have a bipartisan policy on this, because that is what Wales needs if we are to ensure that the service does not deteriorate. The Minister must be aware that the early morning service from Aberystwyth to Shrewsbury has been withdrawn and that the last service from Shrewsbury to Chester is also being withdrawn. Furthermore, the area manager for Chester has been told to make cuts of £2 million by next April, which will mean a loss of staff and services. He must know that the Bidston line will be single in perhaps two or three years.

In a friendly way, I warn the Minister to be careful about what British Rail tells him. "Improvements" usually turn out in practice to be cuts in services. Importantly for the development board's area, I am not sure that a class 158 sprinter, however grand, can make up for the loss of an InterCity service direct to Euston. It will be difficult for passengers to know whether to go to Euston or St. Pancras to get a train to Wales. For some services which go through Birmingham they may have to go to Paddington. That is not an improvement.

If we had the money and British Rail had the finance available, Euston could be the one station for passengers travelling between Wales and London. There should be at least one direct train a day between Euston along the electrified line to Shrewsbury and then to Aberystwyth, using InterCity class coaches. That is important.

I do not wish to take too long, but I wish to make an equivalent point about the north Wales main line which feeds into Blaenau Ffestiniog, which is an important part of the area of the DBRW. Again, class 47 engines will be withdrawn in one or two years. British Rail has refused to say when, but in practice and according to the proposed timetable, it will be in 1992. It is intended to replace those trains with high-speed trains. Again, the HSTs decanted from the east coast main line will not travel to Euston. They will travel to Nuneaton and thence to Leicester and St. Pancras.

[Dr. Marek]

The trains are expensive to run and have a life of only about eight years. Significantly, when they are introduced, there will be no train leaving Euston for north Wales at about 5 pm—an important time. That will have a serious effect on our infrastructure and transport connections between the north of Wales and Euston. There is a case for electrifying that line, as the Minister and the Secretary of State must know.

If the line were electrified, how much would it cost? I am told that it would cost about £60 million. What percentage of that money would be available from Europe? How much money would be available from the European regional development fund? The line will be in a development grant area. How much extra money would be available from the European grant for improving international railway lines connecting different member states of the European Community? The Crewe-Holyhead line is the only such line in Britain. Perhaps the fast line through Kent to the channel tunnel could be another example but certainly north of London the Crewe-Holyhead line is the only one that would qualify for such help.

How many millions of pounds will be available if that line is electrified? Let us suppose that half of the money is available. If the interest on capital employed is 4 per cent., if the cost was £60 million and if half of the money were available from Europe, immediately the interest on the capital employed by British Rail would rise to 8 per cent., which would be above its target. For that reason, British Rail will not electrify the line because it knows very well that, because of the additionality principle, the Government will take the money that it receives from Europe away from its grants in a future year.

So British Rail will rightly say, "We are happy to electrify that line but if we do, the Government will take away the grant so we shall receive only 4 per cent. on the capital employed. There are other areas where the scarce resources would be better employed and we could get a better rate of return on our capital." The result is that there is money sitting in Europe which we could use, but for our silly administrative procedures.

Sir Wyn Roberts indicated dissent.

Dr. Marek: If the Minister believes that I am wrong, I should be happy to let him intervene. I had hoped that the Government would agree that, because of a silly administrative system, we have lost out. Some people say that three quarters of the money would be supplied by Europe for the electrification of the line—£45 million out of £60 million. If that is so, it is a crying shame that that money cannot be used because of administrative procedures followed by the Government.

I do not want to make a party political point about the electrification of the line, but we should unite about it in Wales. We should recognise that money would be given to us, without any strings attached, if we electrified the line.

I hope that I have argued my case sensibly and without acrimony and party political bias. This subject should unite Wales. When we have the ability to use European money, we should do so. We should not let procedures between British Rail and the Government prevent us from so doing. I hope that the Government will consider the case carefully and that, where appropriate, the DBRW will also be asked for assistance.

10.20 pm

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke North): I have the pleasure of living within the catchmen area of Mid Wales Development. I have resided there al my life. George Borrow, a well-known Englishman who travelled Wales from north to south many decades ago said, on passing through our village:

"This is an area where men will live when crows will die" I have had the privilege to live in a part of Wales which am so proud.

I am delighted that hon. Members on both sides of th House are united in their deliberations to say thank yo for the excellent work done by Mid Wales Developmen over the years. I remember the early 1950s when it all cam about. A few county councillors from Cardigan Montgomery, Meirionnydd, Brecon and Radnor go together because they were worried about the rate o depopulation from mid-Wales. Many young people wer leaving and I remember one alderman getting up in th county council and saying, "I remember the turn of th century when the population of Cardiganshire was at it highest. Here we are 50 years later, and the population i dwindling." I am delighted that, 40 years later, mid-Wale is thriving. That is due to the excellent work of thos pioneers who thought to set up a development board fo rural Wales.

We have made a few mistakes. I do not blame the Tor Government of the early 1970s or the Labour Governmer of the late 1960s. The Bill concerning the rur development board that was introduced by the Labou Government in the 1960s was intended to ensure tha agriculture came under the remit of the DBRW.

Unfortunately, the Bill went too far and an element o compulsion was introduced. For example, a farmer wh wanted to sell a piece of land or his farm had to ga permission of the chairman of the development boar Many of us fought hard against that incursion on th liberties of the individual. We won our case, rightly so, i 1969. I am sure that that problem was an oversight by th then Labour Government. The Tory Government of 197 decided to abolish the previous legislation. In the la 1970s a new Bill was introduced by the then Labou Government and accepted. We are by now united in ou belief that the board has done excellent work.

Hon. Members from both sides of the House ha referred to agriculture and I believe that the Governme and the Secretary of State should take another look at th board's remit, which should include agriculture within th catchment area of mid-Wales.

Mid-Wales has been transformed. Let us imagine wh would have happened to our language, culture an economy if we had not had the board in mid-Wales. If w are all so committed to the Development Board for Rur Wales and the excellent work of the Welsh Developme Agency, so complimentary of the Welsh Office and want see all those organisations flourish, we should all be unit in our deliberations. If those organisations are doing su excellent work for the people of Wales, we should have Welsh Assembly to ensure that they all get together to lo after the interests of the Welsh people.

To be fair to him, the Secretary of State is a go Welshman, as is the shadow Secretary of State, the ho

Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones), who has Wales at heart. They should get together and think seriously of bringing forward proposals as good as those suggested by our forefathers for the development of rural Wales, so that, by the turn of the century, we can have our own Parliament run by our own people to look after our own interests.

10.26 pm

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): While the Bill simply raises the legal limits on the financing of the Development Board for Rural Wales, it does not, of itself, give new money. It is right and proper that it should be seized on as an opportunity to discuss the Government's strategies towards rural Wales.

There have been several useful contributions to tonight's debate, not least that of the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells), who emphasised the unity of purpose and aspiration that exists in the House. My hon. Friend the Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) and others rightly referred to the importance of public transport.

The hon. Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan), while sounding like an express train without tracks, illustrated the confusion and despair that arise at times of industrial closure. He should address his strictures to the guilty men in the Cabinet who have been responsible for this country's economic plight. The reply to his crocodile tears was given by my hon. Friend the Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes), who highlighted the fact that a new Prime Minister moves into No. 10 Downing street as the country moves into a recession which he has helped to create. The effect of that recession on the rural economy has been, and will be, devastating, and we cannot ignore that in the context of tonight's debate.

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) rightly highlighted the need for a balance of ages in the communities of rural Wales and his suggestions about the support of family farms and the place of tourism in the economy of rural Wales were constructive and should be followed up. I hope that the Secretary of State will respond to those comments.

The remarks of the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas) contained much that was unexceptionable. He appears to have time to attend the Monet exhibition as well as lecturing in Scotland and was as petty as ever in his references to the Labour party. He should have more confidence in my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) as well as the imminence of a Labour Government who would certainly not only retain the Development Board for Rural Wales established by a previous Labour Government, but provide the proper economic and social framework within which its work will be greatly enhanced. If he has any doubts about the future of the board, I suggest that he checks the Government's intentions. There is certainly no doubt of the Labour party's intentions, but he is always kinder to the Conservative party than to the Labour party.

I welcomed the Secretary of State's remarks about the importance of close co-operation between all the organisations involved. I hope that he will take that policy wider than he did in his introduction. He also spoke of sustaining communities in the most vulnerable districts and the high proportion of elderly people in the rural communities, which requires the Government, as well as improving the economy, to give resources to the social infrastructure.

The Secretary of State also spoke about the importance of agriculture. Research by economists at Aberystwyth suggests that Britain could lose about 12,000 jobs in agriculture and another 12,000 in related employment. That underlines the importance of the work of the Development Board for Rural Wales in stimulating other sectors of the rural economy to create compensating employment opportunities. The development of high-tech industries which can operate in rural areas brings opportunities but also brings a need for adequate training. The rural areas face difficulties about such training because of failures throughout the economy.

As the Secretary of State said, the board has adopted a smaller scale and more diffuse approach. He called it the western approach. The board also encourages a more economically self-sustaining approach. That is important because, as Trawsfynydd reminds us, large-scale industries in rural areas can have a distorting and destabilising effect on the rural economy.

A recent House of Lords Select Committee on the European Communities report makes strong reference to the need for coherence in planning. In its conclusion the report refers to the Development Board for Rural Wales and states that it is one of three United Kingdom bodies which "have proved successful in promoting diversification of the rural economy and remain the proper vehicles through which to channel public support for rural economy and social development."

I emphasise the words "and social development" and I shall return to them.

The report also states:

"The Government should provide broad strategic guidance on the way in which the countryside should develop. Without such guidance rural policies will continue to suffer from lack of integration, lack of targeting and an imbalance in resource allocation . . . . There is a need for greater institutional coordination at local level".

Hon Members will be aware of concern about the lack of a coherent approach to marina developments in Wales. I highlight that as an example of an area where the Secretary of State should build in greater co-operation and adopt a slightly wider approach than he showed in his speech. He will be aware that the Countryside Commission report for 1990 speaks of the importance of a policy for marinas. It states:

"It is essential to develop policy in this area, in response to the burgeoning number of proposals received."

It is an example of one form of development which needs a coherent approach.

As a result of pressure, over the past 18 months the Wales Tourist Board brought together the statutory bodies and local authorities. It did that with the public blessing of the Minister of State, Welsh Office who commented favourably on that co-ordinated approach. I am delighted that he did so. Nine months of discussion resulted in a statement of policy being drawn up, and that is to the advantage of development and conservation alike. A strategic all-Wales approach instead of a sporadic approach is precisely what is needed in this and in approaches to other forms of development and planning.

I understand that the report was ready at Easter but that the Welsh Development Agency declined to sign the statement that was drawn up, even though it was involved in the whole process. I understand that they obtained concessions for their point of view, which is the whole point of a consultative process. I also understand that no clear and public explanation has been given for that refusal to sign.

[Mr. Alun Michael]

The Secretary of State and his colleagues should ensure that the statement is published as soon as possible. They should urge the chairmen of the two bodies to appreciate that they need to become involved as full parties in the process. The Secretary of State should reaffirm the Government's support for this process and he should tell us how the Welsh Office will ensure a sustainable and sensitive strategy that can be implemented with authority and not just left as an aspiration which can be shelved and ignored in the development of future policies.

I am pleased that many professional bodies are increasingly willing to look outside their own narrow or special interests. For example, but for today's debate I would have been speaking to the conference of the Association of Countryside Rangers which this year meets in Wales. Its conference concentrates on new roles in the community of the countryside and the strengthening of links between communities and their surroundings. As well as ideas for looking at working and needs of communities and practical projects, it is trying to develop "a wider appreciation of the network of agencies and individuals involved in countryside care and how to build working relationships with them."

That is wise and practical, and it is the approach that the Government must urge on their agencies. However, these issues of conservation and development can be resolved only if a partnership approach is made unavoidable. That should involve not only farmers, conservationists and landowners sitting down together to work out policy approaches, but residents, local authorities, developers, development corporations and Government Departments.

That is too uncomfortable an interface to be achieved on a voluntary basis, except in the most unusual of circumstances because most of the groups mentioned will avoid the difficult bits of co-operation if they can, on the understandable and reasonable ground that they are too busy getting on with the job to spend the time, unless they are assured of proper results that will mean something to everybody involved, leading to coherent, long-term approaches to the countryside.

We look to the Secretary of State for an assurance that he will not take short cuts or easy ways so that development in the countryside looks dynamic, while ignoring the views and voices of everybody involved. That warning is necessary because the Government have gone down that road, and the experience of several urban development corporations in England proved the dangers that can arise if development is encouraged in isolation from the interests of the community.

In respect of the community and the responsibilities for the social infrastructure, I emphasise the importance of the health service to economic development. This has been stressed to me by people in mid-Wales when I have had discussions with them. There is evidence that it is a consideration for firms considering relocation. Mid-Wales has the hospital at Bronglais in Aberystwyth, and certain issues about the hospital service in the eastern part of mid-Wales need to be addressed. There are problems if people have to look over the border to England for their hospitals services, or to the extreme western po mid-Wales, Aberystwyth, for their treatment. T especially true when treatment has to be o considerable time, and that is again related to tra problems.

Community care is extremely important, and w be entering difficult times in this because of the dela implementation. These problems will hit urban area they will be writ large in rural areas becau communications and the demographic changes to several hon. Members have referred. Education, tr and public transport are all part of the pattern, underline the fact that the DBRW has a responsibil social development. The difficulty comes in how responsibility is discharged, and what finances w available to it. In a budget of nearly £20 million, the be a reduction in the statutory authority social gran the next few years.

It is interesting to contrast what happened in th year or two with what happened under the last L Government. The latest annual report, for 1988-89, Government publications, is a rather more document than its predecessors, but in it the cha refers to "improved social facilities that accompany and depe economic development."

Up to a point, that is true, but social facilities depend on economic development. As I have alread economic development depends on social infrastru The statement in the accounts reflects a pious cla business growth to be "supported by a corresponding growth in opportunities."

The board's social policy cannot match that aspi with the sums of money available. It is nonsense to s that the DBRW can compensate for the i Government policy.

Genuine social infrastructure work and the de ment of community facilities are needed, not just by of grants to the village halls and small comm facilities, but by means of help for the social infrastru Perhaps that should be from the work of Government agencies and perhaps it should be dev by the DBRW. Either way, it needs to be develo stress again the interdependency of policies for de ment and policies for society as a whole.

I contrast that with the first annual report whi presented to the then Secretary of State, my right ho learned Friend the Member for Aberavon (Mr. M which made strong reference to social development —much stronger than has been the case in subs reports. It said:

"The board's task is one of social as well as ec development."

The expenditure in that year was £250,000 in th year's part-year budget—very significant in comp with the £6 million which was the second year b when that element of the board's spending rose to £1 million, £996,941 in the first two years. The despite the growth in the budget, there has been a r and a cut in the percentage of the budget in respect social and social infrastructure responsibilities DBRW.

In responding to my hon. Friend the Member fo and Deeside with a breakdown of where the financ go within the board's work, will the Secretary of St us how much will go to address the social infrastructure of the rural areas and where his other policies will pull in resources to that end?

Finally, I underline again that successive Conservative Governments have steadily eroded the planning system in Britain, which has particular importance in rural Wales. I appeal to the Secretary of State to take this opportunity to halt that process. Structure plans and local plans have been replaced by strategic guidance and unitary development plans. But the guidance is neither strategic nor particularly useful to local authorities seeking to reconcile the demands of their communities and wider regional and national priorities. It is not good enough for the Government to take a short-term view, following market demands and neglecting the important task of long-term planning.

I ask the Secretary of State to take this opportunity to avoid the worst of this by ensuring that the DBRW takes a co-operative approach in which development is sensitive to the community and to the environment, and to give us an assurance that the Government's resources and the policies that he operates in the Welsh Office will complement community development as a whole as well as seeking new jobs for the rural communities of Wales.

10.42 pm

Mr. David Hunt: This has been an interesting debate with some excellent contributions. I think that we have had nine speeches and several interventions, and we have covered a lot of ground. We have managed to cover care in the community and the health service as well as education, social services and all the other aspects of life in Wales.

But our prime purpose has been the DBRW, and one thing that has come across—I am delighted that it has—is the respect and admiration that we all have for the work of all those involved in the board and the illustrious predecessors of Glyn Davies in Leslie Morgan and the late Emrys Roberts. A number of tributes have been paid and I thank hon. Members for their kind words about the board's work. We are proud of the tremendous commitment of all those involved.

The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) asked me about figures. With regard to the special rural action programme, the areas covered by the additional £1 million for that programme include, first, workshops and enterprise centres; secondly, enterprise stimulation, which includes local business expansion schemes, workshop promotion, training, branded farmgate shop schemes, practical research and work with schools and industry; and, thirdly, social, which includes community agents and special rural social development, with emphasis on improved quality of life and increased access to facilities. The precise allocations will be decided by the board according to the priorities that it determines.

The hon. Gentleman knows the way in which the board currently allocates its resources. One main area is running costs and salaries, fees and charges for professional services, computer and estate management, research, promotion and publicity—which amount to more than £5 million. Capital expenditure on land, factories and other construction amounts to £1·3 million in the current year. Construction and site works, particularly in respect of advanced factories, amounts to nearly £6 million. Grants to discretionary and public bodies, and cultural and welfare services total nearly £2 million.

The hon. Gentleman asked about the north-south link, and made what I like to think was an affectionate acknowledgement of the troubles that I am experiencing in travelling between north and south Wales. I pay tribute to my hon. Friend the Minister of State—and to his travels—and to the sharp focus that he has brought to the importance of making improvements all the time through imaginative schemes. Significant improvements have already been made to the A483 and the A470, and other schemes already under construction include the Llanidloes bypass and the Felinfach-Brecon bypass improvement, which will continue to upgrade those routes.

I pay tribute also to my hon. Friend the Member for Delyn (Mr. Raffan), who raised a number of important issues—one of which was mentioned by several other hon. Members. I refer to the synergy with the Welsh Development Agency. We are particularly fortunate that support for rural development is provided by my Department and a number of other public agencies under the wing of the Welsh Office, such as the WDA and Welsh tourist board, as well as the Development Board for Rural Wales.

The WDA recently published a policy document, entitled "Rural Prosperity", and the proposals detailed in that publication will help to achieve further improvements in the prosperity of, and quality of life in, those rural communities for which the WDA has responsibility. I make particular reference to the words of the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells). It is important to realise the seriousness with which the WDA takes its responsibilities for those parts of rural Wales for which it has particular obligations.

The creation of a rural affairs division in the WDA is a worthwhile and welcome development, and shows clearly that the agency is cognisant of the unique problems and challenges of rural areas. That innovation will help to provide the right impetus in holding back the drift of young people to the big cities, by providing them with high-quality jobs within their own communities.

Like the development board, the WDA will work closely with local authorities and local people in those initiatives. It is that synergy that will make such schemes successful. To ensure further success, I stress the need—as did my hon. Friend the Member for Delyn—for people and organisations, public and private, to work closely together. I am confident that that will be the case, which will ensure greater achievements.

My hon. Friend also mentioned Laura Ashley. If there are points that I am unable to cover in the time available, I shall of course respond in much more detail to hon. Members in correspondence.

My hon. Friend mentioned boundaries, as did the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North. Although as Secretary of State for Wales I have power, by virtue of section 1(2) of the main Act, to extend the board's boundaries, until now it has always been considered that it would not be right to do so. I recall that the issue was studied by the financial management review in 1986, and it concluded that any extension to the board's territory would merely dilute its efficiency and resources. We must always bear in mind how important it is to focus, and to have a focus. However, the question of extending the territory of the Development Board for Rural Wales is, and will be, kept under continual review, and I shall arrange for it to be reconsidered as part of the board's financial and management policy review in 1991.

[Mr. David Hunt]

The hon. Member for Newport, East (Mr. Hughes) raised some important issues, and quoted a number of important statistics. The only trouble was that they differed from some of the statistics that I quoted. Before I comment further on that, I should like time to reflect on the derivation of his statistics and to verify my own. I believe that mine were correct. He raised a number of important points, and I should like to respond to him in due course.

The hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) mentioned a problem which is hidden in the statistics—unemployed young people. That was a very important point. He also raised the question whether the Development Board for Rural Wales should have a more specific project for abattoir provision. I have spoken to the chairman of the board, and I know that it recognises the strategic importance of approved abattoirs come 1992. However, it has no current plans under way to develop an abattoir in mid-Wales. The hon. Gentleman referred to the application at Three Cocks, Brecon. That application for an integrated meat processing plant at Three Cocks was submitted by the DBRW in 1989. Subsequently it had to be withdrawn, as the landowner was unwilling to sell. I know that the board is willing to respond positively to any approach from an operator.

The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas) asked about the future of the DBRW. We should not bring forward this legislation if it were not clear that the board has a future, and there are no plans whatsoever to alter the present statutory arrangements for the agencies in Wales. They are doing an excellent job. Very committed people operate within them, and I see no reason to disturb the arrangements. However, I hope that he recognises that it is necessary continually to review their functioning and operation to ensure that they deliver an efficient and effective service within their remit.

As for the nuclear power station, the problem is several years away, but the north-west Wales training and enterprise council is already starting exploratory discussions with the industry about possible retraining of workers, and I think that that is a proper way to deal with the matter.

I have to tell the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North that I know that the DBRW recognises that its remit does not cover agriculture, because that is a matter for the Department of Agriculture within the Welsh Office. However, the role of agriculture is significant in a rural area such as ours. The board has told me that it seeks to build other businesses to help to ensure alternative jobs for those who might previously have formed the agricultural work force. I am reassured that the board is intensifying and focusing its efforts to find ways of adding value to existing agricultural production and to funding alternative work.

The hon. Member for Wrexham (Dr. Marek) made several points about railways and rail links. I am not going to duck out of answering his points, but I shall arrange for them to be brought to the attention of those specifically involved and my right hon. and learned Friend the new Secretary of State for Transport.

The hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conw my hon. Friend the Member for Delyn spoke of Lamb Enterprise. As I said yesterday at the winter is important for the industry to support Welsh Enterprise and for all farmers to pay the levy. I hop the initiatives that we have announced will enable focus in a more specific way, particularly at interna fairs, on the quality of Welsh produce and to get acro clear message that if one buys Welsh food and pro one buys quality. Quality means a great deal in to markets.

The hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth Michael) made a series of points. I am not sure t would be a good idea to answer all of them now, but deal with a couple. I recently met representatives Wales tourist board and the issue of the marina group was raised. As the hon. Gentleman will kno May 1989 the Wales tourist board, with the Development Agency, set up the marina review grou as some would prefer it to be known, the ha redevelopment review group. It included representati the WDA, the Countryside Commission, the N Conservancy Council, the Sports Council for Wale
National Rivers Authority, the national park autho the Council of Welsh Districts and the Assembly—I that word to the hon. Member for Ceredigion Pembroke, North—of Welsh Counties.

On reading the list of bodies involved, one might little troubled about whether agreement would be rea because many interests are represented. I am aware t is proving difficult to come up with a policy th acceptable to all the participating bodies. That is a n for the group members. I have made the members Wales tourist board aware that I await the outcome group's deliberations with great interest. Obvious would like some form of agreement to be reached.

Mr. Michael: Will the Secretary of State reassure Does he agree that it is important for the develop bodies to participate fully and to reconcile the intere development, conservation and the other bodies to he referred? I accept that perfection is difficult to ac but the process needs all the organisations to engage attempt to find an appropriate way forward.

Mr. Hunt: I dare say that if I were to receive a n somewhere, it would tell me to be extremely careful how I respond. I have planning responsibilities that I to exercise in a quasi-judicial capacity. When w talking about a set of strategic policy principles on m developments in Wales, I must be careful. As I said, matter for the group members, but I await the result deliberations with great interest.

On social policy, I agree with several of the comm of the hon. Member for Cardiff, South and Penarth. I examines the purpose of a Development Board for Wales and the Welsh Development Agency, one sees it is vital to seek every possible way of strengthe communities. If we allow communities to weaken, it pressure on all the infrasture, social and otherwise. T why social policy is important. I reassure the Gentleman that when I consider overall policy I shall his comments in mind.

A range of issues has been raised in the context of an important Bill that extends the limit for the Development Board for Rural Wales, and I commend its proposals to the House.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Committee of the whole House.—[Mr. David Hunt.]

DEVELOPMENT BOARD FOR RURAL WALES BILL [MONEY]

Queen's Recommendation having been signified—

Resolved,

That, for the purposes of any Act resulting from the Development Board for Rural Wales Bill, it is expedient to authorise any payment out of money provided by Parliament, the National Loans Fund or the Consolidated Fund resulting from the increase to £175 million of the limit specified in section 12 of the Development of Rural Wales Act 1976.—[Mr. David Hunt.]

Tobacco Products (Advertising)

11 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 6071/90 on the advertising of tobacco products and the supplementary explanatory memoranda submitted by the Department of Health on 19 July 1990 and 26th October 1990.

The document proposes a system of statutory regulation of tobacco advertising in the press and on poster displays. The formal proposal was set out by the Commission in a draft directive published on 26 April, the main contents of which would achieve three purposes: first, it would require, by law, that all advertisements in the press and on posters should contain a health warning; secondly, it prescribes in article 3 that the content of the advertisement should simply be a representation of the package of the tobacco product; and, thirdly, it would require, again by law, that no tobacco advertisement should appear in a publication designed for distribution to a readership of under-18s.

Since the original directive was tabled by the Commission, some amendments have been proposed, particularly to article 3, which specifies that an advertisement could take the form of only a representation of a cigarette package. The effect of the amendments were described in the supplementary explanatory memorandum dated 26 October which was issued by my noble Friend Baroness Hooper.

I should like to give the House a few more details of the revised approach, which is now proposed on an informal basis, to the type of advertisement that would be allowed under the proposed formulation. The revised draft—it is not yet an official proposal from the Commission, which is why it has not been presented formally to the House—would require that advertising should comply with the following rules: first, that it should not be aimed specifically at young people nor depicit heroes, personalities or situations likely to attract young people; secondly, it should not link the consumption of tobacco products with physical prowess; thirdly, it should not create the impression that the consumption of tobacco products contributes to social or sexual success; fourthly, it should not claim that tobacco products have therapeutic qualities or that tobacco is a stimulant, a sedative or a means of resolving personal conflicts; fifthly, it should not present abstinence or a desire to stop or moderate the consumption of tobacco products in a negative light; and, sixthly, it should not place emphasis on tar or nicotine content as being a positive quality of the product.

Those regulations would replace the requirement in the original draft that a tobacco advertisment could take the form of only a representation of the cigarette package. If the Commission tabled that alternative formulation of article 3, the revised draft directive would much more closely correspond with the approach of our voluntary code on tobacco advertising.

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): I hesitate to interrupt my hon. Friend because I am sure that we realise the significance of his points about the way in which advertising should be presented. Does he agree with me about the fundamental flaw in the original and the amended drafts? It is not so much the question of how advertising should be presented in different c the fact that it is nonsense to suggest harmo advertising when the ownership and operation companies varies from a free enterprise econo country to a Government monopoly in anothe

Mr. Dorrell: I entirely agree with my hon shall deal with that specific point later. I have de amendment to the original draft directive v expected the Commission may be willing to tabl move from a system of regulation based on des type of advertisement that is acceptable towar of describing the type of advertisement unacceptable, which more closely correspond voluntary code. To the extent that the revise article 3 brings the draft more closely into lin voluntary code, we regard it is an improve substantial objections to the Commission's remain.

The first objection to the Commission's a simple and is based on the Government's doub basis on which the Commission is introd proposal. One need not be committed to any ask, if someone wishes to impose a new oblig restrict an activity, on what legal authority that is being introduced. The Commission claim directive is being introduced on the basis of arti the treaty, which is directed towards removing trade and the completion of the internal mark

I do not believe that the Commission can maintain the argument that the directive is base 100A and can be justified on those terms. Th bogus for two reasons. First, even if the c accepted and implemented throughout the C we will not have created an internal market wit rules in force throughout the Community. Th specifically envisages the possibility of two regimes governing tobacco advertising—the po a ban in some countries and regulations that directive in others. It would not create an intern On that basis alone, the Commission's claim to directive under article 100A fails.

Secondly, one must be pragmatic and ask w Commission can justify introducing a direc article 100A to remove barriers to trade in te improvement in trade that would follow. We about a directive which is designed to remove barrier to trade in the printed word. To j approach, the Commission would have to show was an existing barrier to trade, based o advertising practices covering tobacco product

I do not believe that the Commission could that is a significant inhibition on the trade journals. The United Kingdom press circulate Italy, although there is in force in Italy a total advertising of tobacco products. It is not a inhibition of trade in the Community. Even convinced supporter of the Commission's appr recognise that by far the most important inh trade in the printed word is not different regimes, but the fact that most Community speak different languages from their neighbour think, therefore, that the Commission can proposal on the ground that it removes trade which is the only basis on which it can justify i the directive under article 100A.

I am forced to conclude that the real reason has nothing to do with removing trade barriers, and nothing to do with the substance of article 100A, but is connected with the Commission's ambitions relating to health and social policy. Let me explain why the Government do not accept its approach. First, the Commission clearly has no competence to direct any member state on issues of health and social policy: indeed, it has said explicitly that it embraces the principle that it calls subsidiarity, and recognises that health policy is properly a matter for national rather than Community decision-making. But even if we put that argument aside and consider the issue on its merits rather than the legalities, the Commission's approach to introducing statutory controls on tobacco advertising is misconceived. I believe that the evidence shows this country's voluntary arrangement to achieve health policy objectives more effectively.

One reason why our approach is more effective is that all the principles that would restrict the type of advertising that would be allowed under article 3 are already in force under our voluntary code, and we also apply additional restrictions. It would be impossible to design a statutory framework that would allow the introduction of such restrictions in the legalistic language that the statute requires. We have, for example, an agreement with the industry that poster advertising should be allowed only up to 50 per cent. of the 1980 level of spend. The industry has agreed to impose that restriction on itself; but I challenge anyone to frame it in language that would satisfy parliamentary draftsmen or, indeed, the House were it to be submitted as a legislative proposal.

In the same terms, our existing voluntary code restricts the right—that is, the industry voluntarily restricts its own right—to advertise tobacco near schools. Those are two examples of self-imposed restrictions that are not encompassed in the statutory code suggested by the Commission.

I do not want to rely entirely on assertion. Let us examine the record of the different approaches to tobacco advertising in the Community. I do not think that it is merely coincidence that the two Community countries that have achieved the biggest reduction in cigarette consumption over the period between 1975 and 1987 are two of the countries that tackle the problem with voluntary agreements. Over those 12 years, the United Kingdom experienced a 29 per cent reduction; the Netherlands, which also operates a voluntary agreement, experienced a reduction of 41 per cent.

That is the record of voluntary agreements. However, not one of the four countries of the Community which have imposed or proposed a ban on advertising or consumption recorded a fall in consumption. In all the four countries there was growth in consumption over the four years when we saw a 29 per cent. reduction and the Dutch saw one of 41 per cent. Over the same period consumption increased by 7 per cent. in Portugal, 5 per cent. in France, 8 per cent. in Italy and 11 per cent. in Spain. Track records do not support the assertion of those who suggest that the more heavy-handed legalistic approach is a more effective way of securing our health policy objectives.

As my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths) suggested, there is an interesting correlation between the four countries to which I have referred. Each one has imposed a ban on advertising, or proposes to do so, but each has an effective state monopoly of production. There is no local production that is not state-owned. The evidence shows that a total ban is ineffective, and the fact that such a ban is imposed or proposed only in countries where cigarette production is effectively a state monopoly must raise questions about the bona fides of the basis on which their Governments support a legalistic ban on advertising.

At the Council of Ministers meeting next Monday we shall oppose the proposals, even if they are submitted in their amended form. First, we do not believe that they can be justified as measures to liberalise trade. We do not accept that any inhibitions to trade arise from the printed word. We do not believe, therefore, that the Commission has competence to tell us, on health policy grounds, to introduce the restrictions. Leaving aside competence, we believe that the evidence demonstrates that we have been presented with an undesirable way of approaching the problem on health policy grounds.

11.18 pm

Ms. Harriet Harman (Peckham): The Minister's speech was disappointing, because it did not sound in any respect like one that should be made by a health Minister. We are, of course, dealing with an important issue of public health. The Minister said that one of the key considerations is the legal authority that the directive purports to introduce. Surely the key consideration is whether it is a good idea to restrict or even ban the advertising of tobacco. It is not one of constitutional niceties, which is what detained the Minister and concerned him throughout his speech.

The Minister referred to why other European countries support the measure and sought to pick holes in their records. I have two criticisms on that score. First, the question for us is whether it is a good idea to support the measure. Secondly, I question the relevance of relating advertising and smoking levels in a vacuum. Surely we should relate also price and health education, for example, which have an effect on the consumption of tobacco. I think that the Minister trivialised the complexity of the factors that bear on whether people smoke tobacco. It might have suited the Minister's case, but it is a pity that he began the debate on that basis.

This is not—or should not be—a party political matter. No doubt some Opposition Members disagree with our party policy on this matter and no doubt many Conservative Members who are waiting to speak will disagree with the Government's approach. The most important aspect of the directive is that it would replace the United Kingdom voluntary agreement with a legal system of controls. It does not go far enough, but it is a step in the right direction.

We need to move on from the constitutional niceties and remind ourselves of the background to the directive. The dangers of smoking have not always been known. One can go round hospitals and see people who are now terminally ill because they became addicted to smoking when tobacco was given out as part of their naval rations. One can also meet people with chronic bronchitis who remember being given a cigarette at the surgery by their general practitioner to help them to relax.

Although the dangers of smoking have not always been known, they are known now. The trouble is that public policy lags behind scientific knowledge and public opinion on this issue. Both smoking and non-smoking parents alike do not want their children to begin to smoke and 80 per cent. of those who currently smoke have tried to give up and would like to give up. I do not know who the Minister thinks that he is defending with his constitutional niceties except the tobacco industry——

[Ms. Harriet Harman]

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham) rose——

Ms. Harman: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will be seeking to catch your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker— [Interruption.] I shall give way, but it is against my better judgment.

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Lady speaks like a lawyer, as though only things that are written down in law work. Did she hear my hon. Friend the Minister say that cigarette smoking in this country has been declining faster than in at least four other Community countries? Did she hear his example of how the voluntary agreement led to a reduction in tobacco advertising rather more quickly than is likely to be the case with the directive? We must face up to the question whether we are talking about an effective reduction in both the promotion of cigarette smoking and the levels of cigarette smoking.

Ms. Harman: Yes, I heard what the Minister said, but the only factor that he seemed to be taking into account in comparing different countries' records in reducing the consumption of tobacco was the different ways in which they dealt with advertising. But there are many other variables. Advertising is only one piece of evidence and should not be taken in isolation.

We have nothing to be complacent about. Yes, we have reduced tobacco consumption and smoking in this country, but it is still an immense public health issue, a killer and a disabler. I do not want to hear Conservative Members saying how great our record is when our national health service hospitals are full of people who are disabled and dying because of smoking. I want to hear concern and to see some action, not complacent self-congratulation and criticisms of other countries because they are not doing as well as we are.

I should like to illustrate the way in which the scientific evidence has built up. A turning point came in 1962 when the Royal College of Physicians published its "Smoking and Health" report which, for the first time, surveyed the evidence. Its second report, "Smoking and Health Now", was published in 1971. In 1976 Professor Sir Richard Doll and Mr. Richard Peto published the results of their 20-year study of nearly 35,000 doctors' smoking habits. One of their major conclusions was that one in every three smokers will die as a direct result of smoking.

I hope that the Minister will bear with me as I run through the evidence; as he failed to put on the record the seriousness of the issue, I feel that I must do so, despite the lateness of the hour. In 1977, the third report of the Royal College of Physicians was entitled "Smoking or Health". It had become clear that one could either smoke or be healthy. The fourth report of the Royal College of Physicians, "Health or Smoking", introduced the question of coronary heart disease-related deaths and smoking, and stated that 20 per cent. of coronary heart disease deaths were related to smoking. In 1988 the fourth report of the Independent Scientific Committee on Smoking and Health —the Froggatt report—raised the question of passive smoking—people whose health suffered not because they were smokers themselves but because t people's smoke. It said that several hun annual total of lung cancer deaths in the could be attributed to passive smoking

The roll call of death and disability to see. I suggest that all hon. Membe oppose my view that the Government sh indeed, strengthen the directive should g hospitals. They should go into wards premature babies who are under wei mothers have smoked, bronchial wards an oxygen mask over their face becaus breathe, wards where people have had h people are waiting for the amputation having had the first leg amputated alre circulation problems caused by smokin should go to their local hospitals and see done. Then they should not rule out a help in the war against tobacco.

I shall run through the roll call of de in this country as a result of smoking people die prematurely every year from smoking. That is 300 every day. Smok about 50 million working days a year 75,000 people each year have heart a smoking. Some 320,000 people a year c about angina. Around 25 per cent. of t caused by smoking. That is 80,000 peopl by-pass operations performed each attributable to smoking. The total nu cancer cases in the United Kingdom in which figures are available was 30,345. A of lung cancer cases were caused by 27,310 new cases of lung cancer attribu
There is also the incidence of cancer of

The most recent figures for amput 5,780 amputations were performed, of due to peripheral vascular disease. Me accepts that 90 per cent. of peripheral caused by smoking. It is an individua person whose health suffers in that wa tragedy for the national health service b on its resources and represents a fail health policy. As I said, I went round while ago with a consultant. He recko per cent. of all the beds in the hospital people with smoking-related diseases position.

Of course, advertising controls are which affects the rate of smoking in any others. The Government have dragged the medical evidence and public opi advertising but health warnings, tax policy on children and smoking. The i one can distinguish between magazines children and those directed at adults household one can see an issue of Fas other children's magazine containing Against Tobacco" anti-smoking messag table, written in equally accessible langu or another magazine which is likel advertisement for cigarettes.

Mr. Dorrell: Is the hon. Lady saying that she is against the proposition that we should treat magazines directed at children as a special risk requiring special controls over and above the controls on the printed word generally?

Ms. Harman: No.

Mr. Dorrell: That is what she is saying.

Ms. Harman: Before the Minister jumps to conclusions about my answer, he should listen to me. This is a serious issue. I am saying that we should have a ban on tobacco advertising in all magazines. I accept, of course, that if one allows such advertising in magazines, it should at least be exempt from children's magazines. That solution, however, does not go far enough.

No cigarette advertising has been allowed on British television since 1965, yet 64 per cent. of children aged between nine and 15 claim to have seen such advertising on television. They are, of course, referring to sporting events and competitions that are sponsored by tobacco companies. Such sponsorship should cease.

Toy cars sold on street stalls have Marlboro written all over them. They are an exact replica of a sports car, a car which a child will recognise from television coverage. A child will play with such a toy and come to recognise the logo on the cigarette packet.

The tobacco industry spends more than £100 million a year on advertising alone, which does not include the sponsorship of sporting events, but such sponsorship is also advertising. Why else would the tobacco industry provide it? It does not do so out of the goodness of its heart, but because it knows that that sponsorship sells cigarettes. The Government spend about £5 million a year on anti-smoking education. It is ludicrous that the Government should spend taxpayers' money on such education while allowing the tobacco industry to spend £100 million on advertising.

All the leading national and international medical and health organisations that have studied the problem of smoking have called for a total ban, enforced through legislation, on the promotion of tobacco. I support that. Tobacco advertising undermines national, public health education—of course it does. The health education authorities recognise that.

It is important to cut out all tobacco advertising and promotion, because it influences people to smoke. The tobacco industry would not spend such large sums of money if that was not the end effect. Tobacco advertising is also one of the factors behind the uptake of smoking by children.

To allow advertisements for a product that kills one in four of its users is unethical. We now know about the death toll and therefore we have a moral obligation to ban tobacco advertising. Moreover, to promote the use of a product that has proved to be harmful to non-users as well as users is absolutely unjustifiable.

I am disappointed that the Under-Secretary has reiterated the point made by his colleague in the Department who said:

"The UK Government continues to believe that the best way to control tobacco advertising is by means of voluntary agreements."

What absolute nonsense. The evidence produced by the Under-Secretary is bogus, paper thin and designed to suit his case. No one agrees with him except the tobacco industry. He should appreciate that his stand is opposite to that held by all public health organisations, including World Health Organisation, the medical profession health educators. He has some support, however—tha the tobacco industry. It is a sad day when a Mini responsible for health argues the case for that indus

Voluntary agreements have been abused by the toba industry and, by their very nature, they are subject to element of negotiation. The industry will never ag voluntarily to restrictions that would put it out of busin It will never agree to anything that seriously threatens sales. The Government go along with that, which irresponsible.

The scale of the tobacco problem and the determinat of the industry mean that we must have a tobacco con policy that is comprehensive and implemented legislation, not by negotiated voluntary agreements, are committed to that and urge that commitment on Government.

We also want a ban on tobacco advertising, the end of sports sponsorship by tobacco companies, promotion of wider use of non-smoking restrictions public places and the creation of a new right to smoke-free environment at work. There is strong evide from the past three decades that the single largest factor any variation in the consumption of tobacco is a change its real price, and the most powerful contribution reducing consumption would be a real increase in exc duty. Conversely, a fall in the value of excise duty is lia to undo any achievement in health education. The Briti Medical Association has been critical of the Governmen policy on tobacco, under which, although the excise du rose during the early 1980s, it has fallen 9 per cent. sin 1986 and is now about the same level as in the mid-196

Although we are discussing only one part of t problem of smoking—advertising—the next time that t Minister comes to the House he must give us a sense th the Department of Health has an anti-smoking strateg complete with target, and he wants to use advertising one of the weapons in that strategy. He must take t problem more seriously. It is no good wishing that peop would not smoke; we must have targets for a reduction smoking. Just as we must have defence indust diversification to save jobs, we must have tobacco indust diversification. We want not just to reduce the menace smoking, but totally eliminate it.

11.36 pm

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): I congratula my hon. Friend the Minister on his excellent exposition the Government's view. I am sorry that I interrupted hi because had I not done so he might have been even mo effective in putting forward the case, which complete demolished everything that the hon. Member for Peckha (Ms. Harman) had prepared to say. I do not know how th hon. Lady can call the official figures which the Minist gave bogus. If they were bogus, that would be a seriou matter, but they were obviously not bogus—the word tha the hon. Lady used. They simply did not accord with he previously held prejudices, and so she dismissed them.

The sweeping statement with which the hon. Lad opened her speech, by saying that we were discussing health matter, was also misleading. It is not only a healt matter, but an employment matter and, most of all, matter of political and legal freedom. We are decidin whether a directive from Europe is justified, whether would be effective if it were justified and, even if it were effective if it were justified and, even if it were effective, whether the difficulties involved would make it worth while for Her Majesty's Government to accept the principle.

[Mr. Peter Griffiths]

As the report clearly shows, we would need legislation to deal with the directive, and the moment we have legislation we lose the tobacco industry's voluntary co-operation. I am a non-smoker and so I have no remit for the tobacco industry, but I believe that we have something in this country that is extremely valuable—a dialogue and an agreement with the tobacco industry, which has shown itself able to respond to changed circumstances. The moment we introduce a rigid legislative framework, the tobacco industry, like any other industry faced with legislation, will operate closely and exactly within the parameters of the legislation.

Is the hon. Lady really suggesting that whenever circumstances change or there is a new idea in marketing we should change the legislation by taking it through the House? That would be hopelessly time-consuming and we would always be trailing after the event. The advantage of a voluntary agreement is flexibility, so that if a new situation arises the matter can be discussed.

I do not want to take up the hon. Lady's arguments about the merits of advertising or sponsorship, which are for another occasion. However, I emphasise what I said in my intervention, that it is unreasonable for countries that operate a state monopoly on tobacco products to seek to restrict the advertising system in countries that have a free market economy. The purpose of advertising in such an economy is entirely different from methods of promotion in countries with a state monopoly where there is probably no need for any advertising, even if the state were prepared to accept it.

Mr. Dorrell: The situation is even worse than my hon. Friend suggests. There must be a suspicion that the purpose of the advertising ban in the four countries that have a state monopoly on production is to keep out foreign competition.

Mr. Griffiths: My hon. Friend's comment is the key to the argument. We are debating the merits not of tobacco advertising but of a legislative framework instead of a voluntary agreement. It would be to our disadvantage to give up the good will between the Government and the tobacco industry by seeking to restrict sales to vulnerable groups. Such groups have a choice, but they need to be protected, especially at certain times such as during childhood.

No one is calling for advertising to be extended. In some countries there is an absolute ban on advertising while in others agreements such as ours with the tobacco industry might be more liberal. The directive's proposals do not go as far as some of our existing agreements. The directive contains no provision for a halfway stage because it seeks a total ban. We need to examine that carefully before reaching a decision on the issue. It is vital that we do not weaken our regime. I emphasise that I have no wish to see increased market penetration of cigarettes, and I certainly do not wish them to be sold to children or vulnerable people. The most effective way to deal with the problem is by devising a carefully pla agreement with the tobacco industry t to meet changing circumstances.

11.48 pm

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): I r tobacco on one side because it migl Waugh if I started to criticise smokers engage in drink driving. The last time at The Spectator parliamentarian of years ago. That lunch was held to invited, so I might be forgiven one sm I do so partly because the European learn to pursue effective matters and mightily provoked by the speech of t Peckham (Ms. Harman).

The hon. Lady constantly used th accompanied in the Chamber by a W not seem to be a great deal of in Opposition Members. Perhaps she th not be trusted to speak by herself Friends knew the sort of speech tha likely to make. I am surprised at the a Democrats.

I agree with the hon. Member for a serious health problem. The conse are appalling. It appals me even mo growth in smoking is among women. that advertising has been aimed speci has not—but that there is a false soph some of the hon. Lady's false argume to believe that smoking calms them do is supposed to calm people down, or other reasons to take up smoking.

People smoke for the same reason —it is socially acceptable. If we seri cutting the amount of tobacco that i realise that we shall not achieve t approach. It does not work. I do not place for the law, and I should no producers always to do the right thi That is not the way that life works. Bu Lady to bring in some facts occasio bringing in assertions, and when we issues she brings in individuals, effectively. That does not work when a further dramatic improvement in p

The European Commission must happening in the different countries what partnership is about.

I should like to see league tables groups, and how their smoking ha decreasing. That would provide a p would start to draw the attention of the fact that they are addicted. Most when they realise that they are addi think that they can give up whenev shall have to squeeze the tobacco sponsoring sport, and the sooner we that, the better. It will happen far fa we rely on directives.

My hon. Friend the Minister, in effective speeches, mentioned the matters. If monopoly suppliers of t out competition, it is unlikely to be sell fewer products. If the Labour party has not learnt that monopoly socialism should have gone out over the period when my right hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) was Prime Minister, it has not learnt much. The socialist Government of Spain has learnt far more from what Britain has done in the past 10 years than the hon. Member for Peckham has.

I hope that the Commission will start looking at the figures. Has it provided a league table of the amount of smoking per head in each country, or of the amount that smoking has dropped in each country? Has it learnt the lessons from the anti-drink-driving campaign in this country? I do not mind being associated with the reduction in road casualties for the rest of my parliamentary service. I remind the House of what we did. In 1986, we discovered that an estimated 2 million times a week, men drove after drinking above the legal limit. After two and a half years, that figure fell to 600,000. There had been a two thirds reduction with no change in the law, sentencing or enforcement and with a reduction in the amount of Government-funded advertising.

The change in the consumption of tobacco will not be so easy, because at least the drink suppliers were able to provide non-alcohol beers and low-alcohol beers. Sales of those went up from about £15 million a year to £250 million a year. That is worthwhile. It is important to monitor and find out how social groups are behaving, and we can move further on that.

Ms. Harman: I have all that information.

Mr. Bottomley: The hon. Lady did not use it. She asserted that what other countries have done, which appears to be worse than what we have done, should be substituted for our approach, which appears to have worked. She is right to emphasise that most people are not aware of the consequences of tobacco smoking.

We should devote the time that would otherwise be directed to debating the competence of the European Commission in this sector—it is fairly well established that it does not have competence—and whether, if it did have the competence, its approach was the right one, and it is clear that it is not, to raising the consciousness of people, especially those among whom tobacco consumption is rising, and the women who look to the hon. Lady as an example, or a role model. She should work with us in the non-political way for which she has asked to get those people to realise that smoking is a menace to society. Giving up smoking means that it will not kill. It sets children a good example. If parents do not want their children to smoke, the best thing is for parents not to smoke. That is the way to make dramatic progress.

In four or five years' time, experts from the Commission and other European countries may come to see how we have achieved better progress by ourselves in a way that can be copied by others. I hope that we will also have the humility to go to the other countries that have done better than us, such as the Netherlands, and find out what we can from them. That would be a far more effective process. It is likely to empty some of the hospital beds and reduce family distress rather faster than relying on a legalistic approach.

11.50 pm

Mr. Alan Amos (Hexham): The proposed directive is expected to enshrine into United Kingdom law the current voluntary agreement with the tobacco industry, or at least to enshrine some parts of that voluntary agreement. That so-called agreement is an embarrassment, having been put together by the Department of health and the tobacco industry behind closed doors in smoke-filled rooms.

It is only the industry and, almost apologetically, people in the Department of Health, who defend this method of controlling tobacco advertising as being effective. There are numerous examples of how the tobacco industry is able to bypass that agreement. We have only to look around us—in newspapers and on billboards—to see the portrayal of smoking as everything from macho and virile to chic and sophisticated. The image of the Marlboro cowboy is not dead.

As I understand it, the proposal would make it a matter of legislation that cigarette advertisements could not appeal to the young and link smoking with physical prowess or sex, or claim therapeutic qualities for smoking. The thought that those things could end up as matters for courts to decide—whether an advertisement for Marlboro that shows a black-clad, gun-toting motor cycle cop, astride his machine, a real example, suggests that smokers have more physical prowess—seems a long drawn-out nightmare. I am advised that the courts would not touch it and certainly would not wish to judge on such matters.

Even in the case of less clear breaches of the spirit of the rules, it is anathema for the Government to be officially blessing advertisements that present witty, clever images of smoking, the kind of images that win marketing awards for being so compelling. After all, images are what tobacco companies are all about. Tobacco companies are not selling smoking, they are selling an image of smoking. In enshrining the voluntary agreement in legislation, the Government would in effect be saying that it is legitimate to use such clever images.

The idea of putting the agreement into United Kingdom law would, therefore, only perpetuate an already discredited agreement with the tobacco industry. In fact, the directive itself is seriously flawed and, if introduced, would create a legislative limbo for tobacco advertising. In short, it would be bad law and it is extremely doubtful whether any court would be prepared to spend valuable time arguing whether the industry had broken the law.

The United Kingdom Government would therefore be entirely right to oppose the new directive, as other countries, such as Germany, and possibly the Netherlands, intend to do. I can quite understand the argument that any legislation on advertising is better than nothing at all because it breaks the mould of the voluntary agreement and makes further legislation—that is, a total ban—easier, and a total ban is something that all reasonable people must want, aim and work for.

However, there is no certainty that the current version of the European advertising proposal would bring the United Kingdom closer to a ban. Certainly, if it is bad law, as I believe it is, it would make a total ban more difficult and would enable the tobacco industry to say that it is difficult to enforce the law that we have, so we cannot dream of extending the law to a total ban. I would not want to give the tobacco industry another argument for doing nothing.

[Mr. Alan Amos]

The directive is intended to control permitted advertising, but, as I have said, in reality such a law would not be enforceable. The only real solution—I am sure you will agree Mr. Deputy Speaker, because you are a very reasonable man—is to do what the Royal College of Physicians, the British Medical Association and other medical authorities have called for—to end all forms of tobacco promotion.

A recent survey of the United Kingdom's top 300 advertisers found that even they were in favour of a total ban on tobacco advertising—62 per cent. agreed with that proposition. Such a ban must embrace not only the advertising we see in print and on billboards but the more pernicious promotion of tobacco through sports sponsorship.

Just how pernicious it is was shown recently by the publication of a report on tobacco sponsorship of televised sport by the Health Education Authority, "Beating the Ban: Tobacco advertisements on BBC TV—A threat to our children's future health," which I recommend every right hon. and hon. Member to read. The HEA is not a shady organisation but is part of a Government Department.

That report found that, although cigarette advertising on television has been banned since 1965, 64 per cent. of children between the ages of nine and 15 claimed to have seen cigarette advertising on television. They had, in fact, seen sports events sponsored by tobacco companies—cricket, snooker, motor racing, tennis, and so on. Surprisingly, all that coverage is on BBC television. In 1987, ITV companies formally decided not to televise tobacco-sponsored sporting events.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: I draw my hon. Friend's attention to the fact that only on BBC can those selling drink associate their alcohol with motor racing. I hope that those who read the report of this debate for the BBC will realise that the corporation ought to obey its guidelines—and certainly do nothing worse than ITV allows to advertisers.

Mr. Amos: My hon. Friend makes a very valid point. The HEA report concludes:

"The BBCTV coverage of tobacco-sponsored sport appears to be in breach of the letter or the spirit of the 1987 Voluntary Agreement or exploits defects in the Agreement."

It cites three apparent breaches on the agreement, and adds:

"These apparent breaches should be investigated by the Monitoring Committee and appropriate action taken."

It details another six breaches of the voluntary agreement, and remarks:

"Action should be taken by the Monitoring Committee to review these apparent defects. The BBC and the European Broadcasting Union should be asked to examine these matters, to avoid broadcasting channels being used to promote tobacco."

Most damning of all is this conclusion:

"The extent of broadcasting of tobacco promotion images appears to be increasing and needs to be curtailed in the interests of health. The impression remains that the tobacco companies effectively control the televising of these programmes, whose aim appears to be to use BBC airtime to sell cigarettes."

That goes to show how useless and irrelevant is COMATAS, the committee that is supposed to monitor tobacco advertising and sponsorship, but half of whose members are from the tobacco industry itself, and without whose permission no report may be published and nothing done. The committee is useless anyway, because the agreement is voluntary and the committee does not have to do anything about breaches of it—and does not. We need to redress the balance in favour of health. The tobacco companies have had it all their own way for far too long. How can we possibly hope to compete when the tobacco industry spends an estimated £117 million each year on direct advertising alone in promoting its deadly products, when all the Government spend on anti-smoking health education is a total of £5 million. We must follow the lead of our colleagues in Europe and throughout the world and go further than the proposed directive, by banning all forms of tobacco promotion.

So often people say that it cannot be done. Of course it can—it is done in the United States, Canada, Australia and New Zealand. We can also do it, if we are really serious about preventing 100,000 deaths each year, and saving more than £500 million of needless expenditure on NHS treatment.

I can do no better than to quote from the chairman of the Health Education Authority who was talking about the tobacco companies sponsorship of sporting events:

"The time has come to close this loophole in the regulatory machinery the Government has set up to protect children from tobacco promotion. This anomaly is damaging the Government's own laudable efforts to tackle the serious issue of children's smoking."

He goes on to mention the number of children who smoke, and says:

"there are disturbing signs that an earlier decline in smoking among children is not being maintained. This is why the Government, through the Health Education Authority, has just launched a five year programme to help children resist the pressures to smoke.

This programme is undermined by the promotion of cigarettes on the most powerful medium to which children are exposed. In surveys of children's attitudes to smoking, the sponsorship of sports and other events by cigarette companies is cited as evidence that the Government is not seriously concerned about the problem of smoking. 'If they really want to make us realise smoking is dangerous, why do they allow all this sponsorship' is a typical comment.

Children see things straight. We should be straight with them."

Please, let us be honest and go for a total ban. We can argue whether it is within the competence of Europe. We can have a ban without diktat from Europe. Whether this is the right directive to do it is a debating point. If we want a ban we could have a ban. We know the dangers of smoking. We know that people are influenced by advertising. That is why the industry goes in for so much sponsorship.

I sincerely believe that it is a great tragedy that we know the effects of smoking, but we are not doing enough to stop it. I urge my hon. Friend please to do something about it.

12.2 am

Mr. Dorrell: My hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Amos) is quite right to say that if we want a total ban we can have one, and I shall return to that issue later in my summary of the debate.

I think that there are probably two things that my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths), the hon. Member for Peckham (Ms. Harman) and I have in common. The first is that I suspect that all three of us are non smokers. Certainly, anyone who comes to see me in my office in the Department of Health will not be offered an ashtray. I have to tell my hon. Friend the Member for Mid-Worcestershire (Mr. Forth) that that is simply because I do not like the smell of cigarette smoke in my office, and if it is my office, I think that I am entitled to determine what the atmosphere is like.

Ms. Harman: That is power.

Mr. Dorrell: Yes, that is right.

The second thing that we have in common is that I think that we all agree that the substance of this directive is a health matter. Therefore, it is not anything to do with the removal of barriers to trade around the Community, as the Commission is seeking to argue. It seems to me that the House has united on that this evening. It is clear that this is a health matter, which should be considered on health grounds. It has nothing whatever to do with alleged barriers to trade. The House accepted without demur that this is a matter to be determined here, and not as a result of leadership by the European Commission. In my view, it is clearly outside the competence of the Community. It is a domestic matter, which should be decided here and has nothing to do with article 100A of the treaty of Rome. The House has demonstrated unity on that view.

Mr. Bottomley: Our hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) usually raises the question of competence and he is not in the Chamber. Is that the reason for unity?

Mr. Dorrell: I shall delight in pointing out to my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) that, even in his absence, we were able to agree on that aspect of this evening's debate.

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Perhaps he is waiting by his phone.

Mr. Dorrell: It might be a long wait.

Having established that it was a health matter, the hon. Member for Peckham went on to ask whether it was a good idea. It must have been a rhetorical question, because she answered it by saying, "Of course it is." The difficulty with that is that it is merely assertion, not argument. With respect, she did not address the facts. The facts, as I sought to present them to the House, are that cigarette consumption has fallen in countries that operate voluntary agreements on the model that I have sought to defend, and the countries that rely on legislative restrictions have done less well than we have. The countries that have done least well are those relying on a total ban. One has to approach this on the basis of the evidence. If one of our public health objectives is to reduce cigarette consumption, is not it relevant to look at the experience of different Community countries? If cigarette consumption has fallen fastest—as is the case—in countries that have observed voluntary agreements and has risen in countries that have or propose a total ban, should not that at least inform our debate?

Mr. Amos: Is my hon. Friend saying that where there is no advertising of tobacco products people are more likely to smoke and that where there is advertising under a voluntary agreement they are less likely to smoke? That is the logic of what he is saying.

Mr. Dorrell: I am quoting the experience of member states. In every country that has or proposes a total ban on cigarette advertising, cigarette consumption has risen. In countries that have a voluntary code on cigarette advertising, consumption has fallen by a significant margin. The House should bear that in mind when it addresses this issue.

My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North suggested that a voluntary agreement is preferable to a legislative framework of restriction on cigarette and tobacco advertising. As he rightly said, a voluntary agreement is, by its nature, more flexible. It makes it easier to insist that those who are governed by it observe the spirit rather than purely the legal letter of it. Perhaps even more significantly, as he said, it puts the onus much more on the industry to satisfy itself that it is observing the spirit of the agreement that it has signed rather than believing that if it merely satisfies the letter of the agreement it has discharged its social obligation. Although one or two hon. Members have sought to suggest that the voluntary code has not been fully observed, the committee set up to monitor the code has expressed itself satisfied that, by and large, the conditions are being observed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North also rightly pointed out that we should remember that the countries in the Community that have or proposed a total ban on cigarette advertising are the countries that have a state production monopoly. Four countries have or propose a ban and the same four countries have a state production monopoly. We should not simply dismiss that as a coincidence.

My hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) said that we should take seriously the public health objective of reducing cigarette consumption. He rightly pointed out that it is a women's health issue as well as a general public health issue because cigarette consumption is particularly concentrated in the female population. My hon. Friend is right to bring that fact to the House's attention. The Government take seriously the public health objective of reducing cigarette and tobacco consumption and the number of unnecessary deaths caused by it. We take seriously the need to draw to the attention of anyone contemplating using tobacco the health hazard that any smoker runs. That is an entirely legitimate objective of a Government in a free society. If we set ourselves an objective, we must surely require that we take effective action to meet it, not action that satisfies an untested assertion.

My hon. Friend the Member for Hexham (Mr. Amos) at least agreed with me that if the directive were accepted it would lead to bad and unenforceable law. He was therefore with me in opposing the directive at the Council of Ministers meeting next week. I am grateful for his support on that.

My hon. Friend argued the case for a total ban on cigarette advertising, which I do not accept. Evidence suggests that such a ban is not effective in reducing cigarette consumption and a total ban on advertising and sports sponsorship would lead to an ever more ingenious system of evasion and of bringing the brand names of cigarettes and smoking products into the public arena. It would not achieve the purpose of denying producers of smoking products access to brand recognition. If that is my hon. Friend's purpose, he cannot design a legislative ban that would achieve it.

I emphasise that the Government accept that public health education is a proper responsibility of a Government in a modern society. We take that seriously and we shall take the effective steps necessary to discharge it. In the context of tobacco advertising, that obligation is best discharged by a voluntary approach that limits the scale of tobaco advertising to an acceptable minimum. That is the approach that we have adopted and will continue to adopt, which is why we shall oppose the directive in the Council of Ministers next Monday.

[Mr. Dorrell]

Question put and agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Document No. 6071/90 on the advertising of tobacco products and the supplementary explanatory memoranda submitted by the Department of Health on 19th July 1990 and 26th October 1990.

WELSH GRAND COMMITTEE

Ordered,

That during the proceedings on the Matter of Education and Training in Wales, the Welsh Grand Committee have leave to sit twice on the first day on which it shall meet, and that, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order No. 88 (Meeting of standing committees), the second such sitting shall not commence before Four o'clock nor continue after the Committee has considered the matter for two hours at that sitting.—[Mr. Patnick.]

PETITION

Lowdham Grange

12.12 am

Mr. Andy Stewart (Sherwood): I wish to present a petition,

To the Honourable the Commons of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland in Parliament assembled. The Humble Petition of 4,300 residents of Nottingham and the Sherwood constituency

Sheweth

That the Prison Department propose to close part of the prison estate at Lowdham, Namely Lowdham Grange. Wherefore, your Petitioners pray that your honourable House hold an enquiry into our case against closure.

To lie upon the Table.

NHS Industrial Tribunals

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Patnick.]

12.13 am

Mr. D. N. Campbell-Savours (Workington): Industrial tribunals were originally set up to provide a procedure that was easily accessible, informal, speedy and inexpensive. In short, they are meant to provide cheap and easily understandable justice for workers wronged by employers. Unfortunately, the Government seem to have decided to run them down and to deny working people that justice.

Last year, applications to industrial tribunals increased by 10 per cent. This year, the increase is 32 per cent. That is not surprising, and it must be remembered that the vast majority of cases involve unfair dismissal claims—workers seeking compensation for dismissal or pursuing an employer for wages and redundancy money owed. A minority of cases concern sex or race discrimination and claims for equal pay. Thus it is hardly surprising that, as we enter a recession caused by the Government's economic incompetence, the caseloads should increase.

Why, in the light of that increased demand, did the Government set this year's budget allocation on the entirely unrealistic assumption that applications for cases would remain constant? Indeed, the Government's Employment Act 1990 creates the likelihood of some complex new claims arising out of the new law on refusal of employment on the grounds of union or non-union membership. It therefore clearly follows that, because of their own legislation, the Government are likely to have increased caseloads, yet they have allocated only a 3 per cent. increase in funding for the year. It is a familiar story of Government funding taking no account of demand for the service.

As a result of these inadequate allocations, the president of the industrial tribunals, Judge Sir David West-Russell, recently instructed regions which had overspent—that is all of them, except Nottingham—not to use part-time chairmen except in an emergency. As 40 per cent. of all cases are heard by part-time chairmen, we therefore face the prospect of a large backlog building up and those workers seeking justice facing the prospect of lengthy waits before their case is even taken to a first hearing.

Backlogs are currently worse in some areas than others. For example, although in my area there are currently few problems, in Southampton there has been a 40 per cent. reduction in workload which is expected to result in backlogs of six to 12 months for cases awaiting a first hearing. This horrendous prospect of delay will face the north-west region—my region—in due course, as it now faces Southampton. It will not be long before hon. Members throughout the north-west of England will begin to pick up cases and have to make representations to Government. It is merely a matter of time. How can the Minister reconcile the Government's action with the target set by the Department of Employment that 60 per cent. of applications should be heard within 12 weeks?

As you know, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I am sponsored by the Confederation of Health Service Employees, and I should make it clear that I receive no payments from the union, nor do I receive any out-of-pocket expenses. My union is extremely worried about these developments.

Let me give two examples involving health service workers who have been badly affected by the Government's penny-pinching. Enderby v. Frenchay health authority and the Secretary of State for Social Services is an equal value claim involving speech therapists. It commenced in February 1986. The case had made its way to the employment appeals tribunal by February 1989, where it has been held up, despite appeals by my hon. Friend the Member for Barking (Ms. Richardson) and the solicitors involved. Both were told that the delay was caused by insufficient funding of the employment appeals tribunal. Indeed, I am told that a delay of 15 to 18 months on appeal to the tribunal is not uncommon.

The other case concerns race discrimination. What has happened here will, I suspect, be an all-too-familiar story unless the Government fund the industrial tribunals adequately. This case was lodged with the London North industrial tribunal in April 1990 and listed for hearing in October. The night before the hearing the regional office of the industrial tribunals sent the following letter:

"I apologise for the late cancellation of your case. I write to explain the position.

In this Region there is now unavoidable delay between the time that the Originating Application is received and the date of hearing. There are two main reasons for this:

(1) In its budget for the current year the Region has insufficient funds to set up enough Tribunals to deal with the cases which are ready for hearing; in particular, I have been formally directed to restrict the use of part-time Chairmen. Therefore I have to limit the number of cases listed for hearing on any particular day to a number which can be dealt with by the full-time Chairmen but allowing for the possibility of pre-hearing settlements.

(2) There has been an increase in the number of applications to the Tribunals without a corresponding increase in funds for additional administrative staff to deal with the added workload. Therefore it takes longer for cases to be made ready for hearing.

(3) In addition to the problem of delay, it is sometimes necessary to cancel listed cases at very short notice. This occurs when there are fewer pre-hearing settlements than expected, and there is no Tribunal available to hear the case. In those circumstances, because of lack of funds, I cannot arrange for a part-time Chairman and additional Members to hear it . . . I apologise to the parties for the delay and inconvenience caused to them. You will understand that the circumstances are wholly beyond my control."

I wonder how the Minister can justify the sending of such correspondence. It is clearly an invasion of civil liberties. He may care to refer to that case when he replies, although I was not able to give him notice of it when I spoke to him today.

The TUC was also extremely worried about the underfunding of tribunals and made representations to the Secretary of State for Employment. Even he admitted that there was a problem, and allocated an extra £500,000 this year. However, the president of the Industrial Tribunals for England and Wales, Judge Sir David West-Russell, expressed the view that £500,000 was inadequate. On 19 October, he wrote to Norman Willis, general secretary of the TUC:

"I was naturally pleased that the Employment Department has been able to allocate an additional £500,000 to the Tribunal budget although this must be set against an overspend of £375,000 during the first six months of the current financial year. I am advised by the Secretary of Tribunals that, in the circumstances, we shall need more than this amount if we are to function normally for the remainder of the year. I am therefore continuing to press the Department for further funds in order to ensure that the resumption of full listing procedures can be maintained on a permanent basis."

The question is, will the Government respond positively to such pleas as

"we shall need more than this amount if we are to function normally for the remainder of the year"?

In another letter to Norman Willis, the Secretary of State for Employment also raised the problem. Replying to a letter from Mr. Willis, he wrote:

"The fact is that unlimited funds do not exist for the industrial tribunals any more than they do for any other activity financed by the public purse. That is why the President of the Industrial Tribunals in England and Wales, as a temporary measure, has asked regions which are overspent against their budget to use part-time chairmen for emergency cover only. It is inevitable that for the time being some people may have to wait a little longer for their cases to be heard. Of course I regret this. However, this temporary inconvenience must be set against the paramount need to control public expenditure across the board, which is a prime objective of Government. If we did not succeed in this, the consequences for the economy, and therefore for every one of us, would be very much more serious."

That letter contains an admission that delays exist—a letter in the hand of the Secretary of State. It is all very well for him to view such delays as unfortunate. For the individual workers involved, they can be disastrous. First, the wait is not "a little longer", as the Secretary of State has claimed; in some cases it is a year, 18 months or even longer. Moreover, the delays are likely to worsen without adequate funding of the tribunals. Secondly, in a case of unfair dismissal, a longer delay between dismissal and the hearing will reduce even the slim chance that reinstatement can be won and leave the victim without a job and any compensation, or the prospect of receiving any compensation within a sensible period.

Mr. M. A. Rick, the regional chairman of the Southampton tribunal, is of the opinion that delays will lead to higher awards because tribunals will have direct evidence of financial loss between dismissal and the tribunal's decision when it is finally made. That could lead to longer hearings as arguments about what mitigating steps applicants have taken will become more frequent and more complex. We have moved a long way from the quick and cheap justice that the tribunal system was established to provide.

I shall suggest where the necessary extra funds could be found. Last year, 31,956 people applied to industrial tribunals, and the budget was £9·92 million. In the same period, a mere 324 people contacted the so-called Commissioner for the Rights of Trade Union Members, whose job is to advise trade union members on how to sue their unions. I am sure that the Minister played a notable part in advancing arguments and impressing upon the Government the need to set up that organisation, judging by his reputation.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Eric Forth): The hon. Gentleman is besmirching me.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Hardly.

Only 70 per cent. of the 324 cases were relevant to the commissioner's duties and only one case ended up in court. The Government allocated £1·3 million to that office and the commissioner managed to spend only one fifth of that sum. Yet the same allocation has been made for this financial year. It is clear that a great deal of money is being wasted in that area. Some even argue that the organisation has no work and that valid cases are not coming forward. It seems that malcontents and troublemakers are wasting taxpayers' money. Perhaps it is a matter that the National Audit Office should be asked to examine. Even the Public Accounts Committee might wish to undertake an inquiry. It seems that the demand for industrial tribunals far outweighs the almost completely unused and unwanted service of the so-called commissioner. I suggest to the commissioner that she should shut up shop. Why do not the Government abolish the pointless office and use the considerable sum saved to ease the funding crisis that faces industrial tribunals? Is it the Government's priority to spend their time bashing campaigning unions which wish to defend the rights of their members while cutting the funds of tribunals that the same trade unions want to use in the defence of their memberships?

[Mr. Campbell-Savours]

The Secretary of State defended the proposed introduction of pre-hearing reviews and deposit orders following the expression of concern of the TUC's general secretary in his letter to the right hon. Gentleman. The Secretary of State explained that the proposals were designed to

"weed out ill-founded cases."

There must be a genuine concern, however, that the system would place an unreasonable element of doubt in the minds of any applicants who felt worried about their chances before a tribunal. It could even discourage them from making use of a tribunal regardless of the merits of their case.

What comments does the Minister have about that? If consistency in government is the name of the game, can he explain, given the failure rate of the Commissioner for the Rights of Trade Union Members, why the system of deposit orders is not extended to those who attempt to take cases against their own unions? Surely such orders should apply to both or neither. These are important issues in the classless society that the new Prime Minister believes that he can create before the end of the century. Natural justice must surely be of paramount importance.

12.29 am

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Employment (Mr. Eric Forth): I am grateful to the hon. Member for Workington (Mr. Campbell-Savours) for raising this important matter. I share the concern that he expressed about recent delays in industrial tribunal hearings. I welcome the opportunity to make it clear that the Government have taken steps to ensure that the industrial tribunals can continue to operate effectively and that delays are kept to a minimum.

It is obviously in the interests of all concerned—applicant, respondent and tribunal itself—for cases to come to a hearing quickly. That is why, as the hon. Gentleman said, the tribunals have as their target that 60 per cent. of cases should come to a first hearing within 12 weeks of the original application. The hon. Gentleman will recognise that this target represents a much faster performance than the ordinary courts normally achieve. That is why the industrial tribunals are so helpful in sorting out individual industrial relations problems. They can and do produce a quick solution to a problem which is usually acceptable to both parties. I pay tribute t work, day in, day out, in quietly sorting out proble avoiding damaging disputes.

Perhaps I could now sketch in the background recent problems which the hon. Gentleman has raised. They arose because of the great and unex surge in the number of applications to industrial tri in England and Wales over the past 12 months or s not want to get bogged down in statistics, but I mu a few figures to illustrate the problem that we face

From 1981 up to the 1988-89 financial year, the n of applications fell in every year except one. In 198 were just over 40,000 applications. In the financi 1987-88, there were fewer than 27,000 and in the fol year the number of applications fell still further to ju 26,000. In other words, there was a significar sustained long-term downward trend. Some reduction, but by no means all, was, of course, due fact that in 1985 we increased the qualifying peri making applications from one year to two years. B allowing for that change in the law, the caselo obviously falling significantly.

A few months into the financial year 1989-9 long-term downward trend was reversed and the n of applications started to rise. By the end of that fi year—1989-90—the annual total had reached over applications, a rise of 20 per cent. In the present fi year—1990-91—the number of applications has co to rise substantially. Up to the end of October, the already been over 21,000 applications, and on trends the annual total will have risen to about 37 the end of this financial year. That amounts to a increase of 20 per cent. over last year, which itself an increase of 20 per cent. over the previous year.

The reason for this sudden increase are still not clear—certainly not to us. Part of the increase, es in 1989-90, is due to an unexpectedly high num applications under the Wages Act 1986. But tha from the whole story. The great bulk of t applications—around 70 per cent.—concern dismissal and redundancy payments. Applications these jurisdictions have also increased substantiall

In the light of that, I turn now to the budgetary that the hon. Gentleman rightly raised. This year's for the Industrial Tribunals was, of course, draw early 1988 when the caseload was around 26,000 falling. Earlier this summer, it became clear president of the Industrial Tribunals for Engla Wales that, if the present trend of applications co the tribunal budget for 1990-91 would be overspe

The president therefore very properly decided keep within their budgets the tribunals must cut t of part-time chairmen, who are paid a daily fee f work. I should emphasise that this was the pre decision—not, as I think the hon. Gentleman m suggested, the Government's. That is how it shoul was not for the Government to tell the industrial t how to ensure that they keep within their budget, and remains very properly a matter for the presid

The president of the industrial tribunals therefo the industrial tribunal regional offices on 7 Aug part-time chairmen were to be used only in emer That was not an easy decision to take. It was clear to cause delays, since, on average, part-time chairm a quarter of all cases. It was also clear that it seriously affect performance in relation to the targets which I mentioned earlier and to which the hon. Gentleman referred.

But in my view it was a responsible and correct decision. Perhaps at this point I can pay tribute to the president of the Industrial Tribunals for England and Wales, His Honour Judge Sir David West-Russell. Sir David will retire at the end of the year having spent more than six years as president. He has been an excellent president and a tonic for the industrial tribunal system generally. We are sorry to see him go, but we look forward equally to working with his successor, Judge Timothy Lawrence.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: How can the Government possibly blame that gentleman for taking the decision that he had to take because the Government refused to give him adequate resources to ensure that everyone had a hearing within the target date? It was the responsibility not of that gentleman but of Government. I want to hear in the Minister's speech a commitment that all cases will be heard within the target time and that money will be made available to ensure just that.

Mr. Forth: I regret the hon. Gentleman's use of the word "blame". I tried to make clear that it was the responsibility of the president—which he correctly discharged—to ensure that, within the resources available at the time, correct decisions were made about how to administer the system. That was done. I shall come in a moment to the present position in response to what the hon. Gentleman said. I want to put it clearly on record that I do not accept the use of the term "blame". I have acknowledged that the president correctly discharged his responsibilities.

The decision to cut the part-time chairmen attracted some publicity, to which the hon. Gentleman referred. He also referred to the TUC's concern and the fact that there was an exchange of letters on the subject between Norman Willis, the general secretary of the TUC, and my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State.

The hon. Gentleman also referred to the difficulties caused by this decision and to the large number of NHS cases before industrial tribunals. He acknowledged his special interest in NHS matters. I do not deny those difficulties for one moment. Nor do I deny the difficulties in Southampton. They arose with particular acuteness in Southampton because that region makes more use of part-time chairmen to hear cases than do most other parts of the country. I know that the regional chairman in Southampton was especially worried about the situation.

But I am happy to tell the hon. Gentleman that those problems are now substantially over. At the same time as he took his decision about the use of part-time chairmen, the president naturally approached the Department of Employment to see whether additional funds could be made available to the tribunals. After careful consideration, the Government decided to make further funds available to the tribunals so that they could operate normally for the rest of the year. Those extra funds—amounting in total to some £750,000—have now been allocated. The hon. Gentleman will be pleased to hear that that has enabled the president of the industrial tribunals to review his decision about the use of part-time chairmen. He has decided—it is his decision—that it will be possible to use them again for hearings in the normal way. The tribunal regional offices were therefore told on 9 November that they could return to normal working.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: May I take it, therefore, that no longer will there be problems of backlogs, that any backlogs will be cleared and that perhaps from some date in the next few months all cases will be heard within the target date that the Government have set for the hearing of such cases?

Mr. Forth: I can certainly say that the resources now available to the tribunals are adequate for their needs and that the president is satisfied that the work of the tribunals can continue in the way that he would desire. The additional resources to which I referred are adequate to the needs of the moment. I shall come on to the future in a minute.

The main issue that we must explore is the need to make better and more effective forecasts of industrial tribunal applications—that is from where our difficulties have stemmed. As I tried to suggest, such forecasting is notoriously difficult. I doubt whether we can come up with anything that carried any certainty, but it is important to try to achieve it. Given the hon. Gentleman's interest in the matter, I should be happy to consider any suggestions that he has for making forecasting more effective in the current circumstances. I do not want the problems to recur.

I cannot say anything definite about next year's budget—because final decisions have yet to be reached about the detailed allocation resulting from the recent public expenditure settlement that my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister announced when he was Chancellor.

I believe that the concept of industrial tribunals as inexpensive, speedy and informal dispensers of justice is important. I want to do all that we can to preserve that concept. I am therefore grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising this matter and for giving me the chance to put on record the response that the Government have been able to make to the difficulties that arose.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Can the Minister assure me that he will keep under permanent review whether target dates are met in terms of hearings held in the target period? Will he ask for a report every three months from the chairmen? If at any time it appears likely that, due to increasing caseloads, a backlog may develop again, will he use his best endeavours to ensure that moneys are made available?

Mr. Forth: Given the lessons that we have learnt about the forecasting system and its inadequacies, and the experience gained from the president, I assure the hon. Gentleman that we are reviewing all the relevant parameters. We are attempting to ensure as best we can, within the limitations of the budgeting and forecasting system with which the Government are inevitably involved, that the problems will not recur. We are working closely with the president to ensure that the system works effectively.

[Mr. Forth]

We believe in the system of tribunals and we want to make them work properly. I am grateful to the hon. Gentleman for raising this matter again and strengthening my hand to deal with it as effectively as possible. I hope that he will accept that we are approaching it in t positive manner. Tonight's debate will benefit th of tribunals that we both value so highly becaus contribution that they make.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at eighteen minutes o'clock.

House of Commons

Thursday 29 November 1990

The House met at half-past Two o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

PRIVATE BUSINESS

BRITISH RAILWAYS (NO. 2) BILL (By Order)
Order for consideration, as amended, read.
To be considered on Thursday 6 December.

HEATHROW EXPRESS RAILWAY BILL [Lords] (By Order)
Order for Second Reading read.
To be read a Second time on Thursday 6 December.

Oral Answers to Questions

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Farm Subsidies

1. Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received about cuts in farm subsidies; and if he will make a statement.

The Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. John Gummer): I have received a large number of representations. Negotiations on GATT are due to be brought to a conclusion at a meeting in Brussels next week; my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry and I will attend.

Mr. Thurnham: Should not we be moving away from the kind of protectionism that the Opposition want, so that Europe's farmers become less dependent on the taxpayer and more sensitive to the needs of consumers, in the widest possible sense?

Mr. Gummer: The Community has already made a considerable offer to the GATT round, which will mean —over a period—a reduction of 30 per cent. in the support that we give. That, however, will have to be done at a pace that the farming industry can accommodate.

Mr. Campbell-Savours: Is not it true that the figure is not 30 per cent., but a net 15 per cent. from now, and that that in no way meets the demands of the Americans taking part in the GATT negotiations, who want 70 per cent? How does the right hon. Gentleman intend to ensure that a trade war does not break out after the conference that is due next week?

Mr. Gummer: I am hot in the House of Commons to meet the demands of the Americans; I am here to defend the interests of Britain, and the European Community of which we are part. If the hon. Gentleman wants to carry out GATT talks on the basis that we give in to mid-western American farmers instead of defending our own interests, it is a good job that it is not his party that is responsible for standing up for Britain, because it would not do so.

Sir Hector Monro: Does my right hon. Friend agree that the increase in the suckler cow subsidy, the advance payment on the sheep premium and the drop in interest rates have been a great help to livestock farmers? Nevertheless, we must accept that prices have been substantially down this autumn and that we have a long way to go to increase profitability.

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is entirely right. In relation to the less-favoured areas, I have done all that I can within the rules of the Community; but world price levels have none the less fallen, which means that our livestock farmers are having a very difficult time. We shall have to continue to look for ways in which we can help.

Dr. David Clark: Is the Minister not aware that it simply does not make sense to throw good money after bad to subsidise farmers? Will not he go to Europe and press for a fundamental reform of the common agricultural policy, using agri-environmental payments as the core of the policy, as advocated by the Labour party and all reputable conservation and farming lobbies?

Mr. Gummer: If the Labour party began by accepting that we do not "go to Europe", because we are already in Europe, its members might get the geography right before proceeding any further. It is that attitude to the rest of Europe which will make it impossible for us to obtain a reasonable arrangement on agriculture.

The hon. Gentleman knows very well that the present Government have obtained a better deal in Europe than any that Labour could possibly hope to obtain. Until he advances propositions that show some understanding of the common agricultural policy, he will continue to be listened to by no one, either in this country or in the rest of Europe.

Rev. Ian Paisley: Has the right hon. Gentleman seen the answer given to me last Thursday on this issue by his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland? Will he assure the farmers of Northern Ireland that their special interests will be kept in mind?

Mr. Gummer: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will agree that I have taken a particular interest in the needs of the farmers of Northern Ireland. I have met the Ulster Farmers Union and other farming interests and my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland keeps me very fully informed. I shall ensure that in the negotiations we do not forget the particular problems of Ulster.

Hill Farmers

2. Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what effect the recent agreement regarding subsidies to farming will have on small hill farmers.

3. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will make a statement on the present position of and future prospects for livestock farmers in the English uplands.

Mr. Gummer: Any agreement in GATT must provide the opportunity for continued support for farmers in less-favoured areas.

Ms. Armstrong: Is the Minister aware of the desperate plight of many hill farmers in Weardale and many other areas of my constituency who play a critical role in maintaining the enormous beauty of the area? What can he do to guarantee a future for them?

Mr. Gummer: I am sure that the hon. Lady will agree that I have already sought to do all that can be done to help the hill farmers of whom she speaks. I hope that she also agrees that I have sought to ensure that they get the extra and special help that they need. I hope, however, that the hon. Lady will mention to them the policies of her own party, which the recent independent report showed would be infinitely damaging to them and would mean a considerable loss in terms of their existing incomes.

Mr. Nicholson: May I pay tribute to the concern about this matter hitherto shown by my right hon. Friend, in contrast with the desultory interest shown by the Labour party, typified by the extraordinary gaffe a moment ago by the Labour spokesman on agriculture, the hon. Member for South Shields (Dr. Clark). I am sure that my right hon. Friend is aware of the problems faced by hill farmers in my constituency—those who farm on Exmoor, the Brendon hills, the Quantocks and the Blackdown hills. Will he do his best to bring forward the hill livestock compensatory allowance payments for 1991 to the earliest possible date?

Mr. Gummer: I assure my hon. Friend that I am still considering the information given to me on the hill livestock compensatory allowance. I shall make the announcement as soon as I possibly can. My hon. Friend was right to point out that, despite remarks of a constituency nature by Opposition Members, the Labour party's policies would very significantly reduce farmers' incomes, as the Savill report shows.

Mr. John D. Taylor: In view of yesterday's statement by the vice-president of the European Community that at the GATT talks he is prepared to negotiate subsidy reductions amounting to more than 30 per cent. if the Community agrees to reductions amounting to more than 30 per cent., will the Secretary of State bring the proposal back to the House for consideration before Her Majesty's Government approve it?

Mr. Gummer: Over the years, I have learnt that leaks during negotiations in Brussels or anywhere else are better not commented upon until we know the realities. I do not believe that the right hon. Gentleman has found me wanting in defending United Kingdom interests. I shall continue to do so.

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: Does my right hon. Friend agree that milk quotas have been an outstanding success in directing taxpayers' money throughout the EEC to the producers rather than to the storers and in preventing subsidies from going to exported surplus commodities? Why can he not see that the same system could be applied universally, thereby preventing the depopulation of the countryside without excess expense to the taxpayer?

Mr. Gummer: There are very grave difficulties about extending quotas to the whole of the agricultural industry. It would cause the end of the growth in new technology, a wholly quotaed system would remove the inter market and young people would be deterred fror agriculture. Moreover, agriculture would not cha would be extremely damaging and I certainly propose it.

Mr. Ron Davies: Does the Minister acknow particularly important role that hill livestock c ory allowances play in the uplands? Is he still al Council of Ministers in resisting the tiering of Does he not accept that if tiering were introduce prove to be a particularly effective method of support on the small upland family farms, whic in need of that help?

Mr. Gummer: Throughout my time as Minis shown interest in HLCAs and sought to use effectively as possible. Also, Britain has sough the HLCAs and has permission from the Com do that. I hope that we shall be able to sp elsewhere. The HLCAs are an essential way people in the hillsides to look after the land. Wit the land would not be properly cared for.

Small Farmers

4. Mr. Steen: To ask the Minister of A Fisheries and Food what proposals he has to pr farmers from unfair competition.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the M Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David C seek to ensure fair competition for all British f

Mr. Steen: It is not just hill farmers who difficulties. Livestock farmers in the lowland facing severe difficulties, many of them to th bankruptcy. Can my hon. Friend the Minister s to doing something about the cheap imports of eastern Europe which are coming through east That is having a terrible effect on the meat regi small lowland farmers. Also, will he look again because that may be a way of helping small farm with the most intolerable conditions?

Mr. Curry: I quite understand my hon concern about small farmers. As he will recall, to help them when we distributed the extra 1 p milk. We have to be careful, but any Community small farmers would stand precious little chance the United Kingdom, due to the different sizes. we look at all the options, particularly in th GATT, but there is a danger of prices being l that they are marooned above consumption and then have a new crisis. There is the problem of Kingdom being pinned down where it has a c advantage. We could do with more milk, but produce it, because of the quota system and major problem of young entrants. We are no meat coming into the United Kingdom Germany, but east Germany can circulate throughout the entire Community and we will e strongest supervision over that.

Mr. Geraint Howells: Does the Minister small hill farmers will not survive without fi from the Government? To restore confidenc Minister give an assurance that he will do his ensure that no further subsidy cuts will be made in the next four or five years? What immediate plans has he to help farmers in need?

Mr. Curry: I agree absolutely with the hon. Gentleman about the importance of the hill farmer. I agree also that the hill farmer will not survive without some support from the public purse. We have extended a large addition to the subsidy going to the beef and sheepmeat sector in particular. We keep the matter under review. We have a series of programmes relating to how we can help environmentally, but we cannot reverse what is happening in the marketplace. We will do our best to help and we recognise the importance of those producers.

Mr. Marland: As my hon. Friend is aware, many dairy farmers, both small and large, depend on the purchasing ability of the milk marketing board. Now that the future of the board is in the public domain, will my hon. Friend consider a role for it as a possible buyer of last resort for milk?

Mr. Curry: The future role of the milk marketing board is a matter for the board itself. We are anxious for the board to make proposals for the future of dairy marketing in the United Kingdom. There is no Government-prescribed plan for that. We are obviously discussing various options with it, but it is for the board to decide where it wants to go. It started the debate—not the Government—and now that it has been started it must be carried through to a sensible conclusion.

Research and Development

5. Mr. Murphy: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he last met the Institution of Professionals, Managers and Specialists to discuss the future of research and development.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food (Mr. David Maclean): December 1989 was the last occasion when the IPMS approached this Department on research and development and the matter was dealt with by correspondence.

Mr. Murphy: Does the Minister accept that public confidence in his Department was severely shaken by the closure of the Institute of Food Research in Bristol? How does he intend to restore public confidence in his Department when he intends to sack 40 food scientists at Norwich and Reading?

Mr. Maclean: Quite simply, by pointing out the full facts. Although Bristol closed, the laboratories at Norwich and Reading are being expanded and there are four other research associations. My Department operates labora tories at Weybridge, Torry and Weymouth. Seventy of the scientists who gave up their posts at Bristol will transfer to Bristol university and we shall increase research expenditure from £13 million to £17 million. Food safety research is being increased, not cut.

Mr. Conway: Does my hon. Friend agree that the level of research in this country is the envy of Europe?

Mr. Maclean: I do. For example, in respect of the jobs at Norwich which were mentioned, we are transferring the £750,000 that was being spent at that laboratory on near-market projects such as robotics, meat handling and processing, to diet and nutrition, health and safety salmonella, listeria and BSE research—which is the righ priority for Government.

Mr. Morley: The Minister's answer is not good enough In a written answer from his Department dated 2 October, he announced a cutback of 38 research projects Thirteen of them relate to fish refrigeration, shellfish smoking and safety. The Minister knows that the fishin industry is facing a crisis, so how does he expect it to pic up the vital research projects that he is cutting back thereby undermining the industry's viability?

Mr. Maclean: The hon. Gentleman misses the point Food safety research has increased from £13·2 million to £17·1 million this year. It is right that the taxpayers' money should be spent on basic, strategic and food safety research, and for the industry to concentrate on near-market projects involving food techniques and processing, which it is better able to understand and to fund.

Rhizomania

6. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what arrangements there are in place to monitor his Ministry's voluntary code of practice on protecting farms from rhizomania.

Mr. Curry: Our guidelines to civil engineering contractors on precautions against the spread of animal and plant diseases emphasise the need for the plant health and seeds inspectorate to be consulted from the planning stage of all major works affecting agricultural land.

Mr. Coombs: Given the appalling devastation that rhizomania can mean for sugar beet farmers, because the sterilisation of affected land can last for 25 years, will my hon. Friend listen sympathetically to the demands of the National Farmers Union, which is seeking a statutory system of compensation for consequential losses for growers of sugar beet affected by rhizomania and a code of practice to protect sugar beet farms from the coercion of contractors, in particular?

Mr. Curry: There is no provision for payment for consequential losses even in the animal sector, let alone the plant sector. If I were to suggest that such compensation would be likely to be introduced, I should be telling my hon. Friend something that is not the case. As to contractors, we plan to reissue our guidelines in the new year. A statutory basis would not make sense and would be bureaucratic and almost impossible to enforce—but we shall certainly be ready to intervene where there are difficulties. I am prepared to review the controls that we impose in respect of rhizomania, to ensure that, within the requirement to be absolutely strict about preventing the spread of the disease, we are as intelligent and flexible as possible.

Hill Farming

7. Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he next plans to meet representatives of the National Farmers Union to discuss British hill farming.

Mr. Gummer: I met representatives of the National Farmers Union on 23 October to discuss the economic conditions in the hills and uplands. I met other representatives of those areas yesterday.

Mr. Griffiths: The Minister mentioned in an earlier reply his defence of the hill livestock compensatory allowance. Can he explain why, since 1987, it has been cut by £12·5 million in real terms? When the Minister met NFU representatives, did he give any indication that he is thinking of restoring the value of the allowance in real terms, perhaps to the 1986 level, as that could prove vital to hill farmers?

Mr. Gummer: I have increased hill livestock compensatory amounts, as the Government have done on several occasions. The hon. Gentleman may like to explain to his hill farmers why the independent Savill report suggests that if Labour party policies were adopted there would be a 17 per cent. drop in the typical farmer's profitability.

Mr. Hunter: What is my right hon. Friend's reaction to the NFU's suggestion that the way forward for hill farming and, indeed, all United Kingdom farming is through the introduction of strict supply management?

Mr. Gummer: I do not believe that supply management is the answer to agriculture's problems. We need to get nearer the market, make our support more environmentally oriented and ensure that we do not overproduce. If we were to quota the whole of agriculture, we should do considerable harm to the industry.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: Given that the maintenance of the hill sector is particularly important to ensure the viability of our rural economy and given that in Scotland 90 per cent. of hill farming lies in the less-favoured areas, can the right hon. Gentleman tell us when he expects to be able to make a clear statement on the future level of HLCAs? Many of our farmers have reduced incomes because of a drop in the price of calves and lambs.

Mr. Gummer: As I said in answer to an earlier question, I shall make that announcement as soon as possible. I have already extended the suckler cow premium in the LFAs to the maximum amount available. A ewe supplement is to be paid to sheep farmers in the LFAs in 1991. The green pound devaluation will be effective from 7 January. Assistance to the beef and sheep sectors is now worth about £330 million more than in the previous year. There is already a considerable amount of extra help. We are certainly looking at the possibilities of what we should do in terms of the HLCAs, but much has already been done, as I believe that the hon. Lady would acknowledge.

Miss Emma Nicholson: I know that my right hon. Friend has the future of the small family farm in mind. With the freer markets that we expect from within——

Mr. Speaker: Order. The question is about hill farming. The next question is about family farms.

Miss Nicholson: I know that my right hon. Friend has the future of the small family hill farm in mind. Will he make an early statement on term tenancies, which may be the only way in which sons and daughters of small family hill farmers can enter this important industry?

Mr. Gummer: I have already made it c publish a paper on alternatives to deal with paper will protect the rights of present tena hope that we shall look for a radical chan so that more land comes forward for letti

Family Farms

8. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask t
Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if h statement on the financial position of present.

Mr. Curry: It is our policy to foster competitive farming industry and to ensu
viability.

Mr. Taylor: I am interested to hear t wants to foster an efficient and comp industry. Does he know how strongly fa the fact that, as the prices that they rece them uncompetitive and unviable and fon business, supermarket prices for the produce continue to climb? How is it that manage to preside over the worst of both

Mr. Curry: I thought that the hon. represents a party which is supposed to be market economics, would realise that if t of supply it is difficult for incomes to rise
However, we can try to help farmers to ov of their problems. They will do that competitive. That is our policy and th sensible way of going about it.

Mr. Boscawen: Will my right hon. Frie can to persuade the banks to be more towards some of our small farmers? W Government were in office, those farmers to produce all that they could at any co borrowing—in some cases, overborro banks.

Mr. Curry: In general terms, the level British farmers is about 25 per cent., so overborrowed. I recognise that some sm serious difficulties and that is why we try to them as quickly as possible so that we flow. I will bear in mind my hon. Friend' the banks could be helpful when they co cases.

Mr. Ieuan Wyn Jones: The Ministe family farms and the farmers in ther contribution to maintaining the fabric of one of the main problems resulting fr pressures facing them this year is that th very much under threat. What furthe Minister announce to enhance rural soci that that fabric is maintained into the n

Mr. Curry: I am perfectly aware of farmers play in maintaining rural l constituency has characteristics simil Gentleman's constituency. Governmen maintain farming family life as such, b that we give the necessary assistance, uplands farms, to enable them to get economic circumstances, which we all u

we are able to give further help, especially assistance to farmers who look after the environment as part of their food-producing function, we shall take the initiatives that are open to us.

Mr. Harris: Will my hon. Friend take it from me—and indeed from every hon. Member who represents a rural constituency—that this time round, the farming community and the National Farmers Union are not crying wolf when they speak about the real pressure on farming? My hon. Friend spoke about helping the environment. Will he and my right hon. Friend look sympathetically at the possible extension of the environmentally sensitive areas, especially for Penwith in my constituency?

Mr. Curry: We shall certainly examine the possibility of adding to our policies for helping environmental enhancement. We understand the NFU's point about farmers being in difficulties and our experience is that it would be foolish to deny it. However, I hope that the NFU will not say merely that the answer is yet another multiplication of public subsidy. That is not an answer. If the NFU comes up with sensible proposals that are costed, effective and targeted we shall listen.

Small Farmers

9. Mr. Pike: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what recent representations he has received from small farmers and hill farmers.

Mr. Gummer: I have received a number of representations about the position of small farms and of farms in the hills and uplands. I shall continue to keep the position under review.

Mr. Pike: Does not the Minister recognise that, despite his words this afternoon in reply to similar questions, small farmers and hill farmers will judge the Government not by their words but by their actions? The Minister may find it necessary in the next few weeks to visit Ribble Valley and the Trough of Bowland. If he looks at the balance sheets of the farmers in those areas, he will find that they are now receiving less in real terms for their livestock than they were receiving a few years ago and that they are facing bankruptcy. They expect action from the Government. When will they see it, or will they be allowed to go out of business?

Mr. Gummer: If the hon. Gentleman talks to those farmers, he will hear from them that the suckler cow premium has been increased to the maximum allowable in those areas; that is action. He will hear that this Government have brought forward the payment of the ewe premium both for the first and for the second instalment; that means action. He will hear that the Government have done so much for the livestock industry that they are now spending almost £800 million a year in support of that industry; that means action. The farmers will then turn to the hon. Gentleman and say that all that the Labour party speaks of is to reduce farm incomes by its policies. Labour's only action would be to cut incomes during these difficult times for farmers. The hon. Gentleman must not come to the House as poorly prepared as that.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: Although I warmly welcome my right hon. Friend's actions for those who farm in less-favoured areas, is not he concerned by the letters I have sent to him from members of the High Livestock Society, representing farmers in the villag Wildboarclough, Wincle, Langley, Rainow Kettleshulme? Those farmers are deepy concerned a their future. Does he accept that hill farmers are esse to the maintenance of the countryside, which is a matt great environmental importance?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend asks a constitue based question and shows that he understands his farn problems. His question stands in sharp contradistinc to the previous one.

My hon. Friend will know that I agree with entirely. Without farmers, the countryside will no cared for, and farmers need the support of societ enable them to look after the countryside. They canno it unless they earn enough to meet the costs.

Farm Subsidies

10. Mr. Allen: To ask the Minister of Agricult Fisheries and Food if he will list the progress made by Department in securing a reduction of the Europ Commission budget spent on agricultural subsidies s 1979; and if he will outline any current proposals wh the Government have for further reductions.

Mr. Gummer: We have had a sustained and progres reduction in the real level of agricultural support pr since 1984 and we are committed to achieving a sustai reduction in the level of support in the current GA negotiations.

Mr. Allen: I do not blame the Minister personally, a has not been in the job very long, but the Governm have had 11 years in which to reduce the level of subs and it still costs the average family about £15 a w throughout the year to sustain high food prices. Now t we have a Prime Minister——

Mr. Speaker: Order. What is the hon. Gentlema question?

Mr. Allen: We now have a Prime Minister who may less supportive of the United States, but will he continu guarantee that the position of the United States in seek freer trade in agricultural products will be sustained him and by the Government?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman's figures are utte wrong; they simply do not stand up. If there were subsidies, world food prices would rise considerably a the consumer would have to pay more. The £15 figure t he cited has no basis in any sensible fact. I note that supports United States farmers against United Kingd farmers. I hope that his hon. Friends will realise that would like to reduce farm incomes even further and I ho that farmers in constituencies round his will know exac how to vote when the time comes.

Mr. Riddick: Does my right hon. Friend agree th despite the so-called renegotiation under the previo Labour Government, the common agricultural policy w totally out of control when the Conservative party ca into government back in 1979? Does he agree that only t resolve and determination of this Government and of r right hon. Friend the former Prime Minister brought so sense into the bloated budget?

Mr. Gummer: The lovely countryside of Nottinghamshire would be destroyed if the policies supported by the hon. Member for Nottingham, North (Mr. Allen) were adopted.

Dr. David Clark: Will the Minister confirm that spending on agricultural surpluses has got out of hand? Will he confirm that there has been a 68-fold increase of skimmed milk powder, a fourfold increase of beef and a doubling of the amount of butter in intervention? Will he further confirm that he will have to spend an extra £1 billion in the next few years to support that? When will the Minister go to Brussels and start fighting for the British consumer?

Mr. Gummer: The hon. Gentleman betrays his lack of knowledge both of the common agricultural policy and of the negotiations that are taking place. This Government have fought more effectively than any previous Government for the British consumer and the British farmer and this Minister will continue to do that in the GATT round. It would help considerably if the Opposition would stop slagging off Britain and start supporting its farmers.

Mr. Gill: Does my right hon. Friend agree that, whatever form agricultural subsidies or support for the countryside may take in the future, it is vital that the regime should be universal in the Community so that we may have an open and fair market?

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is perfectly right. The Government are fighting for fairness among the countries of the European Community and between the Community and the other countries of the world. That is why I wish that the Opposition would stop promoting American interests and start supporting European interests.

Farm Incomes

11. Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what assessment he has made of the prospective future trends of farm incomes.

Mr. Gummer: It is not my practice to forecast future levels of farm incomes.

Mr. Davies: Will the Minister confirm that 80 per cent. of current farm subsidies go to the richest 20 per cent. of farmers? As the Minister is so anxious to reduce the overall level of farm subsidies, will he tell us what proposals he has to ensure the more equal distribution of the subsidies that will remain?

Mr. Gummer: The policies of this Government are to make sure that subsidies will continue to be paid on the basis of production, where they are production subsidies, and that other subsidies shall increasingly be paid for environmental purposes. [Interruption.] We are determined to make sure that British farmers get a fair share of those subsidies and that they are not distorted so as to help other countries disproportionately. [Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. I ask the House to listen to these questions. This is a rare opportunity and there are only six minutes before Prime Minister's Question Time.

Mr. John Greenway: Will my right hon. Friend confirm that the spirit of the agreement in the Agriculture Council with regard to the reduction of agricultural support in the GATT round relates only to support th and has not stopped the British Gover European member state Governmer environment? Does he agree that the p by 36,000 hectares of less-favoured ar boost? Will he announce soon exactl included so that farmers will receive e

Mr. Gummer: My hon. Friend is arrangements suggest that we will be a help that we are giving for environmer we reduce that which relates to pro there is still much to be fought becaus is proposing something that would en direct support and thus reduce the cost must stop that.

Mr. Beggs: Does the Minister agree ways of assisting farmers is to ensure th price for their product in the marketpla releasing surplus food from interventio Russian people at this time and there demand for British produce?

Mr. Gummer: I am not sure that the as the hon. Gentleman suggests. We are of ways of improving the market, but, i of the market will be upheld only if supp much more closely correlated.

Agriculture (Profitabil

12. Mr. Hunter: To ask the Minis Fisheries and Food if he will make a fu the current level of profitability in agriculture.

Mr. Gummer: Farming, particular sector, is going through a difficult time are determined to ensure its continued

Mr. Hunter: Will my right hon. opportunity to put firmly on record hi problems caused by a lack of profitabil House and United Kingdom farmers ultimate success of his strategy?

Mr. Gummer: I will reassure my h continue to stand extremely strongly farming community. I hope that, with r will pay tribute to the success of m Parliamentary Secretary in ensuring knacker industry is no longer stopped Community rules. It will remain as it is and thereafter there will be a review. T that the environment is protected becau job that that industry does.

Mr. Flynn: Does the Minister ag problem in British farming is the gulf b and subsidies and between the grain ba and their huge profits and the hill far elsewhere? Does he agree that the problems of hill farming is to red towards hill farmers?

Mr. Gummer: What the hon. G absolutely untrue. Our arable farmer considerable squeeze. Many of them difficult to make profits. Unless they are profitable, they, too, cannot look after the countryside. The hon. Gentleman does the farming industry no good by trying to drive a wedge between different kinds of farmers.

Milk Marketing Board

13. Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what representations he has received on the future of the milk marketing board.

Mr. Curry: I have received representations on this subject from a range of individuals and organisations representing milk producers, processors and consumers.

Mr. Bennett: Although I recognise that the present system cannot remain unreformed, will my hon. Friend bear in mind the position of small family farmers in far-flung areas such as Pembrokeshire, who fear that if the national system is broken up into as many as 30 different co-operatives, they will be seriously disadvantaged in relation to dairy manufacturers?

Mr. Curry: My hon. Friend is right, but the greatest threat to the small farmer would be to do absolutely nothing and wait for the scheme to collapse under the weight of its problems. The answer is to find a sensible alternative and to get a move on with it.

PRIME MINISTER

Engagements

Q1. Mr. Roger King: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for 29 November 1990. The first question to a great new Prime Minister, Sir.

The Prime Minister (Mr. John Major) rose——

Mr. Skinner: Resign!

The Prime Minister: Now wait a while.

This morning I presided at a meeting of the Cabinet and had meetings with ministerial colleagues and others. In addition to my duties in the House, I shall have further meetings later today.

This evening I shall attend a longstanding engagement in the constituency of my hon. Friend the Member for Altrincham and Sale (Sir F. Montgomery).

Mr. King: May I preface my question by asking——

Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: I think that it would be more helpful if the hon. Gentleman encompassed it.

Mr. King: In congratulating my right hon. Friend on becoming Prime Minister, may I assure him of the total and united support of my constituency and every constituency in the country?

May I draw my right hon. Friend's attention to the latest round of national health service cuts in the South Birmingham area—a cut of 17 per cent. in the past 15 months in the number of people awaiting an operation and a cut of 26 per cent. in the past five years in the same group? Will my right hon. Friend ensure that the national health service continues to make such cuts?

The Prime Minister: That is certainly the intention of our reforms, our management and our financing of the national health service. I congratulate South Birmingh health authority. It has made good use of the e resources that it had last year and I expect it to conti to do so in the future.

Mr. Kinnock rose——

Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am anxious to call as many h Members as possible.

Mr. Kinnock: May I offer my personal congratulati to the right hon. Gentleman on becoming Prime Minis As the right hon. Gentleman says that he was bounced i the poll tax, does he now intend to abolish it?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to the right h Gentleman for his welcome to the Dispatch Box. I l forward to our discussions over the forthcoming years. the community charge, I have made it perfectly clear w the position will be. We have decided that we shall l again to see what further refinements may be necessary ensure that the community charge is accepted through the country.

Mr. Kinnock: May I offer some help to the right h Gentleman—[HON. MEMBERS: "No."] It is well intend He could save himself a great deal of time and trouble a the British people a great deal of money by accept Labour party policy and abolishing the poll tax now.

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Secret of State for the Environment will take forward a v thorough, constructive and fundamental review of community charge. In doing so, he will take account of points made by my hon. Friends both north and south the Scottish border before we reach conclusions. On t side of the House we believe in examining matters bef reaching conclusions.

Mr. Kinnock: Everybody, including the right h Gentleman, knows that there is only one fundament efficient and fair thing to do with the poll tax and tha to scrap it.

The Prime Minister: The right hon. Gentleman forg the alternative, to which he has decided to return. Was i it he who, in 1980, said that "the most unjust of all taxes, local rates, take most from th who can afford least"?

Q2. Mr. Patrick Thompson: To ask the Prime Minis if he will list his official engagements for Thursday November.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the rep that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Thompson: Will my right hon. Friend accept t special congratulations and welcome that he will recei from East Anglian Members of Parliament and th constituents, particularly as he is an East Anglian Mem of Parliament, representing Huntingdon? Will he confi that shortly he will meet President Bush to discuss the G and other matters of common concern so as to contin the Government's correct policy on these issues?

The Prime Minister: I can certainly confirm that to m hon. Friend. The date has not yet been fixed, but I ho that it will be this side of Christmas.

Mr. Ashdown: May I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on his appointment as Britain's Prime Minister? The whole nation will wish him success in the difficult task ahead—[HON. MEMBERS: "Speak for yourself."] For the sake of the nation, we wish the right hon. Gentleman success.

If in two weeks' time at the intergovernmental conference all 11 of our European partners say that they can accept the right hon. Gentleman's hard ecu proposal, provided that he will accept that it could be used as a transitional mechanism towards a single currency, perhaps by the end of the decade, will he agree?

The Prime Minister: I am grateful to the right hon. Gentleman for his generous welcome, which I appreciate. There will be a wide range of matters to discuss at the intergovernmental conference and we need to discuss them with great care before we proceed. The Government's position on the imposition of a single currency is clear: it is not acceptable.

Mrs. Peacock: After the recent turmoil and my right hon. Friend's uniting of the party, does he agree that his objective of a classless society in the future will be better served by a Conservative Government led by him than by the socialism offered by the Labour party?

The Prime Minister: I am happy to agree entirely with my hon. Friend about that. We need to continue to build on what has been achieved in the past 11 years to make this an open society of opportunity. The Government propose to do that.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing: The Prime Minister in his recent meteoric rise has shown great dignity and pride in his humble origins. What priority will he now give to the problem of homelessness which he inherited from his predecessor? In particular, will he look at the issues of cardboard cities, people who live in damp homes and those who have no hope of a roof over their heads?

The Prime Minister: Everyone is entitled to dignity and pride. The Government's policies will endeavour to ensure that they can attain them.

Q3. Mr. Anthony Coombs: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 29 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Coombs: May I, too, welcome my right hon. Friend to the Dispatch Box?

Given the record rate of growth in the economy over the past 10 years, and as my right hon. Friend was the Chancellor of the Exchequer who relieved 6 million non-taxpayers of the need to pay tax on their savings at source, does he agree that the next decade of opportunity crucially depends on further tax reductions and further savings incentives of exactly the sort that have so reinvigorated the country in the past 10 years?

The Prime Minister: I assure my hon. Friend that I certainly favour further tax reductions when they are affordable and it is prudent to make them. I am extremely keen to see the growth of savings for two reasons: first, to provide the base from which the investment we need in the 1990s will come and, secondly, for the security and independence that savings give individuals and their families.

Mr. Blunkett: Earlier this week, the right hon. Gentleman's former boss, the right hon. Member for Blaby (Mr. Lawson), described the poll tax as unworkable and politically catastrophic, whereas his predecessor as Prime Minister said that we had already had a fundamental review of the poll tax. Which of those two conflicting opposites has the Prime Minister advised the new Secretary of State to adopt in the new fundamental review of the poll tax to which he referred earlier?

The Prime Minister: My right hon. Friend the Member for Finchley (Mrs. Thatcher) made it entirely clear on a number of occasions from this Dispatch Box that when any new charge of this sort was introduced, it would need to be kept under review. That is what we are doing.

Mr. Shersby: At the commencement of his Administration, will my right hon. Friend declare continuing support for the police in their difficult task of maintaining law and order?

The Prime Minister: The police do a magnificent job in this country, often in difficult circumstances. I have no hesitation whatever in assuring my hon. Friend that I have the greatest admiration for the way they behave.

Q4. Mr. Patchett: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 29 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer the hon. Gentleman to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Patchett: If, as the right hon. Gentleman says, he is his own man, may I ask him to say in what way his policies will differ from those of his predecessor?

The Prime Minister: I am my own man and on that basis I see no need to beat my chest and tell the hon. Gentleman. Let him wait and see what we do.

Q5. Mrs. Maureen Hicks: To ask the Prime Minister if he will list his official engagements for Thursday 29 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mrs. Hicks: I warmly welcome my right hon. Friend as Prime Minister. May I invite him to take some advice from a female colleague in relation to inner cities? Does he agree that to achieve his aim of a classless Britain, which is highly commendable, the Government need to give the highest priority to inner cities? Will he afford me the honour as soon as possible of coming to Wolverhampton and giving me the opportunity to demonstrate our success and illustrate the contraints of municipal socialism, which continues to deny choice and opportunity?

The Prime Minister: I find that an irresistible invitation. I am familiar with the problems of the inner cities. I regard them as a matter of great importance and I have no doubt that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment will bend his formidable energies to that problem.

Mr. Robert Hughes: With regard to the Prime Minister's desire for a classless society and social mobility, will he explain why there are no women in his Cabinet, or is the only woman in his Cabinet the back-seat driver?

The Prime Minister: In recent years, in all aspects of life in this country, women have been taking a higher profile: in the law, in commerce, in the civil service, in industry and in politics—[Interruption.]—and that will continue. As those women would wish it to be, they will reach the top on merit—[Interruption.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

The Prime Minister: Oh yes, and if the hon. Gentleman is patient, he will find women aplenty in top positions in my Government. Indeed, if he had waited awhile, perhaps even to the end of today, he would not have asked that question.

Q6. Mr. Gill: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list his official engagements for Thursday 29 November.

The Prime Minister: I refer my hon. Friend to the reply that I gave some moments ago.

Mr. Gill: I endorse the congratulations of my west midlands colleague, my hon. Friend the Member for Wolverhampton, North-East (Mrs. Hicks). My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister will know of the tremendous support that exists for him in the west midlands. When my right hon. Friend visits Ludlow next July, will he take time to visit the Lady Forester memorial hospital in Much Wenlock, where Mrs. Major was born? He will find local people working hard to take over the management of their local hospital for the benefit of the local community.

The Prime Minister: I am certainly looking forward to visiting Much Wenlock. It is true that my wife was born at that hospital, so I have a good reason for looking forward to visiting it.

Mr. Radice: As a member of the Select Committee on the Treasury and Civil Service, may I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman on becoming Prime Minister? Now that he is Prime Minister, can he say whether the British economy is in recession?

The Prime Minister: As I have told the hon. Gentleman in the past, if he takes the classic definition of recession, it is never possible to determine whether we are in a recession until after the figures are available. As I have told the House more than once, I expect a small downturn in output for a brief period, but we shall be back in a growth pattern during the passage of next year, with inflation well down.

Business of the House

3.31 pm

Dr. John Cunningham (Copeland): Will the Leader of the House state the business for next week?

The Lord President of the Council and Leader of the House of Commons (Mr. John MacGregor): The business of the House for next week will be as follows:

MONDAY 3 DECEMBER—Second Reading of Community Charges (Substitute Setting) Bill, followed by Second Reading of the Caravans (Standard Community Charge and Rating) Bill.

TUESDAY 4 DECEMBER—Motion to take note of EC documents relating to the 1991 EC budget. Details will be given in the Official Report.

Motion on the debts of Overseas Government (Determination of Relevant Percentage) Regulations.

The Chairman of Ways and Means will name opposed private business for consideration at seven o'clock.

WEDNESDAY 5 DECEMBER—Opposition Day (1st Allotted Day). There will be a debate on an Opposition motion entitled "The Abolition of the Poll Tax".

Motion relating to the National Health Service (Local Health Councils) (Scotland) Regulations.

THURSDAY 6 DECEMBER—There will be a debate on development in the European Community on a Government motion.

FRIDAY 7 DECEMBER—Private Members' motions.

MONDAY 10 DECEMBER—Second Reading of Atomic Weapons Establishment Bill.

[Tuesday 4 December

Relevant European Community documents

(a) COM(90) 121	Preliminary Draft Budget of the European Communities for 1991
(b) 8182/90	Draft General Budget of the European Communities for the Financial Year 1991
(c) 9865/90	The European Parliament's proposed amendments and modifications to the Draft Budget

Relevant Reports of European Legislation Committee
(a) HC 11-xxxi (1989-90), para 6
(b) HC 29-i (1990-91)
(c) No report.]

Dr. Cunningham: I congratulate the Leader of the House on maintaining his place in the Cabinet, and I look forward to working with him on matters pertaining to the House of Commons.

Has the Leader of the House seen the alarming reports in today's press about large scale redundancies in British Aerospace? If the sad reports are confirmed, and given the devastation to employment that the redundancies will cause, may we have an urgent statement next week from Ministers responsible for the aerospace industry?

Has the Leader of the House had the chance to reflect on the commitment made by his predecessor, the right hon. and learned Member for Surrey, East (Sir G. Howe), and the Prime Minister, when he was Chancellor of the Exchequer, that there would be a full day's debate this autumn on economic and monetary union before the intergovernmental conference? Are the Government now reneging on those commitments to the House and to the Treasury and Civil Service Select Committee? If not, when do the Government propose to provide the second day for that debate, since the debate next week is about political changes in the Community?

Finally, I urge the Leader of the House to discuss with the new Chief Whip the possibility that, when we table a motion to abolish the poll tax next Wednesday, his right hon. and hon. Friends may have a free vote.

Mr. MacGregor: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's remarks about co-operation on matters relating to the House of Commons. As I told him only a short while ago, I look forward to working with him on all matters relating to reforms and other issues of concern to the House, taking into account the various reports that we receive from various committees. I am grateful for his approach to these matters.

The hon. Gentleman's remarks about British Aerospace are a matter for the company. If there are changed market conditions, it is for the company to decide how to react to them. But I have noted what the hon. Gentleman says and I shall draw it to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State.

I am not sure that there was a specific commitment to a debate on European economic and monetary union, but if it is agreeable to Mr. Speaker it will be possible to refer to some of these matters in next Thursday's debate. I accept, however, that there should be a full day's debate on the subject; when it is held is a matter to be discussed through the usual channels.

I assure the hon. Gentleman that Conservative Members will be united in the position that they adopt in next Wednesday's debate.

Mr. Ian Bruce (Dorset, South): Has my right hon. Friend had a chance to speak to the Foreign Secretary about the tantalising thoughts that he expressed about reforming the business of the House if he were to become Prime Minister? While that is still fresh in his mind, may we begin to examine the timetabling and office accommodation of this place—and all the other aspects that make it an inefficient organisation and not an organisation for the 1990s?

Mr. MacGregor: I am aware of various reports on these matters. Progress is being made on accommodation; as my hon. Friend will know, Bridge street phase 1 is proceeding and I am keen that it should keep on target. A number of reports on matters concerning the House are before us at the moment and I am anxious to pursue them. The Government's position will be made clear in due course. The hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) and I are keen to ensure that we make progress on matters that are the responsibility of the House of Commons Commission as well. I cannot say whether it will be possible to reach agreement on all of them, but I intend to take them forward. I pay tribute, as I did in the Queen's Speech debate, to my predecessor for all that he did in the cause of House of Commons reform.

Mr. James Molyneaux (Lagan Valley): The Leader of the House will be aware that yesterday a Foreign Office Minister said that the Department was looking into reports of a speech made by the first secretary at the British embassy in Washington to a meeting in Boston in which he seemed to contradict at least five separate points of Government policies toward Northern Ireland. Will the right hon. Gentleman therefore ensure that there is a statement to the House, in view of the detrimental effects of that speech on confidence and on the prospects for investment by America?

Mr. MacGregor: I shall certainly look into the matter and discuss it with my right hon. Friend.

Mr. Robert Rhodes James (Cambridge): When will the Government announce the repeal of the Education (Student Loans) Act 1990?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend knows of my interest in these matters. I think that it will be a beneficial Act, so the answer, as far as I am concerned, is that it will not be.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): Will the Leader of the House take this opportunity to welcome the report published yesterday by Sir Robin Ibbs and to announce a debate on the welcome prospect of the House being able to take control of the building in which we work?

Tomorrow is St. Andrew's day and marks the publication by the Scottish constitutional convention of its blueprint for a Scottish Parliament, so will the right hon. Gentleman arrange for the new Secretary of State for Scotland to come to the House next week with his response, and to show a welcome change of heart by the Government? Without such a change of heart, his party's policy is liable to be the one that leads to the break-up of the United Kingdom.

Mr. MacGregor: I entirely reject the hon. Gentleman's second point, and I therefore see no need for a statement. I am grateful to him for drawing attention to the Ibbs report; because of other events this week, it did not receive much prominence in the press, and I hope that hon. Members on both sides of the House will read it and let us have their views. I think that it has important implications for the future administration and financing of the House, as I have already made clear in a written answer, and I hope that we shall be able to debate the report when the process is complete.

Mr. Robert Adley (Christchurch): Is my right hon. Friend aware that, as one of those who voted consistently against the community charge on Second and Third Reading of the legislation, I strongly welcome—as do many of my colleagues—the Government's new commitment to review the charge fundamentally?

Do not both my right hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) agree that the House should be able so to manage the politics of this country that we can find a method of local government finance that has nothing whatever to do with party politics and reaches across the political divide? Will my right hon. Friend at least give me an assurance that he will try to achieve that objective?

Mr. MacGregor: I see little chance of that; but my hon. Friend knows what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister has just said about further consideration of the community charge. He will also know that we have already spent a great deal of time reviewing the charge, and that measures are in the pipeline. There will be a number of opportunities to debate those matters next week.

Mr. Jack Ashley (Stoke-on-Trent, South): Will the Leader of the House tell us whether, with the change of Prime Minister, there is any change in the prospects of haemophiliacs who have contracted the AIDS virus through contaminated blood products in the national health service? Is this not a wonderful opportunity to end the legal battle and to seek a fair and honourable settlement? May we have a statement next week, please?

Mr. MacGregor: As I have told the House before, we have always accepted the strong moral argument in favour of the haemophiliacs, which is why we have made £34 million available for ex gratia payments and promised to keep that figure under review. I should stress again, however, that the Government do not accept liability, and will resist any settlement that implies admission of negligence.

Sir Alan Glyn (Windsor and Maidenhead): Following yesterday's statement about the Gulf, will my right hon. Friend give serious consideration to arranging a full-scale debate on that subject before Christmas?

Mr. MacGregor: As my hon. Friend has said, a statement was made in the House yesterday. I am sure that my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary would wish to come to the House in the event of any developments that required further statements or other methods of discussing the matter in the House.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): Will the Leader of the House ask the Secretary of State for Energy to make a statement about industrial relations in the coal mining industry? Is he aware that, since the end of the strike, the National Union of Mineworkers—which is the largest trade union in the mining industry—has been refused permission to negotiate with British Coal? If the Government are talking about equality of opportunity, surely it is high time that a directive was issued by the Secretary of State allowing negotiations to take place.

Mr. MacGregor: I do not think that that is a matter about which I should ask my right hon. Friend to make a statement next week.

Rev. Ian Paisley (Antrim, North): Further to the matter raised by the right hon. Member for Lagan Valley (Mr. Molyneaux), is the Leader of the House aware that the statement attributed to the first secretary to the British embassy was most damaging and has done great harm in the United Kingdom in relation to business investment in Northern Ireland? For the secretary to say that the Government were pushing the Fair Employment Agency to bring sacrificial lambs to the altar was an insult to every employer of labour in Northern Ireland.

Will the Leader of the House ensure that the Foreign Secretary makes a statement to the House on this vital subject?

Mr. MacGregor: I have not seen the statement so I do not know what was said and do not wish to comment on it. However, as I said earlier, I will discuss the matter with my right hon. Friend.

Ms. Mildred Gordon (Bow and Poplar): Will the Leader of the House set aside time at an early date for a full debate on the condition of the voluntary sector social services organisations? The Government are always praising them. This week, however, three groups—the Hornsey centre, which provides conductive training for children with cerebral palsy, the Royal National Institute for the Blind's braille service and Tower Hamlets advanced technological training centre, which does wonderful work in an area where there is 25 per cent. unemployment—are all in serious financial trouble. The latter organisation receives funding from the European social fund. As the regulations have been changed, the cheque has to be processed by the Department of Employment. It has already waited for 11 months but has still not received its money.

[Ms. Mildred Gordon]

Mr. MacGregor: The Government have constantly drawn attention to and supported the work of the voluntary sector. Moreover, there has been a substantial increase in funding for a large number of charitable bodies and voluntary sector organisations. Significant tax changes have also greatly increased the amount of money that flows from voluntary and corporate giving to the voluntary sector. Ours is a record of strong support in ways other than just making statements of support. We provide material support as well.

I know that there is a problem about braille. Nevertheless, having looked at the demand on resources that is faced by the Department which funds braille, and having taken into account the fact that the Royal National Institute for the Blind has been successful in raising funds, it did not seem to be a priority to continue to fund that operation as it had been funded in the past. There does not seem to be a case, therefore, for a debate on the subject next week.

Mr. Phillip Oppenheim (Amber Valley): Will my right hon. Friend do his utmost to ensure that we have a debate as soon as possible on a motion of confidence in the Government to tempt the Leader of the Opposition back to the Dispatch Box? Does my right hon. Friend agree that the more exposure the Leader of the Opposition gets the better it will be for Conservative Members? Does he not also agree that, judging by the looks on the faces of——

Mr. Speaker: Order. That is not the purpose of business questions.

Mr. MacGregor: I can see why my hon. Friend is tempted, but we recently held a debate of that kind which resulted in a resounding victory for the Government.

Mr. Dave Nellist (Coventry, South-East): I support the remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) about the need for a debate on British Aerospace's disgraceful announcement today of 4,500 redundancies. In that debate we ought to be able to question the Ministry of Defence on the need for alternative work and contracts so that defence workers do not have to pay the price of defence cuts. In preparation for such a debate, may I ask the Leader of the House to read an article in the last edition of the Sunday Times in which remarks were made by Professor Roland Smith, the chairman of British Aerospace? He said that, unless Government policies were changed, by the end of next year 10 per cent. of United Kingdom plc would be in receivership. Who is responsible for that—the former Prime Minister or the former Chancellor of the Exchequer?

Mr. MacGregor: I have already dealt with the business of the House on that matter, but I think that the hon. Gentleman is completely hypocritical in his approach to this matter. From the rumours that I have heard, it would appear that if there were to be changed market conditi they would relate to the fact that, with the ending of cold war, there was not need for the same degree expenditure on defence. That is the problem that will f the company, if it goes that way. Given all the h Gentleman's remarks about defence, he really cannot ha it both ways.

Mr. Nellist: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Gentleman must allow me to my bit in first.

Mr. Nellist: Policies can be hypocritical, not peopl

Mr. Speaker: Of course policies can be hypocritical, people; the hon. Gentleman is quite right. However, purpose of business questions is to ask the Leader of House whether he will consider making time available f week for a debate or for a statement. It is not the purp of business questions to make speeches that might be m if that debate were granted. It takes up a lot of time. [H MEMBERS: "Withdraw."] I am sure that the Leader of House did not call the hon. Member for Coven South-East (Mr. Nellist) a hypocrite.

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): He did.

Mr. Speaker: If he did, will the Leader of the Ho withdraw it, please?

Mr. MacGregor: I shall certainly withdraw on point. Perhaps I can phrase it more accurately: attitude policy can reveal hypocrisy.

Sir Dudley Smith (Warwick and Leamington): In v of developments in the Gulf crisis and further to remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Windsor Maidenhead (Sir A. Glyn), will my right hon. Fri guarantee time for a debate, when it is appropriate an things evolve, if only to allow hon. Members on both s to stand up and be counted?

Mr. MacGregor: We had better wait and see w happens. It will be a matter for discussion through usual channels, if the need arises.

Mr. Geoffrey Lofthouse (Pontefract and Castleford the Leader of the House aware of the negotiations tak place between Yorkshire Water and York health autho about the possibility of transferring pathology serv from the health authority to the water authority? Wi arrange for the Minister responsible to investigate that put an end to this crazy system? May we have a staten about it next week?

Mr. MacGregor: I am not sure about a statement, I shall draw the hon. Gentleman's remarks to the atten of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for He As the hon. Gentleman knows, if he wishes to bring issue before the House, there are other opportunitie doing so.

Mr. Ivor Stanbrook (Orpington): Will my right Friend look more urgently into the speech made by first secretary in Washington? It was reported in the Br press on Monday and I drew it to the attention of my hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary on the same day. If correct, surely it should have been the subject o immediate statement to the House because it represe change of Government policy. If it was not correct, it should have been disavowed immediately. Why has there been no action until now?

Mr. MacGregor: I have already explained the action I propose to take. In addition, I shall draw my hon. Friend's remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Foreign Secretary.

Mrs. Alice Mahon (Halifax): Will the Leader of the House allow time for a debate on the extraordinary lack of balance shown by the media during the past two or three weeks? Is he aware that night after night we have been bombarded with Tory Back-Bench Members, many of whom we have never seen before in the House? They have been able to make a three-week party political broadcast. The Leader of the House might think that his party was a recipient during that phase, but it is unhealthy in a democracy. It does not make for good debate when the Opposition are not even allowed to appear on television. In the interests of democracy, I should have thought that the Leader of the House would agree that we needed to look at the question of balance.

Mr. MacGregor: It is for the media to decide what they regard as important news events. If the hon. Lady feels so strongly about it, there is a remedy open to her.

Mr. Kenneth Hind (Lancashire, West): My right hon. Friend has been urged to announce a debate on the community charge. As one who voted for it, may I press him to do that? Clearly, as our new Prime Minister has said it needs to be looked at fundamentally, I am sure that many voters in the north of England would welcome an opportunity for it to be reconsidered.

Mr. MacGregor: My right hon. Friend the Prime Minister made our position clear this afternoon. We shall be spending two days next week debating community charge matters.

Mr. Bob Cryer (Bradford, South): May we have a statement next week on the serious condition of Polaris submarines? There are cracks in the cooling coils of the pressurised water reactors that operate them and they may be causing potential damage to the crew. In spite of a Ministry of Defence cover-up upstairs in Committee, we do not at present have a nuclear deterrent. As the Government are keen on supporting the United Nations these days, will they support the United Nations nuclear non-proliferation treaty, withdraw Polaris and scrap the Trident programme?

Mr. MacGregor: The hon. Gentleman knows that there is no question of that. Our view on submarines has been made clear. No submarine would be allowed to visit a civilian or a naval port or go to sea if it were considered unsafe to do so.

Mr. Michael Jack (Fylde): Further to my right hon. Friend's reply to the first question put to him by the hon. Member for Copeland (Dr. Cunningham) about British Aerospace, 6,500 of my constituents will be worried about the company's announcement on Monday; but they will recognise also that it must decide its commercial future. If a statement is thought appropriate, will my right hon. Friend ensure that it contains a full reference to the many billions of pounds that the Government have already spent with British Aerospace, the support they are giving to export contracts, and the context in which British Aerospace views its future in terms of Britain's future defence policy?

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend makes a number of relevant points, and they would certainly be for consideration in any statement or exchanges in the House.

Mrs. Gwyneth Dunwoody (Crewe and Nantwich): Will the Leader of the House find time next week for a statement on the enormous profits announced yesterday by the north-west water authorities, showing that they enjoyed a 667 per cent. increase in profits on the payments made by my constituents and others? Is it not disgraceful that taxpayers' money should be used to subsidise private companies in that way?

Mr. MacGregor: Consumers, shareholders and everyone else will benefit from the privatisation of the water industry, including from an environmental point of view.

Mrs. Dunwoody: But not consumers.

Mr. MacGregor: Consumers too; I made that clear. I see no likelihood of a statement being made on that subject next week.

Mr. David Porter (Waveney): In the light of the statement made yesterday by the European Commissioner responsible for fisheries that the EEC fishing fleet ought to be reduced by as much as 40 per cent., particularly in the North sea, will my right hon. Friend arrange for a statement to be made next week so that we may ascertain whether the British Government will move on the issue of decommissioning?

Mr. MacGregor: I understand my hon. Friend's concern. As he knows, I had ministerial responsibility for such matters for a number of years, and I well understand the situation. We are concerned about the decline in fish stocks, particularly in the North sea, and I am sure that my hon. Friend acknowledges that it is important to avoid overfishing. It is in the industry's long-term interests that that issue should be addressed.

We have taken the lead in the Community in pressing for improved conservation, and we understand that the Commission has just issued a communication identifying major problems in the Community fishing industry. However, we have no proposals yet, and that is relevant to whether or not there should be a statement next week. The Council of Fisheries Ministers will address the prospects for 1991 at a meeting on 19 December. Although the volume of fish landed this year is lower, its total value is higher. I cannot promise a statement next week, because it is important that we should have something to consider. Nevertheless, I agree that the House ought to debate the matter before the Council meeting on 19 December.

Mr. Greville Janner (Leicester, West): May we have an early debate on Leicestershire health authority's intolerable decision to stop supplying free incontinence aids to elderly people in residential homes? Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that that decision has been denounced by Leicestershire Members of Parliament of all parties? Although I fully understand the problems that confront the health authority as a result of the Government's wicked cuts in the county's health provision, does not the Leader of the House agree that its decision is mean, nasty and cruel?

Mr. MacGregor: We are already spending some £30 billion on the health service, and an additional £3 billion will be spent next year. There have been massive increases in health service funding in recent years, so I reject the hon. and learned Gentleman's overall charge.

As to the particular issue that he raised, I cannot promise a statement next week because it is fundamentally a matter for the health authority. However, as the hon. and learned Gentleman has just shown, there are other ways of raising the matter in the House.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): Is my right hon. Friend aware of the tragic event that occurred in my constituency when a 17-year-old girl died from overdrinking in an illegal drinking den, known as shabangs? Will he find time for the House to debate the prosecution of such clubs, even to the extent of confiscating the property that they occupy? It is difficult for the police to prosecute drinking dens because the proprietors move from place to place, but we must at long last get to grips with this problem.

Mr. MacGregor: I am very sorry to hear of the incident to which my hon. Friend refers. He will know that a Bill relevant to the points that he makes is to come before the House, and it may be appropriate to raise such issues during its Committee stage. Meanwhile, I shall certainly draw his remarks to the attention of my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, but I see no opportunity to debate that subject in Government time next week.

Mrs. Margaret Ewing (Moray): As there is to be a major debate next week on the poll tax, is it possible for the right hon. Gentleman to establish through the office of the Prime Minister, the Secretary of State for the Environment or the Secretary of State for Scotland exactly what refinements the Government have in mind? For example, will there be a facility for a 100 per cent. rebate? Surely it will be important in that debate for us to balance, if not the exact details, then the general thrust of the Government's policy on this matter against whatever variation on the rates to which the Labour party may be adhering at the moment and against the local income tax philosophy propounded by my party.

Mr. MacGregor: We have already announced several changes to the community charge, some of which still have to go through and require parliamentary action. We are taking action on two matters on Monday next week. If there are any further changes, I am sure that they will be announced at the appropriate time. Quite a lot of measures are already going through the House concerning a review of the community charge.

Mr. Rupert Allason (Torbay): When my right hon. Friend announced the business for next week, he omitted to mention a debate on tourism. Does he agree that such a debate is long overdue? Although many people, particularly those in my constituency, appreciate the greater weighting given to visitor bed nights in the new calculations for the standard spending assessment, does he not think that it is high time that we had such a debate? Will he assure the House that there will be a debate before the Christmas recess, bearing in mind that this important industry is now the largest earner of foreign currency for this country?

Mr. MacGregor: I agree with my hon. Friend abou industry's importance and the great successes that i had under the Government. There is a great de business for us to do between now and the Chris recess—next week's business shows that—and I canno any prospect of a debate on that subject in Govern time.

Mr. William O'Brien (Normanton): Will the Lead the House allow a discussion next week in Govern time on security and safety at Pinderfields general hos in my constituency? On Monday this week, two do were murdered in their office at the hospital. It w difficult to replace them, in their homes and in the se As my request for a statement could not be agreed to, we have a discussion on security and safety? If that ca take place in Government time, will the right Gentleman prevail upon the Secretary of State for H to make a statement to the House on the questi security and safety at Pinderfields general hospital?

Mr. MacGregor: I am sure that the whole House s my horror at what happened to the two consultant would wish to offer sincere sympathy to the relativ both. I cannot say that I can find time for a deb Government time next week on these matters. I shall to discuss with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of for Health whether a statement in that case wou appropriate. Of course, the hon. Gentleman knows there are other ways in which he can raise these ma

Mr. Harry Greenway (Ealing, North): May we h debate next week on housing finance so that the Hou consider the serious abuse of the housing budget b former Ealing Labour council which is forcing unwa ted rent increases on council tenants in Ealing? T happening because the Labour council totally abuse system, as has been proven. This matter should be br before the House so that such abuses by the Labour can be fully examined at local level in Ealing before is any danger from it at national level.

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend has made his effectively. I know that he will find other opportuni make it effectively at local level and national level a draw attention to any lessons that are to be learnt. I that the business of the House is pretty full next week I do not see much prospect of debating the matter

Mr. Derek Conway (Shrewsbury and Atcham): I Wednesday's debate, will my right hon. Friend h word with my right hon. Friend the Secretary of Sta the Environment and ask him to place in the Libr comparative chart showing, by local authority area spending this year as against last year and compa manpower levels? That will enable the House to s itself that the level and unpopularity of the comm charge are related to local government overmannin over expenditure, principally in areas such as Shro that are controlled by Labour councillors.

Mr. MacGregor: My hon. Friend makes a good The vast bulk of overspending takes place in Labou authorities. I will draw my hon. Friend's suggestion attention of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of St the Environment.

British Aerospace Factory, Preston

4.4 pm

Mrs. Audrey Wise (Preston): I beg to ask leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the projected closure of the major British Aerospace factory at Preston, with enormous job losses of the order of 4,500."

The matter is specific because it relates to one company which is of unique importance to the local economy of the Preston area. If the closure and the redundancies go ahead, it will put a specific blight on my area. Preston borough council calculates the local unemployment could rise from 8 per cent. to as much as 15 per cent. as a direct effect. In addition, there would be a massive indirect effect on many other jobs, including retailing and all the service sector.

The matter is important for all those reasons and for the message that is given about British manufacturing when the largest British manufacturing company resorts to closures and to redundancies. The company should instead ensure continued work by making a transition from an over-reliance on arms production to civil aircraft and to other peaceful products, and the Government should help it to do so. It is important that the end of the cold war should be seen as an opportunity to expand civil aircraft production, for example; it must not become a disaster for my area. The matter is also important because British Aerospace is a reservoir of skills which must not be dissipated.

The matter is urgent because the House should express a view immediately, before decisions become irrevocable. There is an urgent need for the Government, the company and the unions to come together to find a constructive way forward. The unions would do that, but will the company and the Government? Until now the Government have refused to accept any responsibility for reductions in defence employment. A debate would give them the chance to take a new direction, although it is probably over-optimistic to expect them to do so. For the people of Preston, this is a matter of the utmost urgency. They will expect this House to debate the matter immediately.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Member for Preston (Mrs. Wise) asks leave to move the Adjournment of the House, under Standing Order No. 20, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter that she believes should have urgent consideration, namely,

"the projected closure of the major British Aerospace factory at Preston, with enormous job losses of the order of 4,500."

As the hon. Lady knows, I have to consider the criteria of Standing Order No. 20. I have listened with care to what she has said, but I do not consider that the matter that she has raised is appropriate for discussion under Standing Order No. 20. I hope that she will have other opportunities to bring the matter before the House.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Ordered,

That the draft Misuse of Drugs Act 1971 (Modification) Order 1990 be referred to a Standing Committee on Statutory Instruments, &c.—[Mr. Chapman.]

Orders of the Day

Development Board for Rural Wales Bill

Considered in Committee.

Clause 1

INCREASE OF FINANCIAL LIMIT

4.9 pm

The Minister of State, Welsh Office (Sir Wyn Roberts): I beg to move, That the clause stand part of the Bill.

The purpose of this single-clause Bill is to raise the present financial limit of the Development Board for Rural Wales from £100 million to £175 million.

During our Second Reading debate last night, there appeared to be some confusion in hon. Member's minds about the precise meaning of the words "financial limit". The function of the financial limit is to limit the public funding of the board so that the scale and nature of its activities can be re-examined by Parliament at regular intervals. The limit has been increased on two occasions —most recently in 1981 to £100 million under section 2(3) of the Industry Act 1981, which amended section 12(2) of the Development of Rural Wales Act 1976.

I should explain that section 12(2) of the 1976 Act set a limit of £25 million. That was raised to £40 million in 1980 and increased to its current level of £100 million by the Industry Act 1981. The financial limit established by the 1981 Act has remained in place by virtue of the fact that some £33 million of the board's national loans fund debt, which at one time counted towards the limit, was written off in 1986. Similar action was taken at the same time in respect of the English new town authorities.

At the current rate of expenditure, the financial limit of £100 million will be reached during the financial year 1991-92. Board expenditure counted against this limit comprises grant in aid, housing subsidies, advances from the national loans fund and other borrowing to finance the board's activities.

When raising a financial limit, it is customary to provide an increase that should suffice for five years. We therefore propose to raise the DBRW's limit from £100 million to £175 million.

The Bill specifies a single new limit rather than a two-stage limit with power to implement the higher figure by affirmative order. The latter approach was adopted in the Development of Rural Wales Act 1976, but the Industry Act 1981 removed the higher limit in the 1976 Act on the ground that further financial needs should be provided for in primary legislation rather than by order. The Government regard it is desirable to maintain consistency in this matter.

The main activities of the board are to provide financial assistance to business in the form of grants and loans, to provide sites and premises for industry, to assist in the marketing of the area for tourism and industrial purposes and in product marketing, and to provide advisory services and training. Assistance is available to enterprise in the land, food, craft, manufacturing, tourism and science sectors. In addition to its economic development activities, the development board supports a wide range of social development projects, including the provision of support for the Welsh language and its culture and for the construction of houses for letting under the New Towns Act 1965 as amended in 1981.

[Sir Wyn Roberts]

Mr. Barry Jones (Alyn and Deeside): The Minister is kindly fleshing out some of the matters that we discussed last night. Let me ask him a question related to the announcement by the Secretary of State yesterday. He may be able to answer it now. If not, perhaps he will ensure that it is answered later. Is the extra £1 million for the special rural action programme in 1991-92 included in the public expenditure White Paper for 1990 and, if so, under what head?

Sir Wyn Roberts: I shall certainly try to clarify that point. Last night my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State was speaking about the new money—Opposition Members are fond of talking about new money—amounting to £1·4 million which is to be available on top of this year's figure for the board in the coming year.

Dr. Dafydd Elis Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): We agreed all this last night. My advisers agreed with the Secretary of State's advisers that it was new money. The official Opposition could not work it out.

4.15 pm

Sir Wyn Roberts: I am grateful to the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas). It is no wonder that we are such good neighbours. If it will bear repeating, there has been an increase in Welsh Office support for the Development Board for Rural Wales from £12·7 million to £14·1 million. I hope that that at least makes everything clear. There is no doubt that the development board has achieved considerable success in many of its activities. On Second Reading we covered many matters both inside and outside the board's remit.

There are no financial or manpower implications in the Bill. It will simply provide cover for the board's receipt of Government funds and for its borrowing. No change will be made to the board's powers and there are no implications for the European Community.

Mr. Barry Jones: Last night the Secretary of State skirted rather gingerly over the problem of housing. There is some classic evidence of the build-up of an intolerable situation. The problem is exacerbated by the emergence of the poll tax. For instance, in Brecon there are 601 applicants on the housing waiting list. On 3 October 1980 the housing stock was 3,962. In 1990 it is only 2,660, which is a 35 per cent. reduction. The others have been sold under the right-to-buy scheme. Up to 50 per cent. of housing stock where the right to buy applies has been sold.

The sale of council houses has been quicker in villages. There are some villages in which 100 per cent. of the stock has been sold. One example in the area is Tretower. It also has 55 housing applications.

Some of the houses that have been bought under the right-to-buy scheme are now being resold as holiday homes. If housing associations built 50 new properties a year, it would still take 12 years to house those presently on the waiting list. At present rates of new build becoming available, it will take 18 years to house those on the waiting list.

Mr. Richard Livsey (Brecon and Radno
Gentleman is referring to my constituency heard him mention development board Tretower almost half the conventional hous second homes. There are no development bo Tretower. Does the hon. Gentleman know
DBRW houses there are in Brecknock? inadequate number. The hon. Gentleman is local government housing stock. He is quit per cent. have been sold off, but we need remit of the DBRW housing stock to flexibility.

Mr. Jones: I am certainly more than willi the observations of the hon. Gentleman, wh area well.

The local authority says that if it could receipts, it could build 120 new houses.
chance of young people who live locally own home, even with a 20 per cent. discount. I evidence has been submitted to the Select Co in Crickhowell 61 per cent. of the houses h out of a total of 216 and that 84 houses rem lucky if one house a year is available to be people on the waiting list. Apparently homeless families in temporary accommoda potentially homeless families in the area.

Housing in rural Wales is an issue of prim Everyone is aware of the problems and of young marrieds and ordinary people who against it. It is relevant to put it to Ministers not yet tackled the problem effectively. Ma not qualify for housing benefit because of res told that there is no prospect of a accommodation in the borough, that credit not sufficient and that the authority still receipts for improvements and repairs.

The health authority in the area previous to rent. That is no longer the case because it off. It is also said that Powys county authorit of selling its properties in the same way.

The conclusion of the minutes of evidenc
Committee was, first, that there was a g affordable housing for both rent and low—a need which has increased—and, secon supply of both rented and low-cost diminished. Thirdly, it was concluded that rural initiative and the provision of free or land either from the local authority or planning process would help, but that the recognition of the need to provide funding provide new dwellings.

I hope that Ministers will respond t problem of housing. It is a problem which solved and to which they did not appe themselves during yesterday's proceedings.
problem largely to the board, which has its

The Secretary of State's speech yesterd three essential points. First, he endorsed strategy. Secondly, he acknowledged tha finances had been neglected. He bowed to stumped up the extra £1 million. He said th money. It was gratefully received. Thirdly ducked entirely the chief problem in rural —agriculture. Nowhere in the Secretary of did I hear a sense of either strategy or National Economic Development Council recently published a report entitled "Work in the Countryside", which predicted a fall of over 9 per cent. in the number of people engaged in agriculture in the United Kingdom during the next 10 years. It estimated that that would mean a loss of over 3,000 jobs in Wales. Some say that the number will be between 3,000 and 7,500. Already Ministers know and I know that the National Farmers Union in Wales is beating tracks to the door of the Secretary of State to tell him that it is deeply worried. No one can gainsay that. There is a sense of crisis in farming, particularly in the upland communities. Yesterday we did not have a response to that problem.

In Scotland a Minister for rural affairs has been appointed. Has such an appointment been considered by the Welsh Office? There is no doubt in my mind that the Secretary of State has a fine professional staff at his disposal. They are good. Some I know well and some I have worked with. Are there enough of them? Given the challenge facing the rural areas of Wales is not there a case for Ministers to devise a strategy and to come forward with some proposals that will show the people of Wales, the upland communities and those who live in rural Wales that the Government mean business? I want Ministers to consider seriously some initiatives. As I said last night, there is a call for more leadership in this sphere.

Mr. Geraint Howells (Ceredigion and Pembroke, North): If the day comes when the hon. Gentleman holds the reins at the Welsh Office, will agriculture be included in the remit of the Development Board for Rural Wales? Can he give the farming communities and the people of Wales that assurance?

Mr. Jones: I will not make policy on the hoof. The hon. Gentleman knows me too well for that. Nevertheless, I take the emphasis of his intervention. He knows that soon his party, mine and others will have to present their manifestos to the electorate. That is the moment of truth for Ministers as well as for Opposition parties.

I draw to the attention of Ministers the existence of a report by the Institute of Welsh Affairs. I commend it to them. It deals with the impact of inward migration, low birth rates, some heavy unemployment, low incomes and housing demand, which will be increasingly heavy towards the end of the century. It says that a strategy is needed. It wants plans to cope with the significant levels of housing demand. It says that priority should be given to raising low incomes. Ministers should study the report and I hope that it will help them to come to conclusions and to take initiatives.

Will the Minister of State promise to read the recent speech in another place of Baroness White of Rhymney, that distinguished ex-public servant who is respected and admired? The Minister will know that some years ago Lady White held the post that he now holds. She may be right to doubt whether Ministers can seriously influence Whitehall and European institutions about rural Wales. My conclusion is that Ministers do not have sufficient influence. They cannot. They are showing that they are overstretched and they may be showing that they are tired. I am saying that they are not giving sufficient leadership in this sphere, though the Minister must not take that as too serious a thrust today.

We recognise the importance of the increase in the financial limit to allow the current plans for funding the Development Board for Rural Wales to go ahead. That is agreed. We also recognise that an increase in the financial limit does not in itself provide any guide to the future level of expenditure for Government funding.

We are greatly worried by the Government's record on financial support to the development board. Its gross expenditure has fallen dramatically in real terms over the past decade, despite growing social and economic challenges in mid-Wales. Gross expenditure has fallen by nearly 15 per cent. in real terms since 1978-79. According to the 1990 public expenditure White Paper, gross expenditure, after taking inflation into account, is planned to fall by 8 per cent. this year. That is an example of short-sighted penny-pinching at the expense of the people of rural Wales.

Yesterday, I heard the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas) express concern about Trawsfynydd. I appreciated why he felt it necessary to make those remarks, but the Minister seemed laid back in his response. When the nuclear power station closes, the loss of high status jobs there will have serious consequences. Now is the time for the Government to plan for the future of Trawsfynydd. Will the Minister consider setting up a task force, or at any rate doing something now, long before the closure takes place? The Government should be preparing to take action now, rather than waiting until the closure, and only then giving the impression of animation and preparation. The consequences of closure will be considerable. The Minister must make preparations now.

Trawsfynydd lies amid some wondrous scenery, but not for miles around is there certainty of alternative work. A task force or similar body could consider also the needs of Blaenau Ffestiniog, which is still struggling to come to terms with the consequences of the loss of its staple industry, slate.

4.30 pm

Dr. Thomas: In presenting the case for Trawsfynydd, it would be helpful for everybody if the hon. Gentleman would spell out in greater detail what he would do were he sitting on the Government Front Bench.

Mr. Jones: The former Labour Government had a good record in these matters. The development agency and the development board stand ready to help communities such as Trawsfynydd and Blaenau Ffestiniog. I am urging the Government to show intiative and to give leadership. Matters in rural Wales are not as good as the Government imply. A town such as Blaenau Ffestiniog, at nearly 1,000 ft above sea level, with about 60 in of rain a year, isolated and with poor communications, requires urgent action. The same applies to other communities in rural Wales.

Rural Wales has been let down by the Government, with the freezing of child benefit, the breaking of the link between pensions and earnings, the cut in housing benefit, soaring mortgate costs, the hated poll tax, the loss of jobs in the Laura Ashley company and the plight of hill farmers. It is fair to say that rural Wales has had enough of the Conservatives, who do not care. A Labour Government will be elected and will restore the fortunes of rural Wales.

Mr. Livsey: There is little that I wish to say because much was said last night, but a number of points come to mind as a result of one or two matters mentioned this afternoon.

The Bill is narrowly drawn. I had hoped to be tabling an amendment now to increase by statutory instrument the funding available to the development board, but I am told that the Bill is so tightly drawn that we cannot table amendments to that effect. It would be good if in future one were able to do that. I hope that that proposal will be considered.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I am not sure whether the hon. Gentleman heard my opening remarks when I explained the two-tier system of raising the financial limit which pertained before 1981. It was decided that it would be good practice to require primary legislation to raise the limit, rather than being able to do so by order. I think that the hon. Gentleman and the rest of the House will agree that what we now propose—using primary legislation—is better practice than that previously pursued.

Mr. Livsey: The Minister explains the position precisely. Although we can use that procedure and have a debate, the matter is almost a fait accompli; we cannot change the board's remit.

Many speeches have been made outlining the desirability of giving the board other functions, such as those relating to agriculture, which are important. I hope that in future legislation can be brought in to give the development board more wide-ranging functions. Although we have had a sympathetic ear from the Secretary of State and the Minister, we cannot change the board's remit to include agriculture. We should have that opportunity in the future.

The Minister also mentioned tourism, over which the development board has only limited powers. If this had been a wider-ranging debate, I should have liked to table an amendment to give the board clearer functions in relation to tourism. I understand that those powers are fairly limited at present. In future, will the development board be able to assist in building hotels, which could be leased to local entrepreneurs in various parts of Wales to raise the standard of tourist accommodation? That subject could do with our attention. Tourism is a massive industry in rural Wales and should be stimulated. I believe that the development board might well have the ability to do that.

The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) referred to housing, particularly in my constituency. The problems involved when young people try to find housing for rent are legion. The Government have ceased giving local authorities the ability to build houses for rent. Mid-Wales does not have an adequate housing association to provide sufficient housing to meet the demand. There is a Mid Wales housing association but it is extremely small, can obtain few resources and is thus unable to build adequate housing.

One of the development board's functions is to provide houses for key workers but, as I said last night, those houses are often empty for long periods in districts where the demand for rented housing is very great. It seems unsatisfactory that housing for key workers should be empty. That accommodation does not amount to a great deal of housing, and is but a drop in the ocean compared with the demand, yet even those few houses are empty.

I should like more flexibility. The de should be able to let some of its housing people coming in from outside the are working in the area. There are families in who have to live with their parents in because the council housing stock has bee
Sometimes parents and a son and dau perhaps two or three children have three-bedroomed council house. That i especially since those people work in th
The development board, with the Welsh able to create a larger housing associati
—if that is the way the Government housing for rent—to try to satisfy the in for housing.

This enormous problem is causin migration of some of our youngest and

Mr. Alan W. Williams (Carmart colleagues, I welcome the increase in the from £100 million to £175 million and —it will rise from £12·7 million to £14·1

The annual report of the developmen evidence that it has presented from tim Select Committee on Welsh Affairs show excellent work. Both the Development Wales and the Welsh Developmen interventionist agencies set up to stimula

Mr. Paul Murphy (Torfaen): By a Labo

Mr. Williams: Indeed. The agency stimulate new jobs and enterprises an stronger backbone in rural areas.

Last night we heard the Secretary of S development board's budget of £12 millio generate more than 1,000 new jobs or ones. That works out at about £10,000 remarkably good value for money—the multiplier effect means that other jobs liv created by the new jobs.

Unfortunately, my constituency, de second largest in Wales and very rural, i the board's boundaries. The development per cent. of Wales, but large parts of Gwy Dyfed are not included. My predecessor
Carmarthen, Dr. Roger Thomas, felt str
I remember going on a trip in the mid-19 shadow Secretary of State for Wales, Ale the hon. Member for Rhondda, and my Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anders
Newcastle Emlyn to point out to the sha
State that Carmarthen district and the I exhibit similar geographical features included. Why is Lampeter inclu
Llanybydder? Why is Llandysul incl
Newcastle Emlyn? Why are not Llandeilo included when Llandrindod and Llanwrty all similar towns, but, by being excluded the development board, they are missing the benefits it can offer.

The WDA does excellent work in o development board has a broader remit.
spend more of its money on social im tourism facilities. I should like the boa more money and broader boundaries. I hope that any future Labour Government—and even this Government—will consider redrawing those boundaries.

4.45 pm

In the past 10 years the problems of rural areas have become immeasurably worse, as my hon. Friend the Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) said earlier. Rural depopulation presents a severe problem. Young people are leaving our countryside and looking for work in the towns—sometimes not even in Wales but across the border.

We hear a great deal about inward migration in Welsh-speaking Wales, but that is only the other side of the coin. I was brought up in the countryside outside Carmarthen where it was taken almost as a fact of life in the 1950s and 1960s that small farms had to amalgamate, that jobs would be lost and that people would move into the towns. The Welsh language suffered as a result of that emigration. This downhill slide became a haemorrhage during the recession of 1979-81, when masses of manufacturing jobs were lost in rural areas and unemployment reached a peak of more than 20 per cent. in Dyfed. Between 1983 and 1988 unemployment there averaged 16 per cent.—that is what led to the haemorrhage of young people.

These people have been replaced and our population is growing, but it is different. I welcome retired people and people with new skills in craft industries, but that sort of population brings its own problems with it, particularly for the Welsh language.

Government policies in the past 10 years have hit rural areas disproportionately hard. There have been cuts in public spending on transport and road building. Not enough has been invested in road improvements or the surface of roads. There are terrible housing shortages. Rural villages contain run-down, unfit housing and there are acute problems of homelessness. We need far more public spending on housing, as the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) said.

The poll tax has hit rural areas disproportionately hard, too. Small villages have few services, so they generally have low rateable values and contribute less to local government finance. In a sense the poll tax subsidises towns and penalises rural inhabitants. A gentleman in Llansawel wrote to me 12 months ago pointing out that his rates bill was just £80. He is a pensioner and he and his wife now have to pay poll tax of well over £300—yet they will enjoy no new services in their remote rural village. They have a very low income, but it is not low enough to qualify for a rebate.

Last night, several hon. Members mentioned low pay. The problem is at its worst in rural areas. I have here some information from the Low Pay Unit——

The Second Deputy Chairman of Ways and Means (Miss Betty Boothroyd): Order. I hesitate to interrupt the hon. Gentleman, but last night's was a Second Reading debate and therefore much wider. We are now on clause stand part, and low pay does not relate to the clause. I hope that the hon. Gentleman will make his remarks relevant.

Mr. Williams: Thank you, Miss Boothroyd. I stand corrected. I was, however, trying not only to make general points about rural areas, pertaining to my constituency in particular, but to explain how the development board work helps to counter the problems and why it should given more money.

Average male earnings in my county—Dyfed—a lower than those in any other British county and t Government have, as a matter of policy, halved the staff the wages inspectorate in the past 10 years. Mo interventionist policies are needed: the Government mu take much more direct action to help rural areas.

Spending on roads has also been cut. My constituen desperately needs a road linking the M4 to Ceredigion; the hon. Member for Ceredigion and Pembroke, Nor (Mr. Howells) will know, the road to Llandyss Aberaeron and Aberystwyth has hardly been improved all in the past few years.

I have already mentioned the mass emigration of you people from Wales, and the inward migration which proceeding apace. Although I welcome the arrival people who contribute to the local economy and enrich t life of the area, it has caused serious problems for t Welsh language. I am, of course, very pleased when ne arrivals choose to learn Welsh, but the only real way retaining the language is to keep young people in o Welsh-speaking heartlands.

Dr. Thomas: I do not wish to stray out of order, and am well aware that the development board does not spen money on an education policy connected with language; does, however, spend money on a bilingual initiati programme to develop enterprise and business expertis Does the hon. Gentleman agree that that programm would be supported much more effectively in Dyfed an other parts of mid-Wales if he and some of his ho Friends desisted from undermining the local educatio authority policy for bilingual teaching there?

Mr. Williams: I am not undermining it; I am seekin—I fear that I am out of order now—to modify it to allo room for choice, and equal opportunities for the Wel and English languages in rural schools.

I wecome the increased allocations announced in th Bill, but far more needs to be done. Rural areas have ha a very rough time over the past 10 years, bu unfortunately, there will need to be a change Government before there is a change in their fortunes.

Mr. Paul Flynn (Newport, West): Let me comme briefly on the latter remarks of my hon. Friend th Member for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams): obviously the were in order, Miss Boothroyd, or you would not hav allowed him to proceed. Let me tell my hon. Friend—a gently as possible—that some of the recent controversy i Carmarthen has been very destructive. Communities hav been divided quite unnecessarily on the subject of th language. My hon. Friend may realise in retrospect tha emotive words like "Stalinist" are not appropriate whe applied to Dyfed county council.

We all realise how explosive the language issue is i Wales. Welshmen are not divided on religious or ethni grounds, but the language division is very sharp, and w must not be shy to promote its use or to come to i defence.

Yesterday afternoon, a Conservative Member—talkin as English people often do about their language—suggested that it was less important to extend the BB World Service's Romanian, Hungarian and Bulgaria sections, which I consider crucial, than to extend Englis language broadcasting. He received little support for that view, which typified the arrogance sometimes displayed by English speakers. If I were to start speaking Welsh now, Miss Boothroyd—as I have in the House on a number of occasions—I would be called to order; although other Parliaments can manage quite easily to deal with nine or 10 languages, in this Chamber the Welsh language has the same status as riotous behaviour, and I would be thrown out if I persisted in using it. This is now the only Parliament that Wales has, but perhaps the position will change when we have our own Parliament.

[Mr. Paul Flynn]

The people now migrating to Wales are different from those of my generation. In 1851, my forebear Morris Flynn and his family were stoned by the locals on their arrival in Wales. That was the greeting given to him and his family of five—three had been lost in the potato famine —as they walked down Bute street in Cardiff. As far as I know, there is no potato famine in Burton-on-Trent, and I do not believe that the Securitate in Guildford is persecuting the people and forcing them into Wales. People are coming to Wales looking for a better life, although many are leading a good life already. They are attracted by the beauty of the countryside and the lack of pollution.

None the less, we have the right to stand up and fight for our language. We remember what the old man of Pencader said about "this corner of the world", and we know that we are the only people who can defend our unique language. It is a shame that we should react with such venom to a foolish thing said by a frail, elderly visionary who gave so much to our country—although he certainly went too far. We should look to our visionaries, and to those who have the soul of our nation at heart, rather than indulging in the spiteful and petty controversies that have marred this last summer.

I hope that people in Carmarthen can come together, recognising the need to protect the Welsh language. The English language is not threatened; it is used throughout the world. Welsh, however, is in the perilous state in which all minority languages find themselves when all their speakers also speak a majority language. We must not be reticent; we must boldly defend the Welsh language.

My hon. Friend the Member for Carmarthen spoke of the poverty in the area covered by the development board. We hear very little about rural poverty. Let me briefly mention two issues. One is child benefit, which was recently increased. It is a shock to realise that at least 10,000 of the most deserving families in Wales will not receive the extra £1 because they happen to have suffered a bereavement or serious illness: that is in addition to the 192,000 families throughout Britain who will not receive the benefit because the Government will claw it back. The Government's was an extremely mean act.

The last great ruler who took an interest in the first born, King Herod, was a Thatcherite of the old school. One would not, of course, expect even the present Government to employ the measures that he adopted to save public expenditure.

As we emerge from the dark age of Thatcherism, I hope that policies to help families with children will emerge. The most deserving cases are being cheated outrageously by being deprived of child benefit. Rural housing is a continuing scandal. For the past 40 years, all Governments provided a wedge of housing in every the Principality that was cheap to re have disappeared altogether in many housing, by providing the choice of ch a balanced economy.

5 pm

My local authority, when it was provided council houses in order to c communities. Now, however, it is no people who want to solve proble Conservative ideologues whose minds few simple ideas that drive them o beyond all reason. There are no ho reasonable price in some Welsh villages hands they are sold. Villages are the local labour and they become village —already so common in the south of

The farming industry faces a crisis.
with all the development board's acti that we take on the clause will hav farming industry. At Question Time crisis was referred to as a genuine crisi wolf. My hon. Friend the Member f Davies) said, rightly, that the crisis doe of the farming community. The Mini Fisheries and Food accused me today farming community. It is already split.
East Anglia cultivate grain on huge p them with huge profits and, in the case
Wales, if there are large harvests, subsidies. I believe that my hon. Frie cent. of the farming subsidies go to ve

Farmers have become the victims o parties. We told them that the country resources. They have been provided wi more food. That resulted in this crisi the past have become the diseases o answer is not to increase subsidies gen that they are distributed fairly. Many now go to rich farmers should come to industry faces many crises. I commend policies. They would provide an ans crisis. Production should be scaled dow and voluntary agreements should be e farmers——

The Second Deputy Chairman: Gentleman has had a very good run Members to remember that we are c stand part and the functions of the bo clause. This is not a Second Reading relates not to farming and agriculture limits of the board.

We have had a good debate; I ha allowing hon. Members to range wide Reading and, so far, today. Now, how to a halt. In future, hon. Members wil range as widely as they have done so fa part debate. The hon. Gentleman mu what he wants to say, which must be

Mr. Flynn: That is very kind of yo

The Second Deputy Chairman: I an

Mr. Flynn: On reflection, I must admit that some of my comments were tangential to the main purpose of the clause.

As for the money devoted by the development board to planning purposes in Wales, the Council for the Protection of Rural Wales published recently a splendid report. Newport suffers from a particular problem, in that we have a pushy neighbour called Cardiff. Its urban sprawl is spreading like a stain across the fields towards Newport. It has come right up to Newport's border. If Newport had been as permissive as Cardiff over its planning permission, it would no longer have a green ring around it. It would be possible to walk from the civic centre in Newport to the city hall in Cardiff without crossing a field and seeing a blade of grass.

I urge the Welsh Office to consider introducing green belts around our towns. Strangely enough, we do not have them in Wales. Such a ring around our towns would make them much more attractive. That would represent a very good use of the money that is provided for in the clause. We must provide a better future for development board areas and for every other rural area in Wales.

Dr. Thomas: I thank you, Madam Deputy Speaker, for the generosity that you have shown towards hon. Members.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It has come to a halt.

Dr. Thomas: I am aware of that. I do not intend to make another Second Reading speech today. One of the reasons why it has turned into such a wide-ranging debate is that we have so few opportunities to debate on the Floor of the House matters relating to Wales. I wish that we could have more such opportunities.

I agree with the Minister of State that it is good to hold primary legislation debates on the Floor of the House, during which we can consider the work of the development board and other agencies. I only wish that the Welsh Office could introduce additional primary legislation, including legislation on language policy. That brings me to the language issue, though in relation to the development board's work, not in relation to Dyfed's education policy. Nevertheless, I commend what was said by the hon. Member for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) about the activities of the hon. Member for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams).

The development board has deliberately focused cultural spending on language policy on business courses, business advice and bilingual handbooks. That has generated a good response in the western communities of Wales. The board's policy is to recruit, as members of staff, bilingual business advisers. The board has used the existing enterprise agencies to carry out work for it on a contract basis. It is therefore able to stimulate the development of an enterprise culture. That is an important part of our overall language development, conservation and enhancement policy.

The Welsh language is spoken by about 500,000 people. It is a minority language. I hope that it will become the language of business activity as well as of cultural activity, as well as being the language of all traditional forms of expression in culture and religion, as well as the language of the schools throughout the national curriculum. The language would then be able to survive in the complex world within which small cultures have to function. I pay tribute to the work of the development board, which stimulates the enterprise culture through the medium of the Welsh language. That is a very important part of its work.

Housing expenditure by the development board is limited to providing houses for key workers. The development board is not a general housing agency. Housing agencies have taken over the work of the previous new town development corporations. However, they have been giving their houses away. Houses in new towns have been sold rapidly. That creates housing problems. We need to match the decline in the role of local authorities throughout Wales and the decline in the role of the development board as the new town housing agencies' role is matched by the activities of Tai Cymru.

The Government need to look at the overall Welsh Office housing budget to ensure that the decline in available rented sector property is matched by the work of the housing associations. We need to look at the relevance of the clause to housing policy. There is a relevance to key-worker housing. That is a concept which can be seen to relate to a particular view of development. In the early years of development agencies, not just in mid-Wales but in other areas, activity seemed to be centred on in-moving large capital investment. That is important but it can sometimes be a diseconomy in terms of its effect on the existing network of local businesses. Incoming industries on a large scale can lead to a loss of jobs in the self-employed and small business sectors. We have seen that in some aspects of the development board's work.

Over the years, there have been positive critics of the board looking at supporting an economic, development strategy and at aspects of the strategy which might be improved. Those critics have stressed that the over development of Newtown and the growth town strategy has sometimes resulted in the appearance of overdevelopment in some areas and underdevelopment in others—[Interruption.] I see that the hon. Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) agrees with me and I am sure that he will want to develop that.

I have mentioned Antur Dwyryd and Antur Teifi so I must mention Antur Penllyn and the activity in Bala. There we have a local authority and local entrepreneurs who are already successful on their own patch working with the development board to establish an atmosphere in which small local businesses can thrive. It creates an atmosphere in which young people can produce ideas for new enterprise, discuss their business plans and find support throughout the development of their business with the assistance of local banks, and so on. Many of us have argued for several years for that type of small scale networking enterprise and it is good to see the board pursuing it.

On Second Reading I received a firm answer from the Secretary of State about the future of the board. He made it clear that there would be no messing about between the Welsh Development Agency and the Development Board for Rural Wales. There will be a clear understanding that both authorities have a statutory responsibility and will have to work together. It was helpful to receive such a statement. However, I should like the Minister to deal with the possible privatisation of some of the board's activities. Concern has been expressed to me by those who follow the board's activities that there may be an intention to privatise existing complexes, industrial sites or other consultancy or development activities that the board has undertaken directly in the past. That may result in the officers responsible for such activities being less directly accountable. There have recently been internal management changes to the structure of the board.

[Dr. Thomas]

Some of us are concerned that the social development aspect of the board's work is not receiving the high profile that it received in the past. We want an assurance from the Minister about the broad spectrum of spending. The social development money stands alongside the various directly enterprising schemes, building schemes and infrastructure schemes. We want an assurance that the social development money has the same value in terms of the board's policies as in the past. We have discussed that with the chairman and officials of the board and we shall have an opportunity to do so again fairly soon when the board will be visiting the House and giving us a presentation. However, I should be happy to have the Welsh Office view. It is important to emphasise the entrepreneurial and commercial activity of the board, but the social profile is also an important part of integrated rural development and we want it to be maintained.—[Interruption.] I am pleased to see that my hon. Friends the Members for Ceredigion and Pembroke, North (Mr. Howells) and for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) agree with me.

5.15 pm

I want to deal with the board's spending in the northern Meirionnydd area and its relevance to Trawsfynydd. I am grateful to the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones) for raising that issue again today. I want to see the Welsh Office taking a longer look at the issue in consultation with the Department of Energy and Nuclear Electric. None of us wants to see premature closure of a functioning plant. However, that plant can function as a Magnox nuclear power station only within the tightest possible constraints and controls on environmental policy as governed by the nuclear installations inspectorate. We do not want an artificial extension of the life of the plant. Therefore, as I said last night, as a result of the closure we shall be facing the loss of 400 to 500 jobs directly. Obviously, that has a multiplier effect and there will be about 1,200 job losses overall in the local economy.

The response to that is not to look for another major utility of that sort because the economy of north-west Wales—Gwynedd—has been dependent upon major construction projects and big utilities in cycles. That is not necessarily good for the economy in the long term. We need to look for a resource-balanced economy in terms of its ability to sustain itself internally and have a good relationship with surrounding economies and regions. The answer is to take further the approach already adopted by the development board in the way in which it has ensured the development of in-moving new capital investment and encouraged grass roots networking enterprise within local communities. We need to match that with adequate funding. We want to ensure that the development board becomes the lead agency in replacing job losses at Trawsfynydd. The board is able to do that. The WDA and Welsh Development International are important. We are hoping for further international investment beyond Clwyd and into Gwynedd as a result of the Wyn Roberts memorial expressway that is about to be completed.

The Development Board for Rural Wales has as members representatives from local authorities and works closely with local authorities. As we know, the Meirionnydd and Gwynedd districts do not have the resources necessary for industrial promotion in the same way as the board, which is a central Government agency. I should like the Welsh Office to tell us that they are entrusting the task of the lead agency in providing jobs in the Trawsfynydd and northern Meirionnydd area to the board and that the funding will be there to match it.

I was hoping to have teased some new ideas from the Opposition. Unfortunately, I have failed yet again. In the past we have suggested several different models and if Opposition Members have any ideas I am happy to give way.

Mr. Alun Michael (Cardiff, South and Penarth): I remind the hon. Gentleman that it was a Labour party idea in the first place. It would be better if he were less petty in his remarks.

Dr. Thomas: I do not wish to be drawn into the history of the development board, but it is well known that it was announced as an idea in 1970 by Viscount Tonypandy, who made that speech at a particular juncture in a general election campaign when Labour was looking for votes in west Wales. I have nothing against that, but we should put the record straight.

I am concerned now not about the future of the board but about finding new ideas from the official Opposition on how jobs can be replaced at Trawsfynydd. I offer the official Opposition that opportunity, but I hear nothing from them.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: When a nuclear power station reaches the end of its life, there follows the enormous task of decommissioning it. We are only just beginning to grapple with that problem in Berkeley. Nuclear experts say —this is why the City took fright when the Government tried to privatise nuclear energy—that that task is many times more difficult than was ever imagined. The budget involved is anything from £300 million to £1 billion, and for 10 years after the closure of a nuclear power station —perhaps even for decades—hundreds of jobs will be involved in its decommissioning.

Dr. Thomas: I am grateful for the hon. Gentleman's intervention, because nuclear energy is one of the few issues on which we see eye to eye. The cost of decommissioning is unlikely to come within the budget of the Development Board for Rural Wales, but the hon. Gentleman is right to say that decommissioning will provide a certain number of jobs. From my discussions with Nuclear Electric and its predecessor, the Central Electricity Generating Board, my understanding is that decommissioning would not require the same number of people as are required to run a station, and that the specialised and dangerous work of decommissioning would perhaps require only 150 to 200 people—so 300 to 400 jobs would still be lost to the local economy, with the multiplier effect that I mentioned earlier.

Parallel models are available in the form of the British Steel Corporation—in Shotton in the constituency of the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones), and in areas of south Wales such as Ebbw Vale—and British Coal in the mining areas. In those cases, the existing utilities became agencies for replacement jobs.

The post-privatisation commercial structure of Nuclear Electric does not permit it to serve as such an agency, so we should look for ways of providing equivalent funding.

I want the northern Meirionnydd steel area to be treated as though it were an area subject to coal mining closures. Steel is a similar size of industry, and a comparable utility. I want the Welsh Office to signal tonight, or at a later stage, that it will respond positively to local activities in that respect. Recently, working parties reported to the district council, and the Antur Dwyryd agency produced its own plans for the 1990s which take account of the impact of decommissioning. We want an assurance from the Welsh Office that funding will be available within the development board's allocation to provide alternative jobs.

As for the current state of Welsh Office and development board crafts policies, had I not been participating in this debate, I would have joined a delegation to the Secretary of State on that very issue. However, I thought that it would be appropriate to be here instead, just in case Members on the Labour Front Bench tried to get at me again when my back was turned—[HON. MEMBERS: "Oh!"]—as is their usual procedure.

Can the Minister say whether the crafts initiative or agency role by contract performed by Craft Consultants (Wales) Limited will continue in one form or another? There has been conflict between the crafts council for Wales and the DBRW and WDA as to who does what in promoting crafts. The former secretary of State produced a craft initiative as one of many that he devised, but I am not sure that its progress is as satisfactory as it might have been.

Competition of a kind that is not always useful exists in the provision of services to individual craft workers, as between the WDA and DBRW. Many of us are concerned about providing the right framework for all kinds of crafts development, very often in isolated locations, and some of us have had the privilege of visiting crafts persons on remote hillsides, where they produce items which end up being sold in Harrods. That is not always a test of quality, but at least it shows how widely Welsh crafts are now marketed. I want an assurance that there will not be an end to the crafts initiative and that a further attempt will be made to bring together the WDA and crafts workers so that they can co-operate more closely. The crafts council, through the agency work that it performs on behalf of its members, provides a voluntary support service.

We should not always look for clean lines to be drawn in our dealings with the rural economies, nor look just at the work of the WDA or DBRW—thinking that the only way to promote small businesses is through official bodies. We should consider also ways in which voluntary membership agencies such as the crafts council can undertake promotional and other work on behalf of its members, alongside and without duplicating that of public sector agencies. I shall be grateful if the Minister, having referred to the crafts sector as having a part in this debate, will make a response.

Mr. John P. Smith (Vale of Glamorgan): I welcome the additional money that is to go to the development board, as does the whole Committee. My right hon. and hon. Friends in particular welcome it, because the DBRW was Labour's brainchild. We introduced it, together with many other successful Welsh institutions, such as the Welsh Development Agency. We are glad to see extra money made available to tackle some of the well-understood and well-established problems that confront rural mid-Wales —in particular, those associated with maintaining the rural economies and stopping depopulation.

I want to sound a note of caution in respect of the way in which the money is to be spent. I represent a Welsh constituency that is predominantly rural and which—unlike many others in Wales—has significantly benefited from the kind of money that, under the clause, is intended for other parts of Wales. I want to highlight some of the problems that can be associated with successful development if it is not properly handled.

Two themes have been taken up by other hon. Members. First, we need to know exactly what the additional money will be spent on. Secondly—this point has come up repeatedly—it is necessary to co-ordinate the development board's work with the work of other agencies such as the WDA, local authorities and British Rail, to mention but a few in the public sector, and the private sector, which will play an important part in these developments.

Unless we are careful about identifying the needs that go with new investment in jobs and industry, we will create great problems. That may sound like a contradiction, but it is an important political issue for the House to consider in relation to the Bill. Since I have been the Member for Vale of Glamorgan, the area has managed to attract a disproportionate amount of inward investment, totalling £1·1 billion. That is one of the highest concentrations of inward investment in the world and is certainly the highest in western Europe.

5.30 pm

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): It is all to my hon. Friend's credit.

Mr. Smith: I refuse to take all the credit, but I am delighted by that investment. I recognise the role played by the economic development committee of the county council and the WDA, not to mention one or two by-elections. We welcome that investment and hope that there will be more, but it is creating problems and pressures in the rural part of my constituency. The three points of the economic triangle of success are Cardiff Wales airport, with the massive British Airways investment in precision engineering jobs—which we want to see in mid-Wales as well—the huge investment in the Ford plant in the north-west of my constituency, totalling almost £500 million, and the investment at Bosch, which will create nearly 1,300 new jobs.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sure that the hon. Member will now relate his comments to the clause. Although his constituency is extremely important to him, it does not lie within the board's area.

Mr. Smith: Absolutely, Miss Boothroyd. I am glad that you have drawn my attention to that point. We must get across the point that, in spending this money, we must not make the mistakes that were made in the past. The development board should learn from past lessons and ensure that there is no repetition of previous mistakes.

Investment of this size will create a problem in the local labour market. We must ensure that there is trained, skilled labour to fill the occupations created in the rural areas or we will do one of two things: we will poach skilled people from existing employers in rural Wales or, worse still, we will add to the migration problem by encouraging skilled labour from outside to go into the rural areas. Some people believe that that is already happening in our area. The development board should recognise the fact that, unless the training challenge is met, the problem will get much worse.

[Mr. Smith]

We must also consider the impact of investment on transport. I have personal experience of this in my area and I know that the problem will affect the area covered by the development board. I warn the Minister that, if we are successful and we attract investment, it will result in huge pressures on our transport network. Because of the new investment in Ford and elsewhere, it is dangerous and almost impossible to attempt to cross the road in the little village of Llysworney. The high volume of traffic and number of large stone-carrying and goods-carrying vehicles going through the villages make a bypass necessary. A bypass is needed also in Dinas Powys. The main trunk road through that local area, the A4050, needs to be upgraded. In addition, the rail line through the rural part of my constituency should be reopened.

Those are the transport needs of an area that has been successful in attracting development and investment. When considering the allocation of moneys and the encouragement of investment, the development board should ensure that it first has an integrated transport policy, or it will create problems like those in our area. The effect of investment on the local labour market and on transport is of considerable concern.

Housing is another important matter in rural areas. The depopulation problem in mid-Wales results largely from the inability of the indigenous population to purchase houses, in the absence of low-cost houses for rent, because of low incomes and lack of employment. The development board should bear it in mind that that can also be a problem in areas of considerable developmental success. People may be amazed to hear that, although we have been successful in attracting investment, in the rural vale—where the population is increasing—there is an acute housing shortage. Because we have had so much success, property prices are high. The indigenous community in relatively well-off communities, particularly young people, cannot afford to stay in their villages, although they may have good jobs in Cardiff to which they commute daily and their parents may be reasonably well off and live in rather expensive houses. The capital values of property in the rural part of my constituency are among the highest in Wales, but there is an acute housing shortage. The development board should carefully consider the impact of disproportionate investment concentrated in certain areas—a matter to which the hon. Member for Meirionnydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas) referred.

We need a housing strategy to provide low-cost rented housing for people in rural areas on low incomes and those who are out of work and for people in areas of success. My area is a popular place in which to live——

Mr. Derek Conway (Shrewsbury and Atcham): Under the Conservative Government.

Mr. Smith: No, under a Labour Member of Parliament. The problem in my area is the opposite of the problem in some rural areas. The region is so popular that, I admit, some parts of my constituency are referred to as the filing cabinet of England. Civil servants who come down from Whitehall to the Welsh Office, the Royal Mint or the Inland Revenue know that my constituency is a nice place in which to live.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. I am sure that the hon. Gentleman's constituency is an excellent place in which to live, but he should get back to the geographical area that we are debating.

Mr. Smith: I will get back to the important point at issue. We have referred to the pressure that investment places on the labour market, to the effect on the transport infrastructure and to the importance of having a transport policy if we are to attract investment. We have also referred to housing. Another important point is that once we succeed in attracting investment to an area, we must ensure that it is followed by balanced development.

Other hon. Members have referred to the pressure on planning, to intrusions into the green belt and to the destruction of the countryside. In my constituency, there is a planning application for a golf course, for a new town, for a ski slope or for a race track on almost every open site and on almost every green field. Yet people have paid to live in this area because they want to enjoy a certain quality of life. The irony is that it is an area where such plans and development are not wanted, while we are crying out for development and investment—and doing what we can to attract it—in nearby conurbations.

I hope that the Minister will bear it in mind that when the board seeks, through strategic intervention, to attract investment and rural industrial activity, such development cannot be left to the free market. If we are to have economic and industrial growth, we must have the corresponding infrastructural changes to ensure that the quality of people's lives is not destroyed. There is a danger of that happening in my constituency, which is predominantly rural, and the environment will be under threat unless we get our act together. I am confident that, with institutions such as the Development Board for Rural Wales, we can do that.

Like other hon. Members, I want to draw the attention of the House to the importance of agriculture in the development areas. Some hon. Members seemed to imply—I am sure not intentionally—that the agricultural crisis in Wales is restricted to the hill farms and to the family farms which are typical of the catchment area of the board. I must remind hon. Members that the crisis goes beyond that. It affects the livestock and dairy farmers in some of the richer and more influential farming areas such as the Vale of Glamorgan. I can assure the House that the crisis in livestock prices and high interest rates affect all farmers.

Other hon. Members have said that only some sections of the farming community benefit from the huge farming subsidies, but that is not quite the case. By and large, it is not the farmers, but the retailers—and especially the five large supermarket chains—who do well out of the subsidies and they often fail to pass on the benefits to the consumer.

I hope that, as the Development Board for Rural Wales goes from strength to strength with its additional expenditure, it will take steps to meet some of the problems to which I have referred. I hope especially that the board will tackle those problems in rural areas, such as the one that I represent.

5.45 pm

Mr. Win Griffiths: In the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith), we have heard more analogies than there are sidesteps in a rugby match. I am sure that he will be known as "Smith the Analogy" as he wove his story so well. I could almost imagine that the Vale of Glamorgan had been transferred to mid-Wales.

Although my constituency lies outside the area covered by the Development Board for Rural Wales, I speak with an interest in mid-Wales because I was brought up in the town of Brecon, which is now in the constituency of the hon. Member for Brecon and Radnor (Mr. Livsey). My family history illustrates the need for the board and for the welcome increase in the money that it has available to finance the promotion of economic activity and, thereby, the social well-being and prosperity of mid-Wales. My parents had seven children; five of us are currently employed outside mid-Wales. The interesting point is that the two sisters who still live in the town of Brecon are married to men who came from outside mid-Wales.

Last night, the Secretary of State referred to the fact that, in the past decade, the population of the area has increased: inward migration has exceeded outward migration. That is only the beginning of a reversal of the trend that has been seen for generation after generation. It is important for the board to have its funds increased, because it will have to make up for generations of lost population and lost economic activity.

Mr. Alan W. Williams: I noted that my hon. Friend said that he was one of seven children and that only two of them now live in his home town, which is in a rural area. I am in an identical situation. I, too, am one of seven children and only two of us now live in Carmarthen. The other five now live far away—some outside Wales. That is at the heart of the problem of rural depopulation and the result is the decline of the Welsh language. Once people move away, they and their children will no longer speak Welsh, so the language goes.

Mr. Griffiths: I thank my hon. Friend for his intervention because it strengthens the case for the activities of the board to be extended in mid-Wales. My hon. Friend mentioned the Welsh language and the difficulties that it faces after years of decline. I believe that the board uses part of its budget to support the Welsh language. When I read the annual report of the board, I could not see just how much money went to support the Welsh language and I hope that the Minister can tell us.

Sir Wyn Roberts: If the hon. Gentleman looks at section 26 of the Development of Rural Wales Act 1976, he will find that it enables the Secretary of State, rather than the board, to devote money to social purposes, one of which is the promotion of the Welsh language. Under that section, the Welsh Office supports some of the activities in connection with the Welsh language.

Mr. Griffiths: I thank the Minister for that intervention. I was referring to the development board's annual report which mentions support for the Welsh language. I was brought up in Brecon, which is an English-speaking town, although in the 1950s Welsh was still to be heard in farming communities 10 miles west of the town.

Mr. Livsey: It still is.

Mr. Griffiths: Yes, it still is, in places such as Trecastle. Steps should be taken to help families with children who go to bilingual schools but who do not speak Welsh at home. Our children managed magnificently until the age of 11: our friends told us that, had they not known that my wife and I were monoglot in English, they would have assumed that our children were from a Welsh-speaking home. But our children had distinct problems after the age of 11 simply because there is not enough literature in Welsh to enable children to be educated easily in the subject at secondary level. When my daughter had to do a school project on Mozart, she had to read everything in English and then write everything in Welsh. The Development Board for Rural Wales could kill two birds with one stone if it made it its job to support printing in the Welsh language because it could then provide the books that are needed in Welsh schools, which are not available at present.

Dr. Thomas: The development board has assisted Mozart on a number of occasions. It has sponsored various concerts, including an excellent one at Llangollen international eisteddfod.

Mr. Griffiths: I am pleased to hear that, although I hope that the Minister will be able to tell us whether the development board could become actively involved in the provision of Welsh books for primary and, particularly, secondary schools. They are desperately needed.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I am sure that the hon. Gentleman will have heard of the Welsh Books Council, which receives £400,000-plus from the Welsh Office and whose main concern is the publication of Welsh language books. Other organisations supported by the Welsh Office are also concerned with the production of educational textbooks.

Mr. Griffiths: I thank the Minister for that answer, but I beg him to examine the possibility that, as part of its activities in supporting the Welsh language, the development board could become more involved with the other bodies in Wales that are producing Welsh language books. That could improve matters greatly.

I do not want to go over the ground that has already been covered on the need to provide housing at reasonably low cost in rural areas. Instead, I want to emphasise the need for rented accommodation. The Minister will know that the Government's mortgage-for-rent scheme has not had a very high take-up in mid-Wales. There are two reasons for the low take-up of what, on the face of it, looks like a bargain. First, despite all the inward investment that has taken place, despite the flourish of activity that surrounded the establishment of the development board and despite the fact that it is to be provided with the extra money that it needs for its activities, the feeling still prevails that the rural economy is fragile. We need to do more, not just through the development board, but through all apsects of Welsh Office policy, to promote the rural community in Wales.

Secondly, we must bear in mind the fact that many of those living in rented accommodation were not prepared to take the step of buying because they feared that they would not be able to sell if they wanted to move to another job. That emphasises one of the difficulties caused by high housing costs and high interest rates, which are bedevilling the expansion of the economy. Next year we shall have a downturn in economic activity which will make the work of the board more difficult and the rural economy more fragile.

[Mr. Griffiths]

Some hon. Members seem to have set on one side as almost irrelevant the work of the board in agricultural support, saying that there are other ways of supporting agriculture in Wales. It seems to me that a vital part of the board's work is in promoting agricultural production—finished and new products that can be made on the farm or off it—thus making a significant contribution to the income of the Welsh farmer. It is obvious that it will become more and more difficult for Welsh farming families to make sufficient money out of farming alone. That is why the board's activities are crucial in the provision of agricultural support—in the promotion of the production of new cheeses or whatever. There is so much that can be done. That is why I welcome the increase in the limit on the board's expenditure.

I am pleased that a Government who opposed the creation of the board should have recognised the usefulness of its activities in mid-Wales and I hope that the board will continue to flourish, because it will be needed for a long time to come.

Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South-West): We are discussing the increase in the board's financial limit from £100 million to £175 million. On Second Reading, hon. Members on both sides of the House acknowledged the good work that the board and its staff have done. As my hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) said, it is somewhat ironic that Conservative Members should now be supporting intervention in industry. They could not have done that in the past—at least, not openly—and one wonders for how long they will continue to do it. Nevertheless, it is nice to know that they support intervention as it is so obviously necessary to the rural areas of Wales.

Much of the money that will be made available under the Bill will be spent on maintaining jobs and blunting the effects of the recession which is hitting the areas of rural Wales covered by the development board. Such help would also be extremely valuable elsewhere, outside the development board's area. Had such help been available in my constituency, Biddulph's might not have been closing its factory in Denbigh this week, with the loss of 50 jobs. We could be maintaining jobs in an area which is just as rural as most of the board's area. In terms of rurality, the Vale of Clwyd and Glyndwr within Clwyd are little different for Brecon, Cardigan and other areas within the board's remit.

6 pm

On Second Reading, the Secretary of State said that he would look at the boundaries in 1991. Obviously, that will require more money. I urge him to try to extend the boundaries into Clwyd, Glyndwr and Gwynedd within this year, which means that the £175 million is probably inadequate and that we should vote for more money tonight. I urge him also to give development area status of some kind to those regions so that we can attract Euro-money, which would get him out of the financial hole in which he would find himself if he extended the boundaries before 1991.

The Secretary of State said that he was seeking way in which to strengthen rural communities. T probably best done by supporting agricultur removing the effects of the deregulation of bus tra which is a major problem, and by encouraging rathe discouraging post offices in villages. That cannot b by market forces—it can be done only by intervention. As I have said, hon. Members are, in supporting state intervention by their support Development Board for Rural Wales. That encouraging trend and I hope that it will continue.

Mr. Murphy: This has been a wide-ranging debat simple Bill. The clause would extend the financial li £100 million, which was set in 1981, to £175 million. that hon. Members on both sides of the House are that that limit is not a limit of grant and that it also borrowing from the national loans fund, as w Treasury guarantees.

Opposition Members welcome the extension limit to £175 million. It interests me in particular be at one time, my constituency had within its boundar Cwmbran development corporation. At that time the only institution of its type within Wales, and th town development corporations sprang directly fro one in Cwmbran. Many engineers, architects and went to mid-Wales to set up the interesting exper My hon. Friends the Members for Clwyd, South (Mr. Jones) and for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams) referred to the need to extend the boundaries Development Board for Rural Wales into Carmarth Clwyd. I hope that the Minister will take that po board and report back to us.

According to its annual report, the objective Development Board for Rural Wales is to encoura creation of a self-sustaining economy in its area, together with housing, is a crucial matter in mid My hon. Friends the Members for Alyn and Deesid Jones), for Vale of Glamorgan (Mr. Smith) a Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) and the hon. Member for and Radnor (Mr. Livsey) referred to the important of the board's work, which the £175 million will co the creation of housing in mid-Wales.

When I again read the report of the Develo Board for Rural Wales I was surprised to note that i that housing continues to cause difficulties in rural That must be an immense understatement. Hon. Me have referred to the importance of the development in tackling that problem. They rightly referred problem of the affordability of private housing wit area covered by the development board. For instan year about 1,300 new private starts were made in tha However, the average Welsh house price is about £ there are high interest rates, rural incomes are lowe their urban counterparts, and house prices are ab per cent. higher. The problem of getting a private ho people who live in those areas is becoming worse day.

Of course, the development board has to alongside local authorities. There are six district c within the area. All six of them have been losers battle involving the poll tax and the unified busine Local authorities suffer that burden and the loss o position as housing suppliers in Wales. I shoul thought that that responsibility would rest wi development board. The hon. Member for Brec Radnor rightly said that the development board should take over the functions of housing associations and work closely with them in mid-Wales. That is not happening.

Last year in the development board area, 801 local authority and housing association houses were sold and only 222 starts were made. Unquestionably, that has given rise to homelessness in the area. Also, 329 families were officially homeless in the middle part of Wales. Tai Cymru, to be fair to it, instituted research into what should happen with housing in mid-Wales. It came up with the inevitable result: there is much hidden homelessness in mid-Wales and the waiting lists with local authorities and the development board are probably much higher than the official figure of 6,000 people. As the Minister is aware, district councils in Wales have said that 6,000 more homes should be built within the Principality and many of them in the area of the development board.

Mr. John P. Smith: My hon. Friend has rightly referred to losses to Wales and losses in Wales. Will he take this opportunity to agree that the tragic loss this week of one of my constituents, Mr. Cliff Jones, arguably one of the greatest outside-halves to come from Wales——

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. That has nothing whatsoever to do with the clause stand part debate. The hon. Gentleman will resume his seat.

Mr. Smith rose——

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. The hon. Gentleman will resume his seat. This is a clause stand part debate relating to the financial limitations of the board. The matter to which the hon. Gentleman was referring does not relate to that subject.

Mr. Murphy: I take the point that was made by my hon. Friend the Member for Vale of Glamorgan.

Whole communities are breaking up because of the lack of affordable housing in mid-Wales. My hon. Friend the Member for Bridgend referred to new housing development by the board which, in a sense, was used as a guinea pig by the Welsh Office and by the Government in respect of the rents-into-mortgages scheme. My hon. Friend told us that that has flopped and that, out of 1,400 tenants of the development board in Newtown, only 35 applications have been received. In Scotland, out of 123,000 tenants of similar boards, only 42 have applied. The Government's idea, which was to finish off all sorts of public housing in the centre of Wales, has flopped.

Section 18 of the Development Board for Rural Wales Act 1976 refers to housing subsidy. At the Conservative party conference, the Minister for Housing and Planning referred to the withdrawal of housing subsidy from local authorities and from new towns during the next few years. I hope that the money that we are discussing will not mean that subsidies for tenants in the mid-Wales development area will suffer as a consequence of what might or might not be Conservative party policy in the months and years ahead. Local authorities, the development board and Tai Cymru—Housing for Wales—should try to arrest the crisis in Welsh rural housing.

For instance, they should consider the problem of second homes, which has been mentioned several times in the past two days. They should also consider the planning laws and ensure that planning permission for second homes is carefully examined. Development land should be designated to house local people, not to make property developers richer. They should set up housing help centres in mid-Wales. They should have a crash programme on homelessness and certainly should ensure that the capital receipts that local authorities and the DBRW receive from the sale of local authority houses go back to them so that when houses are lost through the right-to-buy scheme they are replaced with new houses for people in the centre of Wales who look to the board to house them.

We have highlighted some of the problems in mid-Wales. We welcome the increased resources that have been allocated to the board, but we are convinced that the extra £175 million would be put to best use by a Labour Government, as a Labour Government set up the board in the first place.

Sir Wyn Roberts: With the leave of the House, I will reply to the debate. In all, 10 hon. Members have spoken in this clause stand part debate. If there is an excuse for the wide-ranging character of the debate, it is that, as I understand it, we propose not to have a Third Reading debate.

I begin by dealing with the speech of the hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside (Mr. Jones). I seriously suggest that he reads again what my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State said at column 936 of Hansard about the funding of the special rural action programme. Similarly, at column 967 my right hon. Friend dealt clearly with the interest taken in the problems at Trawsfynydd. The problems are some years ahead but the north-west Wales training and enterprise council, although only recently established, has begun exploratory discussions.

Dr. Thomas: I appreciated what the Secretary of State had to say about the training and enterprise council, but there is also a role for the development board and for additional funding to meet head-on the crisis that will emerge in the area in the next five years.

Sir Wyn Roberts: We certainly expect the efforts of the training and enterprise council and other agencies such as the Development Board for Rural Wales to provide alternative jobs to be intensified in the intervening period.

The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside said that the gross expenditure of the DBRW had declined. He chose some curious years as examples of its expenditure. He chose 1978-79 and 1979-80, when there was exceptionally high expenditure at Newtown, but taking the period from the board's inception one sees that there has been an increase of some 15·4 per cent. in real terms in the board's gross expenditure. Similarly, from 1980-81 to 1990-91 there has been a 20 per cent. increase in real terms in the board's gross expenditure.

Several hon. Members talked about housing. Indeed, it would be easier to name those who did not refer to it. The Welsh Office has been aware for some time of the problems faced by people in rural Wales in securing affordable homes. I am glad to say that several measures are being taken. Although housing is an ancillary responsibility of the development board, hon. Members will be aware of the growing role of Tai Cymru, or Housing for Wales. It has directed about £25 million—no less than a quarter of its resources—to be spent by housing associations in rural areas this financial year. This year we have made available additional allocations or credit approvals totalling £2·8 million to rural district councils with severe second home problems to enable them to buy dwellings for rent or resale or to purchase land for housing development. To help mitigate the effects of inward migration and second homes, public sector landlords in national parks and certain designated areas may impose conditions on the resale of dwellings sold under the right-to-buy scheme. I did not agree with the hon. Member for Torfaen (Mr. Murphy), however, when he implied that we should deny the right to buy because houses bought under the scheme are somehow lost to the housing stock. He knows as well as I do that that is not the case.

[Sir Wyn Roberts]

6.15 pm

Mr. Murphy: The Minister completely misinterprets what I said about the right-to-buy legislation. I did not imply that the right to buy would not continue or that it was not a good thing. I said that the receipts from the sale of those houses should go back to the local authorities or the development board so that they can build new houses for those on the waiting lists in mid-Wales, who number over 6,000.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Unless things have changed drastically, the current year's receipts from right-to-buy sales can be used by the authorities to which they are paid.

Within the next few months we shall issue planning advice on land for low-cost housing in rural areas following consultation last year. Last year, Housing for Wales launched a rural housing initiative to assist local people, especially young people, to find suitable homes which they can afford in their own communities. The initiative is being run on a pilot basis in 31 villages across rural Wales. The majority of homes are being provided on shared ownership terms with a pre-emption right eventually to return the home to the relevant housing association.

More significantly, as the hon. Member for Torfaen mentioned, earlier this month Housing for Wales published the results of two vital research projects on the nature and extent of the need for housing in rural Wales. The second of those reports, which dealt with the importance of affordable housing for young people in determining their decision to remain in their home communities, goes further than housing issues. Housing for Wales intends to call a working conference early in the new year to discuss the findings of both studies. It will draw on the expertise of organisations with an interest in the quality of rural life.

You will probably not allow me to stray far on the community charge, Miss Boothroyd, but it is perhaps worth noting that within the development board's area some 29,000 chargepayers are obtaining transitional relief averaging £27 per person. The House will have heard what my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister had to say this afternoon about a review of the community charge.

Many references have been made to agriculture but, as my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State pointed out on Second Reading, agriculture is the direct responsibility of the Welsh Office agriculture department. Of course, we recognise that it is not an easy time for Welsh livestock producers. That is why we have introduced measures to deal with the position. Again, Miss Boothroyd, you will not allow me to stray far into what we have done for the beef sector by way of intervention. Neither would you allow me to say much about the way in which brought forward the two advance payments annual premium, and so on.

Mr. Win Griffiths: You will recall, Miss Bo that I raised the issue of agricultural support development board's annual report there is a entitled "Support for Agriculture". The point ma report and the reason why we raised it is that, recognise that direct income support for farmers i another part of the Welsh Office, the developme has a responsibility to promote the industry and for farmers by other means. That is why we shou hear something from the Minister about that.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Perhaps, Miss Boothroyd, allow me to say a little about some of the income flowing into the rural community as a resul measures to which I have referred. Intervention in sector alone is costing the Government some £11 week. Welsh sheepmeat producers have a cash flo of nearly £25 million from the decision to bring the two advance payments of sheepmeat annual p Obviously, there are other developments in the sector. The hill livestock compensatory a payments alone total some £33 million.

The Second Deputy Chairman: Order. The M trying to be helpful to the House, but he is g deeply into agriculture. I am looking at the repo is taking us too far into another Dep responsibility.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I am seeking to say——

Mr. Win Griffiths: On a point of orde Boothroyd. I am grateful for your intervention pointed out, the Minister was exceeding his role. I I asked what the Development Board for Rural W doing to support farmers. It has a remit to supp That is what I want to know.

The Second Deputy Chairman: That is not a order for the Chair to resolve.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I shall come to the hon. Ge point. I was simply prefacing my answer to pointing out how much money was being po agriculture. The HLCA payments alone are wo £33 million. Apart from all that, agricultural g subsidies, excluding intervention and so on, a some £100 million a year to Welsh farmers. Ag background, hon. Members are well aware that t the development board is to encourage indus activities which are ancillary to agriculture. It function of the board to administer grants and That is the responsibility of the Welsh Office. Ma activities covered by the development board are to agriculture and, indeed, life in general in community which they serve.

Tourism has been mentioned——

Mr. Alan W. Williams: May I take up the po by my hon. Friend the Member for Bridg Griffiths) about agriculture and the responsibili development board? There is a crisis in ag particularly regarding lamb and beef. Even wor 30 per cent. cuts in export subsidies being negotia general agreement on tariffs and trade round talking about small farmers. What is the Minister doing and what more can we do by using the development board to help and sustain the rural economy? Small farmers are critical to the rural economy. Is there not a case for a massive expansion of the board's role in supporting small farmers?

Sir Wyn Roberts: We all sympathise with that point. Indeed, I began my statement with an appreciation of the situation in agriculture. I also said that the administration of support for farmers in Wales was the prime role of the Welsh Office agriculture department, as in England it was for the Ministry of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food. There is a role for the development board. Its function is not to provide grants and subsidies direct to farmers—there is separate administration for that—but to encourage and promote businesses ancillary to agriculture and life in rural areas. I am sure that that is where its main thrust should be.

Mr. Geraint Howells: The Minister's positive approach has been welcome, in mid-Wales by the western initiative drive which has taken place in the past few months. It will bear fruit in the months to come. May I suggest that area offices should be opened in Ceredigion, Meirionnydd, Brecon and Radnor—the development board has opened a new office in Machynlleth which has been a great success in Montgomeryshire—so that young entrepreneurs and small business people who are keen for advice can go to a local office under the jurisdiction of the development board?

Sir Wyn Roberts: I note the hon. Gentleman's point. He will know that those offices cover rather more than the interests of farmers. Nor would it be appropriate for the development board to have specific powers that are not available to assist farmers in other parts of Wales. I am sure that the board will also note his point.

I was about to say a word or two about tourism. Although the development board has a role in tourism, it recognises that the main role belongs to the Wales tourist board. There is collaboration between the two boards. The section 4 scheme administered by the Wales tourist board began operating in 1971 and has greatly assisted tourism throughout Wales. Since then, in the development board's territory alone, nearly £8 million worth of grant and loan assistance has been provided, supporting more than 420 projects with a capital cost of £38 million, creating or safeguarding about 1,550 jobs.

On Second Reading last night, and again today, the hon. Members for Carmarthen (Mr. Williams) and for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Jones), to name but two, made a plea for an extension of the board's area. I can only think that that is prompted by a lack of full awareness of what the Welsh Development Agency is doing. It plays an active role in furthering the economy of rural Wales and that part of rural Wales which comes under its jurisdiction. The effectiveness of the WDA's activities in rural areas is demonstrated in a variety of ways. It has 1·7 million sq. ft. of factory floor space, providing jobs for more than 5,000 local people. More than £4 million in private investment has been secured since the launch of the rural buildings conversion grant scheme, resulting in the creation of more than 1,000 jobs. The DRIVE scheme has generated substantial private sector interest, leading to private investment in excess of £2 million.

I could expand considerably on the work of the WDA in areas outside the remit of the DBRW. However, I shall resist that temptation, mentioning only one point that has been raised in the debate—the support that the WDA gives to Menter a Busnes, the initiative to encourage enterprise among Welsh speakers. There is close collaboration between the board, the WDA and the Wales tourist board.

6.30 pm

The hon. Member for Carmarthen referred to the availability of the social powers in the DBRW area. It is important to recognise that there is no legislative gap. The Welsh Office has the power to assist social development schemes throughout Wales, and some £3 million was spent on such measures last year. We have already referred to the Welsh language and the support given to it under section 26 of the Development of Rural Wales Act 1976, but that section gives the Secretary of State power to support the Welsh language in Wales. I know that that will interest the hon. Members for Newport, West (Mr. Flynn) and for Bridgend, both of whom referred to the matter.

Mr. Win Griffiths: Does the reference in the annual report of the DBRW to measures to support the Welsh language include initiatives taken by the Welsh Office rather than by the board itself?

Sir Wyn Roberts: Like many other organisations in Wales, the board is quite capable of doing—and has the power to do—whatever is appropriate in connection with the Welsh language. I am sure, without specific knowledge, that both the WDA and the DBRW would support a business venture with the language at the core of its operations.

Dr. Thomas: This is an initiative within the board, strongly supported by the WDA. It has been effective in obtaining a response within the bilingual community in western Wales and from a broader base of opinion.

Sir Wyn Roberts: I am grateful to the hon. Member, who referred to the craft initiative and asked for further information on it. The three-year period of the initiative comes to an end at the end of the financial year. If none of the parties to the agreement gives notice, the agreement allows for the current funding arrangements to continue. An early evaluation of the initiative is under way, at the request of those involved, and talks are also taking place about what support might be offered to the craft industry in the next financial year.

The hon. Member for Alyn and Deeside foolishly accused the Welsh Office of not having a strategy. Who does he think is behind the board? It is not for us to second-guess it, but its policy is clear, as the hon. Member for Torfaen said. The objective of our policy for mid-Wales is to create a thriving, self-sustained, market-based rural economy. We have witnessed a major improvement in the climate allowing private enterprise to flourish. The development board's policies complement the work of the private sector.

The development board can be viewed as a facilitator acting in a catalytic role for manufacturing industry and helping to create jobs, reduce unemployment, encourage growth, improve the balance in population and achieve higher income. Its key objective is directed towards the expansion and diversification of the economy of mid-Wales. Its focus is on encouraging and strengthening the private sector within its area. I was delighted to hear the suggestion made by the hon. Member for Merionnydd Nant Conwy (Dr. Thomas) that we should privatise as much as possible of the board's activities.

[Sir Wyn Roberts]

Our policy has helped to create an environment in which young people can find new jobs in manufacturing industry, in tourism and in the service industry, providing a much greater diversity of employment opportunities. Achievements in this help towards the creation of a much-improved quality of life for local people as well as attracting inward investment. All this helps to create a new confidence in the region.

To those who have pressed me for an extension of the board's work, I can only say that it has a full agenda already. It has wide-ranging specific powers on property development, business advisory services and the provision of finance for social and economic purposes. Its specific aims are to develop a flourishing enterprise culture within mid-Wales.

Mr. Win Griffiths: What consideration has the Department given to the activities of the board against the background of what is now admitted to be a recession in the coming year? What estimates has the Minister made of the rates of employment and unemployment in the area covered by the board?

Sir Wyn Roberts: I am coming to that.

The second aim of the board is to assist the private sector in building better businesses and creating the jobs necessary to sustain and diversify the base of local economies.

The third aim is to provide for the people of mid-Wales, with their unique social and cultural heritage, the opportunities to stay and prosper in mid-fourth is to improve the quality of life in mi improving the number and quality of social f access to them.

The board's operational objectives relate m creation of viable jobs and the retention of young people by providing the kind of economic opportunities that they require. Jo inextricably linked with economic, social and d structural improvement.

I was asked about the relationship of mid the state of the economy. This and last nig Reading debate are about the only debates heard for some time in which the unemploy were not mentioned once. There is a good rea
I am the first to mention the figures because rate of unemployment for October 1990 in travel-to-work areas was 4·1 per cent., compa
Welsh average of 6·7 per cent. That is a clea success of the DBRW, which has been ackn both sides of the House.

The debate has been wide-ranging be represented an effort on the part of the O extend the debate beyond the remit of the board. The new financial limit proposed unde provide the board with the headroom it nee the tasks that I have specified, not only no years ahead. There is no question but that i success and that it will be a success in the fu

Question put and agreed to.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2 ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Bill reported, without amendment.

Bill read the Third time, and passed.

Import and Export Control Bill

Order for Second Reading read.

6.40 pm

The Minister for Trade (Mr. Tim Sainsbury): I beg to move, That the Bill be now read a Second time.

The Bill is short and technical; my speech will be short but I hope not too technical.

The Bill repeals section 9(3) of the Import, Export and Customs Powers (Defence) Act 1939. That subsection provides that the Act will expire when an Order in Council is made declaring that the emergency that was the occasion of the Act's passing is at an end. By repealing the subsection, the effect of clause 1 is to make the 1939 Act permanent. I do not think, in the circumstances, that I need dwell on the purpose of clause 2.

The 1939 Act is the last major piece of the emergency legislation introduced at the beginning of the second world war which remains in use, although, perhaps not surprisingly, it is not the only one remaining on the statute book. While preparing this Bill, we have initiated a review of other emergency legislation with analogous provisions to section 9(3), notably the Compensation (Defence) Act 1939 and the Landlord and Tenant (Requisitioned Land) Act 1939 and the Landlord and Tenant (Requisitioned Land) Act 1942. Whilst the review is not yet complete, we have reached the preliminary conclusion that the powers provided by these Acts are no longer necessary.

The Import Export and Customs Powers (Defence) Act 1939 gives powers to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry to make orders prohibiting or regulating the import or export of goods to or from the United Kingdom, and enabling licences to import and export goods to be granted. It also provides for the forfeiture of goods imported or exported contrary to an order.

The power to control imports and exports has been, and remains, essential to implement a wide range of important Government policies. The powers to control exports have for many years been used to restrict trade for strategic reasons—for example, with the Warsaw pact countries and the People's Republic of China. The continuing need for such powers, even in a more peaceful world, is only too obvious. Other examples of the use of the powers are to implement international treaty obligations, such as the nuclear non-proliferation treaty, and to give effect to our other non-proliferation policies aimed at preventing countries from developing a chemical, biological, missile or nuclear capability; to prevent certain exports which could be prejudicial to national security, such as encryption equipment; and to prevent the export of goods likely to be used for terrorist purposes or for internal repression.

The powers of the Act are used to prevent exports of antiques and other items which are considered to be an important part of the national heritage. We also use the powers of the Act to implement the voluntary restraint agreement on steel exports.

The powers to control imports are equally important in relation to safeguarding public security, such as firearms, and to support foreign policy objectives, although they are used mainly to enforce internationally agreed trade protection measures, including restrictions on imports of textile and clothing products within the framework of the multi-fibre arrangement. The Act is also used to regulate the import of bananas, although, contrary to some popular opinions, that is not to help the Government to avoid banana skins but to help protect our traditional suppliers in the Commonwealth Caribbean.

The powers in the Act to control exports are implemented by the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1989, which specifies the goods the export of which requires a licence from the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. It is for exporters to determine in the first place whether a particular product needs an export licence. In the event that advice is required, my Department stands ready to assist. Licence applications are submitted to the export control organisation within the DTI. To minimise the burden of export controls on exporters, a number of open general and open individual export licences have been introduced covering many industrial dual-use goods. Those remove the need to seek prior authorisation from the DTI before making a shipment.

Imports are controlled under the Import of Goods (Control) Order 1954, also made under the 1939 Act, which prohibits the import of all goods. Since there is no reason to restrict the entry of most goods, an open general import licence has been introduced which permits goods to be imported without the need to apply for an individual licence, with the exception of those goods specified in a detailed schedule. Goods in that schedule can be imported only under the authority of an individual import licence, for which importers apply to my Department's import licensing branch.

The powers have been used regularly by every Government since the war. Nearly 200 orders or amendments to orders have been made since the end of the war, averaging more than four each year. That is a clear indication of the continuing need on the part of successive Governments for powers which enable new items to be brought under control when that is judged necessary in response to a perceived threat or technological change.

Equally, controls which have become unnecessary can be removed. For example, the major relaxation in controls, introduced in the light of developments in eastern Europe, which was announced in July by COCOM partners, has been implemented under the powers of the 1939 Act. I hope that the present negotiations on a "core list" will lead to further relaxations in export controls early next year.

The powers are therefore tried and tested. Experience has shown that they work efficiently and effectively without placing unnecessary burdens on business. The 1939 Act enables us to react quickly and flexibly in response to each situation as it arises. The importance of the power has been highlighted by the present Gulf crisis.

I emphasise that the Bill is essentially a technical measure. It does not affect the exercise of powers under the Act, or the import and export licensing systems which have been established and which are familiar to importers and exporters. However, I am sure that the House will agree that it is no longer satisfactory to control imports and exports under powers derived from an Act which "shall continue in force until such date as His Majesty may by Order in Council declare to be the date that the emergency that was the occasion of the passing of this Act came to an end".

We should now make the Act permament.

The Bill does not in practice change anything. The powers conferred by the Act have been operating satisfactorily for many years, and it is important that they continue to do so in the future. The Bill simply has the effect of putting them on a permanent legislative footing.

[Mr. Tim Sainsbury]

6.48 pm

Ms. Joyce Quin (Gateshead, East): I listened carefully to the Minister's explanation. The Opposition do not object to the Bill, as it makes sense in the light of events. In view of the reunification of Germany and the fact that the allied powers now have no role in Berlin, it is patently absurd to suggest that any part of the emergency circumstances of the second world war exist today. In any event, the Government have made clear statements to that effect, in answer to parliamentary questions and in documents, for example, in the Government's observations to the fourth report of the Foreign Affairs Committee, in which they referred to the treaty on the final settlement. It says that the treaty settles

"between the parties . . .definitively matters arising out of the Second World War."

If the 1939 Act were unamended, we should be in the strange position where it would presumably be possible for exporters and companies to challenge the legal validity of any measures taken under the 1939 Act.

When I first looked at the Act and the proposed Bill, my first impressions were of alarm and surprise. My alarm stemmed from the fact that the 1939 Act is couched in the language of war. That was not surprising because it was clearing the way for the conditions of war and the trading embargos and restrictions that were going to operate during that period. I was alarmed at the wording of the Act, which still pertains today, and I was surprised that the Act should be the legal base for so much of the export and import control adopted by Governments of different political complexions since 1939. Therefore, our willingness to accept the Bill does not mean that we accept that the 1939 Act should be the basis of such controls for ever and ever. It might well be sensible for a future Government to introduce a modern Bill, not couched in the language of 1939, to allow, for whatever reason, necessary restrictions on exports and imports.

I am glad that the Minister gave us some details of the way in which the 1939 Act continues to operate and some reasons for existing export and import restrictions. Will the Minister confirm that, while he referred to political reasons, there may be other reasons, such as health reasons, for the control of exports and imports allowed by the Act?

How effective is our import and export legislation? Let us look at the so-called Iraqi supergun incident. I do not apologise for raising that matter now, because the Opposition have repeatedly asked the Department of Trade and Industry to make a statement in the light of the dropping of charges in the Iraqi supergun affair. Following that affair, we are concerned about the effectiveness of our export and import controls.

When the previous Secretary of State for Trade and Industry was first asked about the so-called Iraqi supergun, he said that it was not possible to reveal the full details because of the possibility of criminal proceedings being instigated. Now that charges have been dropped, we feel that we have a right to certain answers and are still perturbed that there seems to have been a failing within the Department of Trade and Industry to appreciate the warnings given to it by the hon. Member (Sir H. Miller) and others about the equipment to Iraq. Why was nothing do information, which has been available sin the specifications and contracts surroundi detailed information on changes made to knowledge that existed about the involve Research Corporation of Dr. Gerald Bu

Will the Department state what has equipment already sent to Iraq? Are the of the equipment is involved in test firing is the military assessment of its potentia

An alarming report in The Independe

"Somewhere in Iraq, the 90ft long British-built guns may be trained on kilometres away in Saudi Arabia."

That is a matter of grave concern to al

Why did the Government fail to embargo against Iraq? We want full in other possible breaches of the embargo. to know where they stand on exp restrictions. One company involved wa in a telephone conversation with the Dep and Industry, that it did not need a lice Prime Minister, the right hon. Member f Thatcher), subsequently said at Questi company should have applied for an ex effectively changed the nature of the a and put a different onus on the comp companies are to be held responsible for use of equipment or products, they need assistance and effective response from t Trade and Industry than was evident i hon. Friend the Member for Sheffie Caborn) said.

Considerable concern was expressed the House when statements were mad March and April this year on the Iraq Many of the questions asked then are Surely it is time for the Government to clean on that issue. It is simply not goo Department to say that any stateme judgment made to drop charges sho Customs and Excise—a full statement Commons by the Department of Trad necessary.

The Opposition do not object to the Minister said, is a technical measure amendment to the 1939 Act if that Act reality. But we urge the Government export-import procedures. In the l Government have a long-term future, w other legal vehicles be brought forwa control of exports and imports appropriate than the obviously dated

6.57 pm

Mr. Sainsbury: With the leave of reply. The hon. Member for Gateshea has expressed her support for the Bil grateful. I note what she said about t used the expression "for ever and ever." not suggest that the 1939 Act should legislation for ever and ever, but it is consideration whether it would be app it. In practice, very few people have occ original Act and would look at the orders, with which the hon. Lady is familiar and which are set out in more modern language, not in terms of dealing with the enemy.

With regard to the Iraqi supergun, as I hoped I made clear in my introductory remarks, it is for those seeking to export items to satisfy themselves whether a licence is required. The mechanism for controlling the export of military equipment and components from this country is the licensing regime administered by my Department, under the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1989, made under the 1939 Act. It is for exporters to take reasonable steps to find out what they are making and disclose all relevant facts when asking about the need for a licence. A licence would have been needed to export components for a long-range gun to any destination, and would not have been granted for export to Iraq. In 1988 exchanges took place between Government Departments and industry in which advice was sought about the need for licences in relation to certain tubes. No basis was found for advising the companies that the tubes were subject to licence, and industry was accordingly informed that no export licences were required.

In the light of the Iraqi supergun case, the relevant Departments have reviewed their procedures. The hon. Lady asked about the effectiveness of those procedures. Some improvements have already been made and others will soon be made. The aim of the improvements is to remove any scope that may exist for misunderstanding between inquirers and Departments and ensure that all information available to the Government, which might be relevant to particular export proposals, is taken into account when deciding whether a licence is necessary and, if so, whether it should be granted. I hope that the hon. Lady will be reassured by what I have said.

Question put and agreed to.

Bill accordingly read a Second time.

Bill committed to a Committee of the whole House. —[Mr. Nicholas Baker.]

Bill immediately considered in Committee; reported, without amendment; read the Third time, and passed.

Weapons

7 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Home Department (Mr. Peter Lloyd): I beg to move,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 10074/89 and 8836/90, relating to controls on the acquisition and possession of weapons; and endorses the Government's view that any Directive must preserve the right of Member States to make those checks that are necessary for public security and public safety and that any additional burden on business should be kept to a minimum.

I welcome the opportunity to debate this important draft directive on the Floor of the House. The Commission has proposed the directive as part of the plan to complete the single market. This proposal, advanced in November 1989, was revised in October this year to incorporate those amendments suggested by the European Parliament which the Commission had decided to accept. It is the October 1990 text, document No. 8836/90, on which recent negotiations in the Council have focused.

Firearms issues are nearly always controversial, but there is wide agreement on the two fundamental principles on which our domestic firearms legislation is based. First, and of paramount importance, is the need to ensure public safety. Second there is the need to safeguard the legitimate interests of those who use firearms in pursuit of their work or sport, subject always to the primary consideration of public safety. These two principles have guided our approach to this draft directive.

One of the directive's objectives is to increase security throughout the Community by the partial harmonisation of member states' firearms law. The directive sets a minimum standard of firearms control, to which all member states must adhere. This is intended to improve the safety of the Community's citizens. The admittedly modest degree of levelling up involved in this directive is something to which the Government can give wholehearted support.

Under the directive, in article 3, member states are left free to adopt more stringent controls in their domestic legislation. So there is no levelling down in domestic law, and it is important to keep that in mind when looking at the proposal. It guarantees that those standards of control which we consider necessary to protect public safety are unaffected.

The House may agree with me when I say that this has proved a complex and difficult text to understand, but the main aim of the directive is simple: it is to put in place sufficient compensatory measures to enable member states to abstain from controls on the possession of weapons at internal borders after 1992.

Underpinning these compensatory measures is the principle stated explicitly in the directive that the movement of firearms across Community borders is forbidden unless the rules of the directive are met. Perhaps the most important of these rules is that weapons prohibited under domestic legislation by a member state may not be brought into the territory of that member state. So, for example, the prohibition of some categories of weapons introduced by the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1988 is unaffected by the directive.

The primary compensatory measure proposed in the directive is the notification and information exchange system—in articles 11 and 13—which requires that member states are notified of every permanent transfer of firearms to their territory. Under article 11.4, member states can insist that the transfer may not take place without their prior consent. The result for firearms dealers in this country would be a system similar to that currently operated whereby dealers, duly authorised under the Firearms Acts passed between 1968 and 1988, may receive an open general import licence which places no restriction on the quality of firearms imported.

[Mr. Peter Lloyd]

For travel with personal firearms within the Community, the directive introduces a European firearms pass—article 1.4. But in general the pass will not itself convey authorisation to travel with firearms. The pass holder will still have to obtain prior authorisation from the member state to be visited—article 12.1.

However, there is an important exception to the status of the European firearms pass in relation to sportsmen and marksmen. Under article 12.2, sportsmen and women would be able to take their personal firearms freely to other member states on the basis of a European firearms pass without prior authorisation from the member state to be visited. This provision causes us particular concern, as it conflicts with our domestic controls on visitors.

The British visitor's permit scheme, set up under the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1988, allows overseas visitors to come and shoot here with the minimum of fuss and bother. But—and this is the fundamental point—the scheme requires visitors to obtain our prior authorisation for their visit.

Our concerns on this issue have been made clear both in official working group discussions and in the Council of Ministers. It has been gratifying that there has been a sympathetic response from our European partners, who have recognised the difficulty that this provision presents for the United Kingdom. The likelihood is that we shall be able to secure either an amendment to article 12.2 on the lines proposed by the European Parliament or a waiver from its provisions. In either case this would allow us to continue to operate the British visitor's permit scheme.

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): What is meant by the abolition of controls on weapons at international frontiers? We are grateful for what the Minister said about traders having to register and about new passes and licences, but if these controls are abolished, will that mean that people are not searched? Which controls will be abolished?

Mr. Lloyd: The directive means that at an internal frontier there will be no regular system of inspection for weapons. We retain the right to make searches and checks as we believe them necessary for our national security. I refer my hon. Friend to article 36 of the treaty, with which he will be familiar, as the basis on which we may retain that right. If the directive is adopted there will be no regular inspection of everyone coming in from the Community, but we retain the right to make such checks as we think necessary to maintain our security.

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): Will my hon. Friend confirm that a customs officer will still present to a passenger arriving in this country a list which will state clearly that firearms are not allowed and must be declared?

Mr. Lloyd: A Community traveller crossing an internal boundary will require prior permission and certification, but it will be perfectly legitimate for him t across the border. It will not be legitimate without the permit and authorisation. comes into force, we shall no longer insp regard firearms as goods that may no Anyone crossing the border with a gu already in the country—is legally requi appropriate permit; and, if any agent believes that a weapon is being carrie appropriate permission has not been gran the individual's possession, he will appropriate action, as he would have do

Mr. Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Ma we are making rather heavy weather o remains that anyone wishing to import a permanently or temporarily, requires spe tion under the 1988 Act. There is no directive's overriding that Act. That shou expressed by my hon. Friend the Memb East (Mr. Taylor)—and I think that I an that any of our own legislation that is mo the directive will apply.

Mr. Lloyd: Yes: our provisions relat legitimately be possessed in this country and it will not be legal to bring in a firea Community country without documente

Mr. Hill: This strikes me as exactly the It has not been improved at all.

Mr. Wiggin: What about the 1988 Ac

Mr. Hill: Will my hon. Friend kindly am trying to put my argument toge Southampton—part of which I repre important port, employing many custom a tremendous amount of work. I am tr that their vigilance will not be dim availability of a certificate. What about have no certificate, and do not declare wh I hope that the customs officers will not European directive which may make every[illegible]ng is under control.

Mr. Lloyd: I do not think that our cus want to shelter behind anything. The law provide that no obligation will be pla coming into this country to declare a firea has the correct permit. Of course, custo and all agents of Government will have a appropriate action if they suspect that a brought in without the correct authorisa

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Wa take it that a visiting sportsman with a port of Southampton, which is near my c a firearms certificate from the Comm which he was a national—if that was nation—and a European pass enablin round Europe with his gun would still visitor's permit? Will he really need documents?

Mr. Lloyd: He may have all three doc we insist on is the British visitor's perm the case.

Mr. Hill: What about the visiting te

Mr. Lloyd: The trouble with visiting terrorists who bring in weapons is that they do not declare them to customs officers, even at present.

As currently formulated, the directive suggests that member states must abstain from all checks on the possession of weapons at intra-Community frontiers: that is in article 15, and is what we have been discussing. We accept that other measures in the directive, which I have outlined—the ability to maintain prohibitions, the requirement for notification or prior authority and the information exchange system—provide sufficient safeguards to enable us to refrain from systematic checks on the possession of weapons at internal borders. We believe, however—as I told my hon. Friends a few moments ago—that we must retain the right to make checks that we consider necessary to safeguard public safety and security. We hold strongly to the validity of the general declaration annexed to the Single European Act, which states:

"Nothing in the provisions of the Act shall affect the right of Member States to take such measures as they consider necessary for the purpose of combating terrorism, crime and the traffic in drugs."

We shall continue to press for recognition that the rights affirmed by that general declaration, and by article 36 of the treaty of Rome—to which I referred earlier—remain unaffected by this directive. The United Kingdom is not alone in this approach, but has the support of some other member states.

We are, of course, concerned that any new requirements on business should be kept to the minimum consistent with providing for public safety. Careful consideration has been given to the implications of the directive for firearms dealers. We have had useful discussions with representatives of the trade; they asked for some minor but important alterations to the timing of the notifications on transfers of firearms which they would be required to provide under articles 11 and 13. Following concerns expressed by ourselves and other member states, the necessary changes have now been agreed. Given those modifications, the trade's view is that the directive will impose no new burden on their business.

I now propose to say a few words about some of the important definitions and technical details of the proposals, and how they affect our own domestic controls. I know that the definitional problems, which always arise in connection with firearms legislation, caused widespread concern in the shooting community when the directive was first published. Further concern was caused by some of the amendments proposed by the European Parliament. We have been glad to take full account of the views expressed by the representatives of the British Shooting Sports Council, which is co-ordinating the response of the sporting interests in the shooting community. Their concern, and ours, has been to obtain some major improvements to the original text. I am glad to say that, thanks to the vigorous and expert input from the United Kingdom and other member states, a number of improvements to the classifications and definitions of firearms have been achieved.

For example, in the category of prohibited firearms, the imprecise term is to be replaced by "automatic firearms". Hollow and soft-point ammunition, which is widely used for hunting and target shooting, is not to be prohibited as originally proposed but will be available to those with the appropriate authorisation. That is in line with our current domestic controls on such ammunition.

"firearms usually used as military weapons"

Following the firm expression of views by us and by other member states, it is now expected that the proposed minimum age limit of 18 for the possession of certain firearms will not apply to sportsmen and target shooters: that will allow youngsters to continue to participate in shooting sports, and will leave our domestic controls unchanged.

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): Will my hon. Friend add to that a clear statement that no further restrictions will be placed on disabled persons who wish to take part in shooting activities?

Mr. Lloyd: I was coming to that. My hon. Friend is right to raise the point, and we too have been concerned about it.

Similarly, the mental and physical capacity requirements proposed for possession of firearms, which may have been seen as discriminatory—indeed, I think that many of us thought them so—are expected to be dropped as they relate to many people who play an active part in shooting.

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): It is terribly worrying for hon. Members who have prepared for the debate by reading all the necessary papers to find that all the measures that we have come here to complain about have been overturned. What, in fact, are we discussing?

Mr. Lloyd: I hoped that my hon. Friend might be pleased that we had made some progress since the last formal document was issued. Some of my hon. Friends may wish to make additional points; if my hon. Friend was indeed hoping for the change that I have announced, I can only say that I am sorry that he has been deprived of the opportunity to make a convincing speech, or, at least, found it unnecessary. I nevertheless hope that he will be gratified that the endeavours that he intended to make have already borne fruit.

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): I am annoyed that we have before us a document dated 3 October 1990. It is called a consultative document. I assume that it is the current document. It says explicitly:

"Without prejudice to Article 3, Member States shall allow the acquisition and possession of firearms classified in category B"— which is what we are talking about—

"only by persons who have good cause and who . . . are 18 years old or more".

It is infuriating that we are debating out-of-date documents. That is not the way to run Parliament. I want an explanation from the Minister.

Mr. Lloyd: Discussions are held continuously. When I know that progress has been made, I report to the House at the first opportunity. I am sorry that the document represents the position as it was some time ago. I understand the hon. Gentleman's irritation if he wished to make a speech about changes that he wanted to be made but that have already been made.

Mr. Randall: The Minister's explanation is not good enough. There is no excuse why the House should be debating a document in respect of which a change has been made, about which the Minister has notice but not the House. That is unacceptable. We ought to have had an explanation. It could have been given by letter. There are all sorts of ways in which it could have been explained. It is unacceptable that we should have out-of-date documents on policy matters that are important to both sides of the House.

[Mr. Randall]

Mr. Lloyd: I understand the hon. Gentleman's ire. We are debating the latest text that has been provided by the Commission. There has been agreement on certain matters, about which I hope the hon. Gentleman will be satisfied. They have not been written up but I am taking the first opportunity that I have to let him know about them. Our obligation is to discuss texts provided by the Commission. The fact that I am able to add to that should be helpful to hon. Members. It is better for me to do that rather than to conceal that there has been further agreement.

Mr. Randall: I accept that the Commission publishes documents at various times. However, the Home Office also publishes documents on European matters. It provides explanatory memoranda. There is no control whatsoever over the Home Office when it comes to publishing explanatory memoranda. Something could have been produced in time for the debate. Although changes have taken place, there is a mechanism that would have allowed that to happen. It has not happened. The Minister and the Home Office have let down the House. I do not see how we can continue the debate, since we are not sure what other changes have been made. It makes the quality of the debate dubious, to say the least.

Mr. Lloyd: I hear what the hon. Gentleman says and I understand his exasperation. We are debating a text published by the Commission with which we were not satisfied. I regret, in a way, that we were successful in further negotiations sufficiently early for me to be able to tell the hon. Gentleman verbally here, without having been able to provide that information in writing and without the Commission having been able to provide a new text.

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): I dare say that there have been developments since the Home Office document of 25 October which was published by the Minister. Naturally, we are interested in those developments. However, we are debating documents that have been published. The status of the assurances from the Minister is by no means clear. He says that agreements have been reached. Agreements with whom—with all the member states, or with the Commission? What reliance can hon. Members place upon such assurances if we do not know the nature of the agreements that are alleged to have been made? The Minister seems to be trying to pre-empt the discussion by bouncing the House in a wholly unacceptable way.

Mr. Lloyd: The House cannot be bounced at this point. It is making no decision other than to adopt the Government's general stance in the negotiations. The fact that I was able to say that it looks as though on some points we have been more successful in the negotiations than we were when the document was published in no way bounces the House. In fact, it ought to bring some cheer to hon. Members.

Mr. Wiggin: I very much welcome the Minister's announcement. In many respects it deals with our worries. However, having gone to great trouble to change an important international engagement in order to be here tonight, I have to complain to the Minister that the debate need not have been held in its present form. The major points have been dealt with, but there may still be need for further debate. To conduct the debate on the basis of the document that is before us is no longer sensible. I thank my hon. Friend for the negotiations that he has carried out and I congratulate him on his success, but may I suggest that we ought to adjourn the debate and return to it later, if there are outstanding points still to be considered?

Mr. Lloyd: I hear what my hon. Friend says, but the motion before the House is to approve the Government's negotiating stance.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) asked about the status of the improvements. Agreements are reached in the Council's official working group. They have the general approval of the representatives of the other member states.

I understand the irritation of hon. Members, because we have been more successful, and more quickly successful, than some of us might have hoped. I shall reflect upon the machinery that is available to make sure that the very latest position is communicated to hon. Members before a debate is held. When, however, negotiations are taking place not just at regular and predictable intervals but all the time, there is a problem. I shall reflect upon how the House ought to be informed of these matters, but it is not primarily a Home Office matter. It is for the appropriate Committees of the House to consider the machinery whereby European directives and documents can be debated by hon. Members.

Mr. James Wallace (Orkney and Shetland): We are not just being asked to endorse the Government's stance; the motion also asks the House to take note of documents that patently are out of date. I understood the Minister to say that the provisions relating to disabled people are expected to be dropped. "Expected to be dropped" is somewhat different from saying that already there is an agreement. That highlights our problem. We are not sure what parts have been agreed, what parts might be agreed and what likelihood there is that they will be agreed. Will the Minister explain what he means by "expected to be dropped" and whether that differs from an agreement?

Mr. Lloyd: That was the tenor of the agreements in the working group. We believe that the wording will be changed in a wholly satisfactory way. The motion before the House is to approve the Government's negotiating stance; it is not that the House should approve any particular wording. What is useful about the debate, which has not been welcomed as much as I hoped that it would be, is that I have been able to inform the House about agreements that have been reached in the working group. Moreover, it enables me to take on board—because the discussions are continuing—any other points that hon. Members wish to impress upon the Government, since we believe that they ought to form part of our negotiating stance.

Mr. Randall: On a point of order, Mr. Deputy Speaker. I should like your advice. If we divide the House, will we be voting on the EC document before us or on the Government's negotiating stance which has been presented orally by the Minister? It is crucial to know that because the motion before the House is a take-note motion and it refers to a document. If we vote on the motion, we have to accept that the words of the EC document are extant on the technicalities. The Minister has just said that if we were to vote we would be voting on the Government's stance in the negotiations that have taken place since the publication of the documents as well as the Home Office internal memorandum.

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Sir Paul Dean): I can help the House. We are debating the motion on the Order Paper. There are two key points in the motion. It says that we should, first, take note of certain European documents and, secondly, endorse the Government's view as expressed in the motion. Therefore, were there to be a Division, we would be voting on the motion with those two aspects in mind.

Mr. Frank Haynes (Ashfield) rose——

Mr. Lloyd: I shall give way to the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. Haynes: I should think that the Minister would give way. That is what we are here for. We are here to discuss the document. I am sick of being kicked around by the Government, and that is what is happening. The Minister is ducking about all over the place. He does not know where he is and nor do we. I had a document dated 2 October. That is what is on the Table.

I do not accept what the Minister has said. He is bringing a verbal report to the House which is not satisfactory. My hon. Friend the Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) is right in saying that we should have had a report from the Home Office so that we can consider the matter properly. I have had a going over about these proposals by my constituents in Ashfield. I am here representing the people who have given me a going over and I am not satisfied with the Minister's explanation.

I agree with the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin) that we should adjourn the debate until we have all the information necessary to discuss the matter properly. As I have said, I am sick to death of being kicked around by the Government. They think that they can do what they like because of their large majority, but I am afraid that they cannot. We are all here because we are not satisfied with the way things are going.

Mr. Lloyd: The hon. Gentleman is protesting far too much. Nobody would dream of kicking him around. I always find it illuminating to give way to the hon. Gentleman, but that was one of his less illuminating interventions. If he has points to make on behalf of his constituents, he is welcome to make them if he catches your eye, Mr. Deputy Speaker.

Mr. Haynes: Do your job properly.

Mr. Lloyd: We have done our job so well that I am able to tell the House that we have achieved in negotiations some of the things that the hon. Member for Ashfield (Mr. Haynes) and other hon. Members would be pressing us to achieve in the next few weeks. The hon. Member for Ashfield is sad because the Government have already done some of the things that he was going to ask us to do.

In case the hon. Member for Ashfield did not notice, the document before the House is the latest text provided by the Commission, and it is our duty to bring it before the House. When I came to the debate I was pleased to bring some good news. Perhaps on future occasions I should suppress such news. However, that would be unfair and unreasonable and I would do no such thing.

I want to touch on two other matters. The first I mention for clarification and the second for its legal significance. The House will have noted that, although the scope of this directive extends not only to firearms but also to weapons such as knives and crossbows, the compensatory measures proposed relate only to firearms. In effect, the domestic law on such weapons is left unchanged by this directive.

Lastly, I draw the House's attention to the question of the legal base of article 100A proposed by the Commission for the directive. We doubt whether that is appropriate, since it seems to us that one of the main aims of the directive is to facilitate the freedom of movement of persons carrying firearms as personal baggage. In our view, article 100 or article 235 may be more appropriate for the legal base. We have put our views to the Council Legal Services which is still considering the matter. Its formal opinion is expected to be delivered shortly. We will need to look carefully at what it says before we can reach a final conclusion on the matter. We shall continue to work constructively within the Council to reach a directive which maintains public safety and which is workable and legally acceptable.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: Is it the case that, unless the Council agrees unanimously to the Government's point that it should not be article 100A, nothing can happen? If the Council does not agree with the Government's point of view, what can they do about it?

Mr. Lloyd: We could determine whether we believed that the base chosen would not stand up in law and whether the European Court would direct that it was wrong. Before we did that, we would have to consider carefully all the arguments and whether we were likely to win them. I know that my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) is very knowledgeable about these matters. We have said that we believe that the Commission has proposed the wrong case. We are seeking to persuade the Commission and our colleagues in the EC that it should be article 100 or article 235. The Commission is due to provide us with a formal response to our arguments, but we have not had that yet. When we receive it, we can consider more sensibly and effectively what course is open to us, unless, of course, the Commission agrees with us.

Mr. Taylor: I want to clarify this point because none of us knows the answer. If, despite the Minister's splendid points, the Commission says, "We are sorry but we think that it should be article 100A", does its view stand unless there is unanimous disagreement? My understanding is that that is so. There must be a unanimous rejection of the Commission's view and if, for example, Portugal or Greece thinks that it should be article 100A, that is it.

Mr. Lloyd: Luckily, I can tell my hon. Friend that the answer is yes. Unanimity is required to change the legal base.

Mr. Wiggin: The Home Office memorandum says clearly that the Council shall act by a qualified majority. Therefore, there is a difference of opinion.

Mr. Lloyd: On the legal base proposed by the Commission, the operation will be by qualified majority. Under the articles we are suggesting—article 100 or article 235—it will be by unanimous agreement. I was answering my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East about how the base is determined. His fear was correct. As I said earlier, it is theoretically possible for us to challenge that on legal grounds and that would be a matter for the European Court. I would not like to hold out too much hope that that would be an avenue that we would think it wise to go down. If we did, I do not know whether it would be successful. However, it is a possibility.

I have taken more time than I intended in bringing good news to the House, so I will now commend the motion. I will listen carefully to any changes, strengthening or alterations that right hon. and hon. Members propose, because discussions on the directive continue.

7.39 pm

Mr. Stuart Randall (Kingston upon Hull, West): The House has discussed the status of the document before us, and I want to add one further comment about that before beginning the main part of my speech. As the officials in Brussels have already reached agreement on allowing young people aged 14 and above to use firearms, why was there not sufficient time to produce an additional explanatory memorandum to explain that?

Mr. Colvin: Is the age limit really being lowered to only 14? I thought that it was to be lowered to 17 years of age. Perhaps I misheard my hon. Friend the Minister.

Mr. Randall: I shall deal with that point in detail later. However, there is concern that children of 14 who, under current British Law, and under proper supervision, can fire pistols or rifles will not be able to do so under the directive.

The purpose of the measure is to harmonise the acquisition and possession of weapons within the European Community as part of the progress towards a single unified market. However, it will provide only partial harmonisation, because each member state can operate independent firearms legislation, provided that it meets certain minimum standards. In practice, the directive will mean that arms traders, sportsmen and others, will be able to move freely within member states with their own firearms provided that certain limited conditions are met.

I support the development of the so-called single European market, because I believe that Britain's future is firmly linked to the EEC's development. I want to see the Community thrive, for the sake of not only the people of Britain but the people of the other member states.

Despite the need for degrees of harmonisation, we must remember that the commodity covered by this directive is not wine, cheese, or computer technology but firearms, which deserve special consideration, given that public safety is at stake.

The Commission must not full steam ahead in such a way that it could prejudice public safety. If that happened, such innovations by the Commission and the Council of Ministers would be strongly resented by the British public. There is a balance to be struck between harmonisation as part of developing the single market and protecting public safety. Where there is any doubt, public safety must always receive top priority.

The thrust of the directive seems reasonable in attempting to make it easier for responsible sportsmen and those who trade in shotguns and other weapons to travel with their firearms within the EEC. However, to achieve that objective, the Commission is proposing the abolition of internal border checks. At the same time, it is proposing weak compensatory measures. The net effect will be an unacceptable threat to public safety.

There is at issue a broader question than trade, and it is one for which the EEC is not responsible. I refer to national security. The removal of border checks between the United Kingdom and other member states could be regarded as a charter for terrorism. With the help of a few forged documents, members of all kinds of terrorist organisations would be able to move freely within the EEC with various weapons, to plant bombs, and to cause havoc. It is vital that internal border checks remain, especially for Britain, because of the problems that we have with the IRA. Accordingly, the availability of good intelligence and a policy of targeted checks at internal as well as external borders are crucial ingredients in combating terrorism.

Mr. Wiggin: The legitimate owner of firearms has always made the argument that, while legislation documents rules and controls are made to apply to honest straightforward people, the terrorist will never obey any law—however comprehensive it may be.

Mr. Randall: That point is central in my thoughts. The Commission is directing its attention to the legitimate users of firearms to whom the hon. Gentleman referred but in removing internal border controls, it will also allow terrorist threats to emerge. I am not privy to internal Government security policy, and rightly so, but, as that aspect is part of the directive, it must be raised. I shall refer later to sportsmen, targeters, and others. My point is that Britain's national security is not within the competence of the EEC, and once border checks are done away with threats would emerge.

Mr. Teddy Taylor: I agree absolutely with the hon. Gentleman that the directive will create additional security problems and greater dangers for the British public. What does Labour think we should do about that? This measure will probably be passed by a majority vote next week and whether we like it or not, will become the law of the land. I should love to know what the Opposition think we should do about that. It is a genuine question.

Mr. Randall: The hon. Gentleman is pre-empting my speech, but he asked a reasonable question. The measure is totally flawed and concerns a matter that is outside the competence of the Commission. Certain national considerations are beyond the scope of the document, and I am inclined to vote against it.

Any measure that will help sportsmen and other genuine members of the public to move around Europe with their firearms more easily is entirely laudable and acceptable, provided that it does not imperil public safety. We can let the Commission know in the strongest possible terms that we oppose the basic structure of this document by voting against it—that is all the power we have as parliamentarians. That is why we will suggest that there should be a Division.

These are security matters. It is necessary to have intelligence and targeted checks at borders. There will be immense problems in Britain because of the number of people who will go through the channel tunnel, but we must also be vigilant in dealing with terrorism.

In proposing the abolition of internal border checks, the directive advocates the introduction of several compensatory measures. The first is to toughen external border checks. On its own, that seems a reasonable proposal. However, as Britain is on the periphery of the EEC and forms part of the external border, and as we have special problems with the IRA compared with other member states, it is exceedingly unlikely that the proposal in the directive to strengthen external border checks will result in much change—certainly not along the external border of Britain—because our authorities will almost certainly have taken the necessary steps to combat terrorism in that way. The directive's proposal will not add anything in particular. Anything that helps to restrict terrorists' ability to import weapons to the EEC via other external borders is clearly welcome.

A second compensatory measure is the proposal that firearms legislation throughout the Community should meet certain minimum standards. Ours goes well beyond what I would envisage to be the minimum standard. If certain member states wish for their own reasons to have firearms legislation that goes beyond those minimum standards, it is a matter for those member states to decide. In practice, this means that there will be disparities between various member states, in terms of not only legislation but the border controls that the firearms legislation determines. The Firearms (Amendment) Act 1988 resulted in the British visitor's permit, which allowed personal firearms to be checked at borders for compliance with the scheme. It should be noted that removal of the controls would result in the British visitor's permit scheme becoming inoperable. It seems, from what the Minister said in response to an intervention by the hon. Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor), that the opportunity for spot checks will disappear. Those powers which exist at the moment to carry out such spot checks will cease to exist because of the directive.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I said that the Customs controls that exist at present will cease under this directive, but a central part of our stance in the negotiations is opposition to controls for internal borders—certainly ours. We want targeted checks based on intelligence, and I think that the hon. Gentleman agrees. They will remain essential. They are the means by which firearms brought in illegally are found now. We intend to maintain the use of intelligence and checks as our security dictates, although the directive would mean that blanket checks at a normal, old-fashioned international border may not be maintained between Community countries.

Mr. Randall: These are matters of security and I am not an expert on them. I should have thought that, the greater the belt-and-braces approach in security matters, the better. We have seen many examples of the way in which IRA arms stores have been found purely by chance and by spot checks. I should regret any weakening of those powers.

A third compensatory measure proposed in the directive for the removal of internal border checks is the establishment of an information system, the purpose of which is to provide data for member states describing which firearms have crossed their internal borders and entered their countries. I should be grateful if the Minister would tell the House—I am confused about this—whether the Commission proposes that a centralised records system should be set up for the whole of the EEC. Will he tell the House exactly what the functions of the system will be? How will this system compensate for the loss of border controls? Who will control it? As we have centralised police forces, does it mean that every police authority in Britain will have to interact with this system?

If I understand the system properly, it is a bureaucratic nightmare. Instead of that nonsense, I would rather our police were on the streets dealing with crime. That is what this country needs. I should be grateful if the Minister would give detailed answers to those points, because I am sure that the House wants to know the details.

It is important to recognise that the problems of terrorism, particularly the IRA, extend to other member states, rather than being associated only with the United Kingdom. That can best be illustrated by an article in The Times dated 18 June 1990 and entitled "European police forces co-operate in fight against terrorism". It is about the co-operation between the Dutch and Belgian authorities in arresting a suspected IRA terrorist on 16 June 1990—the Donna Maguire affair. I shall quote a little of it because it is enlightening. The article states:

"Interior ministers across the European Community are fully aware that the latest IRA bombing and shooting campaign against British bases and army personnel in West Germany and the Netherlands represents the most serious terrorist threat on the Continent since the wave of anarchist class warfare in the 1970s . . .

The IRA challenge is in some ways greater. As customs and immigration checks in the European Community (EC) becomes more relaxed due to increased economic integration, Irish republican terrorists find it easier to move across borders.

Last April . . . the head of West German's Federal Police, warned that a single Europe would make his country an even more tempting target for the IRA and other terrorist groups. IRA units have exploited this openness, striking at British bases and personnel and escaping in minutes across a border . . .

In response, European police forces have increased their co-operation . . . European Community interior ministers . . . agreed to streamline the exchange of information on terrorist groups, including the establishment of a European Common Information System. This will involve setting up a data base."

It seems odd that, with so much going on, the Commission is attempting, through the draft directive, to relax border controls on people and firearms. It does not make much sense.

The directive is based on the Schengen agreement, which has resulted in the lifting of certain border restrictions between the Benelux countries and Germany. What may be desirable or necessary for some EC member states on border controls may not apply to us.

It is surprising that the Commission has produced a draft directive that does not seem to take into account the disparity in firearms legislation and border controls between member states. The genuine concern of member states about their national security should have been taken into account in earlier drafts of the directive. National security is not a negotiable matter, so I hope that the draft, which is badly flawed, will be amended to take vital matters into account before it finally goes to the Council of Ministers.

We debated the matter of age earlier. Perhaps the Minister will tell us what the present feeling is in Brussels. I presume that the officials are negotiating those matters. Is there movement or is there likely to be movement on relaxing internal borders?

Why is the Commission suggesting that the directive be approved by majority voting rather than by unanimity?

[Mr. Randall]

What derogation can the United Kingdom obtain on the ground of national security if majority voting is applied? Although those matters are complex and legal, I should be grateful if the Minister would give a detailed answer.

Paragraph 8 of the explanatory memorandum dated 25 October says:

"The Directive also introduces a European Firearms Pass . . . for EC nationals wishing to travel with firarms within the Community. In general the EFP does not in itself convey authorisation to enter another Member state with a firearm, but is intended to facilitate it".

The memorandum then lists the exceptions. What is the real purpose of the pass? Who will be the issuing authority? The Minister answered the question about the British visitor's permit. It seems that we shall run the two in parallel. Will the Minister confirm that? Will Britain take part?

We had a discussion about article 5 and there is still concern about it because it has not been finalised. The directive restricts the acquisition and possession of weapons to those who are 18 years of age or more. As we know, at present in the United Kingdom, 14-year-olds can shoot with pistols and rifles if they are supervised in doing that. I regretted very much that that restriction was in the directive. It showed a lack of contact by the European Commission in understanding what goes on in this country. I am sure that the Minister realises that, if the restriction were put into practice, the effect of so limiting young people would be disastrous for Britain's future Olympic hopes in shooting events. Young people would not be able to train in their sport and that would be a serious problem. Unless there were a serious threat to public safety, the Labour party would have strongly opposed that part of the directive tonight. However, I am delighted to hear from the Minister orally that there has been a change in that provision.

The Labour party also opposes parts of article 5 because they could impose restrictions on paraplegics. Unless there are good public safety reasons for those restrictions, we should reject them. It is important that people with physical disabilities are not unnecessarily discriminated against and that they are free to pursue sport in the way that they wish.

It is important to note that the safety record of sportsmen in Britain is one of the best in Europe and, indeed, the world. The Labour party, therefore, believes that firearms sportsmen should be free to pursue their interests without having petty and unnecessary regulations imposed on them, whether by the Commission, by the British Government or by the other institutions that are involved in firearms. However, that freedom must be based on the unstinting concern by sportsmen for public safety. If they have such a concern, they will always receive the full support of the British Labour party.

We are appalled by the quality of the document. It is flawed and it is not up to date. We will demonstrate our opposition to the way in which this business has been handled, and our support for young sportspeople and sportspeople in general by dividing the House on the directive.

8.5 pm

Mr. Jerry Wiggin (Weston-super-Mare): I only that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West Randall) had been speaking for the Opposition from Front Bench during the passage of the Firea (Amendment) Act 1988. I believe that there can harmony in this matter. In the course of his introduc remarks, my hon. Friend the Minister said several t that firearms matters were troublesome. The last thin the world that those of us who are fond of shooting is to have troublesome relations with the Governm There is no need to have troublesome relations with Government if—I repeat the principle that I enunci earlier in an intervention—it is recognised that law-abiding sportsman is not the person on whom force of law should descend. He does not commit crimes; he does not have the illegal weapons. At the of the 1988 Act, we were carried away, quite illogically the Hungerford incident and I do not want to refight t battles.

I must tell the House that I have an interest in matter as I have recently been elected chairman of British Shooting Sports Council—a post which is, s unpaid. I was grateful to my hon. Friend the Ministe acknowledging in his opening remarks that the council given some professional expert advice on this hi technical matter to the Home Office. I can assure my Friend that so long as I am chairman, the best pos relations will be established between that body and Home Office in the hope that we can come to sen solutions. I am sorry that we should always be consid to be a troublesome section of the community. Hund of thousands, if not millions, of people get a great de innocent fun from shooting in all its forms. It is not that there should be a conflict of interests between hobby and our Government.

I was immediately concerned to find that the "firearms" had been dropped from the heading of directive and that the word "weapons" had been used. word is used because weapons other than firearms covered by the directive. One mission that the Govern might care to pursue in Brussels is to differentiate bet firearms and all the other offensive weapons in wh have no interest and which I appreciate the nee control.

We must examine the purpose of the directive. I as being to establish an internal market in which the movement of goods and services is secured, to provid harmonisation as far as possible in national law member states and to ensure that member states conse or are aware of the import of weapons into their territ Many people in continental countries can go sho across a national border 50 miles down the road and countries' attitudes are, of course, quite different those pertaining in our island state. I suspect that the servant who drafted the directive is a contin gentleman living close to one of the national borders Brussels.

In the view of the shooting organisations, the dire should be primarily concerned with the question of frontiers rather than with attempts to impose fu restrictions on legitimate pursuits merely because involve the possession of firearms.

The progress of the directive has been long convoluted, and it has been complicated by diff understandings of some of its technical details which have arisen from the different use of language as well as from the different languages used in the official papers. Such is the confusion surrounding the directive—this has been confirmed tonight—that even allegedly the most up-to-date edition is likely to have been superseded already. I welcome the Minister's remarks and I understand the dilemma. As a result of masterful negotiations, concessions have been obtained in Brussels and from the other Community states, but it has not been possible to reorganise the debate. The House is well attended, given the subject that we are debating. I should point out, too, that many of us have changed our engagements and come a long way to attend the debate, and organisations have gone to a lot of trouble to prepare for it. It might have been better to wait a few weeks until the matter was set in concrete so that the few questions that remained in dispute could have been debated. Instead, we may have to make some points that have, in part, been conceded.

Mr. Dennis Skinner (Bolsover): I do not know whether the hon. Gentleman was here on Monday when the matter first came before the House. A couple of us tried to stop the directive being debated this week. We suggested to the Leader of the House that he should take it off and bring it back at a later stage because there was some argument about the Standing Orders and other matters. Perhaps it would be as well, even at this stage, to take the business off and bring it back at a more appropriate time. Does the hon. Gentleman agree that this is a typical Common Market cock-up?

Mr. Wiggin: The hon. Gentleman conducts his own permanent campaign on these matters and is most assiduous. But I am interested in the subject that we are debating tonight.

It now appears that, whatever its eventual form, the directive will place less emphasis than it should on the primary intention of moving towards the freer markets envisaged for 1992 and is unduly concerned with imposing grater restrictions on ordinary people, even though there is little—if any—evidence to suggest that it is not safe for them to possess or transport weapons. Some of the very people on whom the directive will have the most impact are individuals who have established their reputations as people of the greatest integrity and have achieved fame and honour for this country as its representatives, at international level, in a whole range of shooting disciplines.

Much of the concern of the shooting organisations is centred on the confusion which continues to reign in respect of technical errors and imprecise—at times even unintelligible—translation. One could go through the directive chapter and verse, nit-picking one's way through a confusion of ideals and intentions. A number of aspects have been identified as particularly significant. The Minister mentioned age, in respect of which a concession has been obtained, but I think that my hon. Friend should examine carefully the endless debates that we had during the passage of the Firearms (Amendment) Act about the desirability of allowing properly supervised young people to shoot or to practise target drills at a much earlier age than 18. There is no reason why that should not be allowed; indeed, many of us in the House enjoyed those privileges in our early teens. There is no question of our having a disastrous record in this matter. Very few young people have been involved in firearms accidents. We must examine the facts before jumping to conclusions.

A restriction on the possession and use of semi-automatic weapons would have serious consequences for certain sports. I am sure that the Minister will recognise that a number of Olympic and world shooting disciplines involve the use of semi-automatic weapons.

I had the feeling that my hon. Friend the Minister had dealt with the question of military weapons, but simply to prohibit a weapon because it was once put to military use or considered to be of military calibre is a clumsy and heavy-handed way of dealing with a problem which, so far as I know, does not exist.

Some of the proposals in respect of trade appear to run counter to our supposed commitment towards open borders and would be guaranteed to cause confusion. Going beyond trade interests alone, any injudicious legislation runs two risks. The first is the risk of avoidance. The other is the risk of incurring a financial commitment in terms of compensation. Following the introduction of the 1988 Act, only 4,000 semi-automatic weapons were surrendered when the compensation scheme was introduced. At that time, the Government estimated that there were 20,000 such weapons in private possession. One can only guess at the whereabouts of the balance.

Hon. Members have mentioned the requirement for "mental and physical capability". That could lead directly to many disabled sportsmen being barred from following what is often regared as a therapeutic pursuit and would directly affect such events as the Paralympics.

The Government will need to keep in mind the effect that the proposals would have on income generated by visitors from places such as America and eastern Europe who come here specifically for the shooting. I am told that in Scotland alone the income from that source is estimated at £52 million a year.

Sir Hector Monro: It is more than that.

Mr. Wiggin: My hon. Friend says that it is more than that; it is certainly a very considerable sum and one would not wish to discourage such visitors.

Some of the European officials concerned seem to be intent on using the directive as an opportunity to deny individuals the right to possess weapons of any nature. I am happy to say that our Government repeatedly stated, during the passage of the Firearms (Amendment) Act, that that was not their intention and that they sought merely to ensure that weapons in private hands neither fell into criminal hands nor were used to harm the public at large. All the shooting organisations share that sentiment.

The shooting population in this country is already subject to some of the most stringent safeguards and is still absorbing and coming to terms with the effects of recent legislation. It does not believe that it would be helpful or pertinent if the side effect of a measure intended to achieve a reduction in border controls merely led to yet more restrictions, uncertainty and expense for legitimate shooters, especially as there is little evidence to suggest that they bear any direct responsibility for lawlessness, the illegal use or possession of weapons, or any activity against the interests of the state or the wider European Community. The shooting community would point out the contribution that shooting disciplines have made to greater harmony between the European states by way of international co-operation and friendly competition.

[Mr. Wiggin]

There are minor examples such as the possession of airgun pellets, although the Minister intimated that that point had been dealt with. The directive also requires the address of the holder to appear on a passport or identity card. There is no address on a British passport and I hope that we are not envisaging an identity card for firearms use.

I hope that the Minister will ensure that the British Shooting Sports Council's wisdom and enormous knowledge are used to the benefit of the nation and will acknowledge that our laws are already sufficiently severe without our allowing the nonsense in the directive to override them. I believe that the whole country is willing to co-operate with many of the directives which come from Brussels provided that they are sensible measures involving the harmonisation of trade and economics, but when they stray into social matters and matters of practice and habit—when, like this one, they represent sheer interference—we rather resent them. We hope that the Government will carry that message to Brussels forthwith.

8.18 pm

Mr. Robert Maclennan (Caithness and Sutherland): I begin by taking strong exception to the manner in which the debate has been initiated. Even without the Minister's speech and its revelations of developments of which the House had not been informed, I should have raised some questions about that. Certain matters should have been put before the House but we have not had the benefit of considering them.

In particular, I refer to the advice of the firearms consultative committee, to which the Home Office document refers but is not before us, and to the desirability of an update of the evidence of the police in this matter. From the Minister's document of 25 October it is apparent that he has received advice from the Association of Chief Police Officers, but the latest advice that I have been able to obtain is the copy of a letter that was sent to the Home Office in February which expressed great concern about the legislation. That letter, which is dated 20 February, spoke of the "revocation of existing legislation or its supplementation by European controls being, in the view of ACPO, extremely costly in all its collective forms, financial, administrative and, most importantly, the loss to public safety."

Does ACPO's concern persist in the light of the amendments on which the Minister has reported to the House? It must be admitted that that concern was expressed in the most general terms, but it is material to considering whether we should welcome the legislation.

If we approached the debate with uncertainty about the views of the police and firearms experts, our confusion was worse confounded by the Minister who clearly has had important negotiations on matters that were giving rise to concern among the shooting fraternity, about which the hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin) spoke so eloquently. I am bound to say that the Minister, not just as a matter of courtesy but as a matter of enabling the House to participate in an informed debate, should have taken steps before this evening to tell hon. Members of the developments prior to the debate to which he alluded. My right hon. Friend the Member for Tweeddale, Ettr Lauderdale (Sir D. Steel) wrote to the Mini 13 November raising this matter in general terms, might reasonably have expected a reply before the but no reply has been forthcoming.

I am bound to say that the debate proce extremely important in offering the House the opp to make an informed comment and possibly even a Minister in his diplomatic deliberations. We kn limits of our powers in matters flowing from the op of the Single European Act, but it does not li capacity——

Mr. Skinner: You voted for it.

Mr. Maclennan: I have no regrets about havi so, but it renders our power of advice almost l useless if we are unable to speak about an up situation in an informed way. The procedure seer severely weakened and rendered rather a mocker Minister's manner—almost in the sense that scoring points off the House by being in a pos announce matters of which we did not know. unfortunate.

There is another fundamental question ab Minister's approach that I must also raise. I refe Government's policy in respect of challenging t basis of this draft directive. It is strange that h have such substantial doubts about the basis on w draft directive is being brought forward Commission and that those doubts have not been even now. The Minister has no intention of seekin them resolved before the negotiations are concl answer to an intervention from one of his hon. Fri said that he thought that it would have been p have such matters dealt with under article 165, bu was not prepared to challenge the matter and to t the European Court. One is bound to question wh attaches any significance to the little dispute a basis of the draft directive.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: We attach great significanc argument. I clearly told the House—if the hon. Ge consults the record he will find that it is so—tha waiting for the Commission's legal advisers to co to us on the basis of the paper that we have giv arguing that the article base that the Comm recommending is the wrong one. We have pre argument and we are waiting for the definitive r

Mr. Maclennan: I do not find that very convinc draft directive has been in circulation for about tw Is it really beyond the influence of Her M Government to obtain an answer from the Com legal advisers in all that time? There has been argument about the substance, but surely the base a question to be resolved before issues of such s and detail are determined. If the whole thing is great deal of effort is being unnecessarily expende Government and other Governments. I question it is sensible to wait for legal advice for about tw As vital national interests are involved and to national security, if the Government have seriou about the legal base, those doubts should h resolved before the debate.

I now move from extremely important pu issues to the substance of the draft directive. I s much the same base as the Minister started, by attaching the highest importance to the security issues that the draft directive raises. It is clearly of great importance that no legislation that is passed by the European Community should in any way weaken the effectiveness of our controls over firearms acquisition and possession in this country. I have mentioned my uncertainty about the attitude of the police to the directive. I hope that the Minister may have something to say about the attitude of the police.

The difficulty that we face in considering security is that it plainly is an adjunct to the central purpose of the directive, which is to effect the single market and to enable people to travel more freely across boundaries whether or not they are carrying arms. As we know, the Schengen group of countries attaches much less importance than we do to border control. Therefore, these matters have been handled in a rather different way in the Schengen group. The Minister's letter of 25 October refers to the uncertainty of the attitude of other member countries—the southern member states of the Community and France in particular—to the very purposes of the directive. Perhaps he could say whether those countries have maintained Her Majesty's Government's position in the deliberations.

I doubt whether it makes sense to operate two sets of controls in this sphere within this country. There is one aspect in particular in which that appeared to be the outcome of what is happening with the proposals to introduce a European firearms pass in addition to the existing system for the British visitor's permit. I confess to some difficulty in understanding how those two systems of control over visitors will operate side by side. Perhaps the Minister can explain.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Many European countries have asked for no more than the European firearms pass. That is required by the directive, and the Schengen group of countries in particular look for no more. We look for more than that. We require the British visitor's permit in addition, to provide us with the extra security which we believe that we need.

Mr. Maclennan: That helps greatly to explain the position, but I am not entirely clear whether visitors to Britain would be required by Community law to carry one pass while Britain required an additional pass that would make the movement of, for example, those engaged in sporting activities within the Community even more difficult than at present.

It is right to emphasise that for practical reasons one does not wish to put barriers in the way of visiting sportsmen. The hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare mentioned the reasons. My information is that the value of shooting to the Scots is even higher than the £52 million suggested by the hon. Member. In February this year the Fraser of Allander Institute said that it was worth £78 million to Scotland alone. That is not an insignificant contribution to the Scottish economy, particularly as a great deal of it is spent in the less-favoured and sparsely populated areas where alternative employment is sometimes extremely hard to come by. We are not anxious to see that income lost.

I noted the opposition of sporting groups, at least at an early stage, to the provisions of article 11 of the draft directive. Article 11 would tighten control over entry from third countries into Britain. A great many Americans, east Europeans and others are interested in Britain's sporting facilities. We should not wish to make it unnecessarily more difficult for them to come here. I do not know whether the anxieties about article 11 were dealt with in the negotiations in a way that meets our needs. Perhaps the Minister could clarify that.

The minimum age limit provisions and the professional competence requirement for firearms dealers aroused the greatest anxieties among the sporting fraternity. The Minister seemed to say that those difficulties had been removed in the working group. If that is so, a considerable step has clearly been taken in removing the anxieties of those who rightly take the view that young people should not be debarred—indeed, they might reasonably be encouraged—to enjoy the sporting opportunities of shooting at targets. Young people, especially those living in rural areas who are trained in the use of firearms for vermin control on farmland, should not be inhibited in acquiring skill and competence in handling firearms at an early age. Country people throughout Britain attach great importance to such matters. We must have absolute clarity on them, not merely an assurance that the Government believe that they have got it right. It would have been better if the Government had come to the House with a firm statement in writing to enable us to be clear about the matter.

It would be appropriate for the Minister to tell us whether his view has changed from that expressed on 25 October when he said:

"It is difficult to see how partial harmonisation can achieve the establishment and functioning of the internal market."

That goes back to the legal question that I raised earlier but it is also a policy question. If partial harmonisation is not strictly necessary and will not bring about the establishment of the internal market, why are we doing it? That is a serious question. The Minister may have told us of the advance that he has made in eliminating difficulties, some of which I referred to, but that does not solve the problem that I raised. Perhaps the principle of subsidiarity should have operated in this case. It was not strictly necessary for this draft legislation to be considered. As the Minister and the House are aware, I am a strong supporter of the operation of the internal market and the development of the European Community's institutions. But I am not in favour of meddlesome legislation that gives rise to widespread anxieties about security.

I shall be delighted if the Minister can put his hand on his heart and say that disabled sportsmen will not be precluded from participating in paraplegic sporting activities as a result of changes which may or may not have been agreed in discussions. Let him be in no doubt that the majority of hon. Members would regard it as preposterous if, by a side wind, the disabled were deprived of that opportunity. It cannot be sensible and it cannot be the purpose of the legislation.

The draft directive is of considerable importance. I acknowledge that it is difficult to reconcile the interests of the various communities that have an interest in it. Plainly, some people would like to see the controls greatly relaxed. Others, particularly the police, would like to see perhaps even greater and tighter national control. Then, of course, there is the European Community dimension. I understand what the Minister is trying to do. He is probably broadly on the right lines, but if the House is to participate in ensuring that he gets it right, he will help us considerably by making available the relevant information prior to the debate. That is perhaps the message with which I should like to leave him.

[Mr. Maclennan]

8.37 pm

Sir Hector Monro (Dumfries): I agree with the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) that what we really need at the end of the day is clarity about exactly where we are. My hon. Friend the Minister certainly helped us greatly tonight, but I wish to clarify several points with him because his speech was interrupted so often that he never made a firm statement on some important issues.

I begin by seeking to clarify the distinction between weapons and firearms. I caused some consternation at Edinburgh airport yesterday when I brought a skean-dhu with me to wear with my kilt at a St. Andrews night dinner tomorrow. However, it all arrived in one piece.

We seek to achieve a common denominator and harmonisation within Europe on firearms. Helpful as my hon. Friend the Minister has been, he must realise that many voluntary organisations and governing bodies such as the National Small-bore Rifle Association—of which I happen to be the president—the National Rifle Association, the British Association for Shooting and Conservation, the British Field Sports Society and the Clay Pigeon Shooting Association have all worked in recent weeks to produce intricate briefs for Members of Parliament for the debate. If they had been aware of the information that my hon. Friend the Minister would deploy early in his speech, it would have saved many people a great deal of time.

Those organisations had to go into the matter because, naturally, those who are interested in shooting are suspicious of the Government. In recent months the Home Office and the Department of the Environment had the shooting world in some turmoil over the birds directive which was to put pests on a special list. That would have been most unreasonable and, fortunately, the Government changed their mind. We are anxious to keep a close eye on what the Government are doing about shooting.

The 1988 Act, in which many hon. Members who are present were involved, showed how the Government, for the right motives, reached wrong solutions. The Act makes sporting shooting more difficult to enjoy than it should be. Many chief officers of police have different interpretations about firearms and shotgun certificates and make life difficult for legitimate sporting enthusiasts. I hope that the consultative committee set up by the Home Office will smooth out some of the continuing problems which are not going away.

Because we have already had so much detail in this debate, I can skip over some of the issues which I wished to raise. I want to be clear on where we stand on three important issues. My hon. Friend the Minister said that he was dealing with the age 18 restriction. Can he say whether, under this directive, those aged 10, 12 or 14 will be able to shoot under supervision?

Mr. Peter Lloyd: Perhaps I can help my hon. Friend on the agreement of an age limit. Our domestic law should apply to those who come from abroad and wish to shoot here. Provided that they have the right papers and a British visitor's permit, they are permitted to come.

Sir Hector Monro: That is helpful. In other British shooting public of any age can sh supervision without any problem, for exampl and in school competitions such as the Ashbur

Mr. Lloyd: I tried to explain in my openin that British domestic firearms legislation wou modified by this directive. What has chang Community rules for movement from one C country to another. Our legislation remains as Sir Hector Monro: That is helpful. We are useful collection of Government statements wh that the Minister will put together so that th world may know where it stands. When he pro document, I hope that he will be clear abou meanings of the words, "use", "own", and because the firearms world seems to be in s about where it stands on them.

Can the Minister tell us whether air rifle pel illegal? As the hon. Member for Caithness and said, that is important, as are questions about bullets which are used in deer stalking. My hon. Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wig about weapons usually used as military weap rifles and pistols commonly used in target shoo military use or originally had one. Therefore, t good definition for dealing with firearms.

My hon. Friend the Minister was interrupt spoke about disabled people. Will he be a explicit about mental and physical capacity? H Europe would give way on that, but I am not su Who is to judge mental capacity—the chief police? Who is to judge physical capacity? passage of the 1988 Act the Government sympathetic towards disabled people and para

I remember having to divide the Hou amendment because they refused to allow disa to use self-loading rifles, which is essential for cannot withstand the normal recoil of a bolt-action rifle. The Government did no disabled in that instance. Will disabled sho problems using a rifle in this country in futu would be a harsh decision for people who enjoyment from this form of sport. One of ou shooters is a world record holder and it unfortunate if we restricted his opportunities to in competitions. I hope that the Minister will about where disabled sportsmen stand. organisations would not have raised that with detail if they were not gravely worried.

I am particularly interested in those who from without the European Community. We visitors permits and now we are to have certificate. I do not want to see controls int those who come from beyond Europe to sporting facilities. Both my hon. Friend the Weston-super-Mare and the hon. Member fo and Sutherland spoke about encouraging sp come here to enjoy our shooting facilities, those in Scotland. As the hon. Gentleman righ the Fraser of Allander Institute conducted survey and published a report this year showi worth £78 million to Scotland. A large propo sum comes from overseas visitors. It is important for the Scottish rural economy, par hotels, restaurants and estate staff, that visitors come to shoot. Anything that prevents overseas sportsmen from coming to put money into the Scottish economy, or the English or Welsh economies, would be gravely resented. I hope that the Minister will not build up a bureaucratic licensing system for these visitors.

We are talking not only about visitors who come for sporting facilities, but about those who come for target shooting. Sporting shooting developed from the old Commonwealth. Many of our visitors come from beyond Europe to participate at Bisley and elsewhere. Australians, New Zealanders and Canadians are at the heart of the visiting shooting community. We do not want to build up a whole host of problems for them because we are harmonising a system of firearms certification within Europe.

I hope that the Minister realises that the directive has caused a furore in the shooting world, particularly in sporting and target shooting. Although what he has said shows a substantial step forward, until we have it in black and white we shall be worried that some points will again be changed in Europe. He must fight as hard as possible to help those who are interested in this legitimate form of recreation.

8.49 pm

Mr. Teddy Taylor (Southend, East): My hon. Friend the Minister will have noticed that most of those who have spoken tonight have found the proposals highly disagreeable. Some have said that they will cause inconvenience to the shooting sport, others that they will cause damage and danger to the general public. Whichever way we look at it, hon. Members have spoken of the new proposals as being unnecessary, dangerous, bureaucratic and costly nonsense.

What worries me is that it is purely accidental that we have had the benefit of debating these proposals at a reasonable hour. My hon. Friend the Minister is aware of the circumstances that led to the directive being debated here today rather than in one of those anonymous Committees to which the Whips send safe people to discuss such matters so no one will notice them. We also have an obligation to the Welshmen, who did not take so long today as they usually do.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) was greatly exercised about the use of article 100A, but that is nothing new. The EEC Commission has been deliberately and systematically using article 100A for a variety of measures which have nothing to do with free trade. The Minister said that he has raised, and will raise, the matter with the Commission, but what we are discussing is not just a problem which may affect sportsmen or marksmen but something affecting the basic democratic rights of the House.

I am sure that the Minister will recall, as he took an interest in these matters at the time, that the then Prime Minister assured us that under the Single European Act majority voting powers would be used only in matters concerning free trade, rather than for irrelevant nonsense. The Minister may recall reading the report of the Select Committee, which sought the advice of Speaker's Counsel on one directive and was advised that if the Commission used majority voting on this directive, it could use it on anything.

I see the Minister sitting with letters from the shooting organisations and taking a great interest in them, but what can he do? We can make a complaint, but unless every member state agrees with our complaint, we have had it and the Commission will decide. If the Commission wants a majority vote, it stays a majority vote unless Portugal, France, Italy and Germany and all the others say that it is wrong. I have done some careful checking and, so far as I can discover, that has never happened, so there is a constitutional problem that we cannot ignore. While hon. Members hope for great things from 1992 and free trade, we should be aware that we are not getting free trade. For example, we are not getting it in insurance or any other sectors which count and which would help people and jobs, but we are getting piles of harmonisation on silly issues such as this, which have no real relevance to free trade.

I hope that the Minister will accept that this is a dangerous measure which could cost lives. We know that people are constantly trying to get weapons into the country—from the Republic of Ireland, but far more regularly through Belgium and other European countries. To stop this, we need regular checks, but the directive will not allow us to have those regular checks. The Minister said that we shall still be able to have target checks. If Customs and Excise have reason to suspect certain people because they look funny or because they are carrying big bags, they can make checks, but the regular checks on which we depend to find weapons and save lives will not be allowed.

The people of Northern Ireland have gone through agonies for a long time, but people throughout the country are concerned about guns and their uses, as we should be. I telephoned the Police Federation today to find out its view on this. I am sure that the Minister will know that it has strong views, and I am sure that his excellent officials will be able to tell him what it thinks. I also know what the Association of Chief Police Officers thinks, and I am sure that the Minister's officials will have had its advice. I know that it does not think that this is a grand idea. It is a dangerous idea.

I appeal to the Minister, to the Labour party and to all other parties to say what we can do about the situation. We know that the directive is illegal because the Commission is using article 100A when it should not and is taking over policy from the House of Commons. I am not being anti-European—I am anti the abuse of EEC powers by the Commission. We must do something about this, because unless we do, we shall find that in all areas of policy—even on shooting magpies, as my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin) said—the EEC will decide to do something and get it through by majority voting. That is illegal and against the rules. Speaker's Counsel said that it is not just a question of interpretation. Some of the officials who go backwards and forward all the time know exactly what is happening. My hon. Friend the Minister is one of the honest ones, and he knows what is happening. He knows that huge areas of policy are being taken away illegally, and we can do nothing about it through the rules. We have to get everyone to agree that something illegal is being done, but nobody ever will, so what on earth are we going to do about it?

Mr. Maclennan: The Minister said that it would be possible to take the matter to the European Court. The oddity is that he has not done so already.

Mr. Taylor: The Minister will be able to confirm that, until a determination is made by the Council, one cannot go to the court, and if one goes to the court, the case will take two years. In which case, has the court turned down a request for extra authority for the Commission? It never does. The European Court is not a legal court. Understandably, it is a political court, biased in favour not of political parties but of taking more and more power and authority for the institutions of the Community. Any hon. Member who doubts that should consider the case of the Spanish fishermen, which led to a huge area of power being taken away. For the sake of people whose lives will be put at risk by this directive, should we not say what the House of Commons can do? We can do nothing under the existing rules, but something has to happen—something has to be done.

Regular inspection is not just about guns. I am sorry that the Minister did not make this point. Without regular inspections, other objects will come in as well, such as flickknives, knuckledusters and swordsticks, which cause great offence. My hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare will be glad to know that we still have our British law which says that such objects are illegal, and the Common Market cannot touch that British law, but without regular inspections those items will still come in, as will guns. I assure the House that the police and the Department have said that without regular checks there will be an increase in the number of such objects coming in. All of that is set out in the Select Committee report.

Sadly, as always happens when we debate anything to do with the EEC, although it is vital to our democracy, the Press Gallery is empty. All the bright twits who represent The Times, The Daily Telegraph and The Independent and who say that they are concerned about people and their rights are interested in everything except the EEC. That is a threat to democracy, but ideologically they think that it is the best thing since sliced bread.

Mr. Colvin: Does my hon. Friend agree with what was said the other day about the EEC—that if the European Community applied to become a member of the European Community, it would not be admitted because it does not, as an entity, conform with the democratic principles enshrined in the treaty of Rome?

Mr. Taylor: My hon. Friend makes a fair point. The European Community is not democratic in that sense. It is not as though we are transferring powers from this House to another democratic body. These are non-elected bodies. That is one reason why the previous Prime Minister, whatever the views of her people, did a fantastic job in telling the people of Britain, "We must look carefully at the whole issue of economic control by a central bank." We may or may not want it, but we in Parliament do not want to talk about it. Nobody wants to think about it. Our former Prime Minister did a great job in forcing people to say, "These matters must be examined."

There is nothing we can do about the directive at this stage, even if the Government were to describe it as scandalous and shocking. It will probably be passed by a majority vote, and there is nothing we can do about that either. We cannot do anything about the u 100A because, as we know, the Greeks and a will never agree to our proposals.

Although we can do nothing in that contex to find some procedure by which we can re House the rights which legally we should st accept that we have surrendered power to the describe that as sad or otherwise, but we mu means of drawing the line. The Minister know an illegal document in relation to article 100A has any chance even to argue that it is legal. H is a dangerous document which could cost bureaucratic and costly document which w whole new lot of controls, computers and c and all of that effort will be unnecessary. In dangerous load of rubbish. We must consider prevent this sort of thing from happening i

9.1 pm

Mr. Peter Griffiths (Portsmouth, North): I the Minister on his opening remarks and I with those who have said that there wa undesirable or improper in his providing information, beyond that given in the written I admit that I did not come to the debate wit prepared speech, because I gathered that we to the Minister's explanation first and then re matters of interest to us. That has been the pr to that extent, the Minister's comments led u the debate.

Because some hon. Members have been c Minister, they have overlooked the fact that he give us the information that many of us ha House to obtain, but he invited us to point those points on which it would be desira further progress in the working party, throug through Ministers. We should be grateful for that has been made, and the Minister was ab most of the fears that law-abiding sho constituency have been putting to me in rec

I trust that the hon. Member for Kingsto West (Mr. Randall) is not seriously thinkin the House on the issue. If he does, he will be Henny Penny. She had every right to be c acorn fell on her head, but she grossly exagge when she set out to tell the world that the s in.

It would have been nice to have all the when preparing our remarks for the deb Minister did us the courtesy of providi information. Not only has it been important that knowledge, but we should do nothin discourage Ministers from providing informa simply because it had not appeared earli documents.

The key factor is that the directive wa improve the flow of trade and the moveme across EC frontiers. I regard that as an excel I accept the point made by the Government ensure that that does not disadvantage tho with legitimate matters of trade.

Out of tonight's debate has come the almo feeling that we must not damage the interests law-abiding shooters. Although we frequ phrase "law-abiding shooters," it should be unnecessary for it to be used. Shooters, almost by definition, are among the nation's most law-abiding people.

A constituent wrote to me this week saying that he was particularly careful in all matters concerned with shooting, even with parking and driving lest the constable with whom he happened to clash visited his home to inspect his firearms storage and security arrangements.

We must also remember that those who engage in shooting are not just passively concerned with security, as most of us are for most of the time, but are actively concerned with it—the law provides that they should be. However, they go beyond the requirements of the law and recognise that the very nature of their sport, be it target or rough shooting, could create a danger to security; they are greatly aware of that.

A misunderstanding has arisen during the debate about the security of people entering this country. Nothing in the directive will make any difference to the security checks that airlines carry out. They are conducted on the basis not of EEC directives but that people cannot board aeroplanes unless they are prepared to accept security checks, and that will continue. We have never searched every motor car coming into this country, and the idea that we have always checked everything in the past and are suddenly going to stop doing so is nonsense. Motor cars that could carry all sorts of goods come into the country and it would be physically impossible to check every one.

When intelligence suggests that an operation may be being undertaken, be it to do with drugs, weapons or people using false papers to enter this country, checks take place. That is the point at which the process of careful checks on papers, people and their property takes place, and there is no reason why that should not continue in future. As the Minister said, it will be possible to carry out security checks if there is a specific reason for doing so in an individual case, which is exactly the same as at present.

Presumably, the Minister could increase security by introducing far more checks. Border checks between Scotland and England might stop criminals with weapons moving from Glasgow to London, but nobody is suggesting that that is a desirable feature. We must appreciate that we live in a world in which people move more frequently and easily than in the past and national borders must facilitate the movement of people and goods. We need compensatory measures to ensure that there are careful checks on those coming into the EEC from outside and that we improve our intelligence networks with countries both inside and outside the European Community.

We should welcome the way in which the Government have developed the debate since the original directive was put forward. Has the Minister noted that the Vice President of the Commission responsible for the original directive was Mr. Bangemann? I do not know whether he considers that to be relevant, but I wanted to be the one to read that fact into the Official Report.

9.8 pm

Mr. Michael Colvin (Romsey and Waterside): It is often said that, when bad news comes, one should not shoot the messenger. The Minister came to the House this evening with news that we all wanted to hear, containing points that we were to raise in some of our speeches. He came with good news, but I have seldom known such a messenger to meet such a fusillade of shots. The reaction he received had less to do with the content of the draft directive and much more to do with the messy way in which the House deals with European legislation.

It seems pretty weird that the draft directive has been around since July 1987, yet the final amendments to it, which are so crucial and which the Minister has set out to us this evening, were not known until a few days ago. That is a strange way of proceeding.

The news that the Minister brought us, to use yet another sporting analogy, has shot our foxes. He made the very points that we were going to ask him to note before the Secretary of State went to the Council of Ministers arguing the toss on this country's behalf.

The Minister said that this debate and the directive would be of great interest to marksmen and sportsmen. I must declare an interest: I am both marksman and sportsman, and thus I am a member of a fairly large lobby. It is not often appreciated that a great many people in this country have firearm and shotgun certificates—about 1·1 million of them in all. That is 2 per cent. of the population; averaged out, it means that each of us represents about 1,300 constituents with such certificates. That is a significant lobby and it becomes vociferous when it feels that its rights are threatened.

Sportsmen and marksmen are the first to recognise the need for adequate controls on all firearms. The United Kingdom cannot be accused of not being a good European, as our regulations are probably the most stringent in Europe already. We are concerned that our rules and regulations should not be diluted by these proposals.

The firearms laws of this country had a good airing during the debate on the Firearms (Amendment) Act 1988, so there is no need to go over them again this evening. We were worried, however, that under this directive visiting sportsmen might be able to enter the United Kingdom with weapons issued to them under less stringent controls than obtain here. The Minister has reassured us to some degree about that.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro) mentioned the importance of shooting in Scotland and its contribution to the Scottish economy. In February this year a report was published by the Fraser of Allander Institute, of Glasgow university, showing that shooting in Scotland produced £78 million income, of which almost 25 per cent. was said to come from overseas visitors. About 12,000 jobs in Scotland come directly or indirectly from shooting—a considerable contribution to the British economy.

I was pleased to hear from the Minister that the age limits—probably the aspect of the draft directive that worried us most—are to be changed and those enshrined in our domestic law are to prevail.

Two of the provisions of the directive have not been fully covered by my hon. Friends and need further explanation from the Minister. The first has to do with the technical difficulty of categorising weapons. As drafted, the directive could have the effect of banning rifles and pistols which are of service issue—but those weapons are the mainstay of target shooting.

The other point that worries me is the condition in the directive that possession of a firearms certificate will depend on "the necessary mental and physical capacity" of the applicant. Who will decide that? Are disabled people to be barred from taking part in a sport in which they can compete on equal terms with the able-bodied? That would be a disgrace, given the large number of paraplegic members of shooting clubs.

[Mr. Michael Colvin]

I recently saw in The Times a photograph of Prince Charles shooting while he had the use of only one arm. I assume that the directive would disallow him from possession of a firearms certificate. Incidentally, I seem to remember that the picture appeared just above a headline reading "How the Cabinet assassins struck"—but that, of course, is all history now.

We should also consider the difficulties involved in administering the provision. At present, chief constables are responsible for issuing certificates, and will not do so if they consider that the applicant is of unsound mind or unfit to be entrusted with a firearm. Will that system remain under the directive, and will the right of appeal also remain? I think that we need to know that.

Much has been said this evening about the provision of the additional firearms passes to be used in Europe under article 1(4). I feel that it will lead to much more bureaucracy, which should be avoided at all costs.

I urge my hon. Friend the Minister to listen to the views of the firearms consultative committee, under the chairmanship of Lord Kimball. The committee was set up specifically to examine and report the views of experts, who are best qualified to come up with a constructive line. I understand that the committee is to meet next week to discuss the proposals; it is a pity that it did not meet before the debate. I only hope that the documents available to the committee are more up to date than those before us tonight.

I trust that my hon. Friend will take note of what we have said this evening, and that it will strengthen his arm or those of other Ministers when they go back to Europe to discuss the matter further. Debates like this go right to the heart of the question of sovereignty. There is no doubt —if sovereignty means having control over one's own affairs—that, within the European Community, certain aspects of sovereignty are strengthened if our sovereignty is pooled with that of our partners.

I have no objection to a majority vote on what are essentially European Community matters involving all member states; however, I have the greatest possible objection to the majority vote being used to pass a directive that would impinge directly on the domestic laws of this country. I will not accept that such a vote should dictate whether we should shoot pigeons or magpies, whether it is legal for us to eat the British banger or whether a carrot is a fruit or a vegetable. Such matters are best left to our Parliament and our domestic law makers.

I believe that we have made a very good job of drafting and agreeing firearms legislation in this country—after, I may say, a good deal of agonising and debate. I think that the firearms laws that prevail here now should be left as they are, and should not be interfered with by our European partners.

9.18 pm

Mr. James Hill (Southampton, Test): I have no axe to grind. I am not the chairman of a sporting club. I have never fired a gun on a rifle range. Therefore, I speak with the great authority of those who know about the taking of sporting weapons fr another. It is almost unnecessary to go However, national security matters ha debate. This important debate will be on effectiveness of our future border contr

If the impression is given that th slackening off on border controls, ou may begin to say to themselves, "We've particular pass is all right. As a lot of w won't, therefore, go into it as rigorousl past." Terrible problems of that kind again while European legislation pa House. I hope that much of it will be pi European Standing Committees and th to ask questions that will clarify the Minister. He will not then have to meetings in Europe and tell us what he his last conversation in Brussels. I prai for telling us about these facts. The Opp to be put down in black and white, translated in a form that meets with the other member states. It is extremely d such agreements.

I think that we all agree that the deb the wrong issue. I understand that 14-ye to take guns, under supervision—I p supervision of their parents—across b that they will be able to obtain permi doubt it. The ages that were mentioned greatly.

We must ensure that the message place that at this time Customs and Ex vigilant. That applies to drugs, immig everything else. The Commissioners standards. I am sufficiently non-Europe that, although I am pro-Europea everything else. We had this problem driving licence. When these matters are able to argue the case with the maxi before us. Our sovereignty must not absurd degree—over such questions as when it comes to national security our s defended. This is probably the only m Community that is under particular t terrorism.

9.23 pm

Mr. Ken Hargreaves (Hyndburn): been wrecked by the assurances that already given, I shall be brief.

I welcome the Minister's announc articles 5(a) and 5(b). They relate to th physically and mentally handicapped. on his achievement.

I know very little about firearms constituents, Mr. Derek Waterworth, north-west region shooting associatio certain concerns of behalf of the asso that the Minister has already dealt Waterworth, however, makes two fu letter states:

"Annex 1, Category B. The need f possess soft-nosed or hollow projecti ammunition.

"Most target pistol shooters use projectiles . . . made entirely from lead alloy often with a flat nose and a hollow base, this being the most accurate configuration for a slow moving projectile over short distances. Many pistol shooters also mould their own bullets."

Mr. Waterworth asks whether it is realistic

"to make the moulding of lumps of lead the subject of legislation. The proposal is aimed at copper jacketed ammunition with a flat or hollow lead nose of the type used for hunting game but this is not made clear. The directive also seeks to ban the use of military arms by civilians. Unlike some countries on the continent there has been a long tradition here of using military arms for sporting purposes. Not to mention clay pigeon and game shooters, there are over one hundred target shooting clubs in the North West Sports Council Region. Members of these clubs have personally invested considerable sums of money in their equipment."

Mr. Waterworth said that they are worried by the directive.

Mr. Waterworth and his members will welcome the Minister's announcement. Perhaps when he replies he will give us further reassurance on the final two points.

9.25 pm

Mr. Peter Lloyd: With permission, Madam Deputy Speaker, I shall reply.

This has been a considerably longer debate than we would have had if it had started at the usual time after 10 o'clock. I make no complaint about that because I know that the subject raises considerable interest and concern among hon. Members ranging from the rules as they affect shooters to the effects on national security. Both are important. I have made long lists of the points that have been raised. If I move fairly rapidly, I hope to be able to respond to all the substantive points that have been made.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West (Mr. Randall) asked about age limits, as did many of my hon. Friends, most notably my hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare (Mr. Wiggin). The agreement on age limits reached in the working party is that existing law shall prevail. No change will be made for age limits on shooting sports and target practice. I hope that that is sufficiently clear and that it satisfies hon. Members.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West asked what documents would be required by shooters coming from other EEC countries. Under the directive, shooters will need licensing documents from their own state, which will be issued according to the law of their country. They will need the European firearms pass, which will also be issued by the particular country and is available to all those who have proper documentation and licences. We are insisting that we maintain the requirement for the British visitors permit. As hon. Members will know, that is issued only after there is a proper letter of information from a sponsor making clear the purpose of someone bringing in a gun for sporting use. It must also say what the sporting occasion is and where the gun will be used.

The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West asked about the pass and what it would cover. I think that I have dealt with that already. The European firearms pass is issued by member countries to those who ask for it and legitimately hold weapons under their national law.

The hon. Gentleman also asked about the information system. It will provide a record of arms movements. Each member state will appoint a national authority. It may be the national police or the country's Interpol bureau. An information exchange system under a Council of Europe convention on weapons already exists, and is said to work well by the states that have ratified it, including Germany and Italy.

Concern was expressed by a number of hon. Members about security, and several emphasised the need for intelligence if we are to ensure that firearms are not to be moved across the continent and over borders for terrorist and other criminal purposes. The rules and regulations will be an essential part of that intelligence exchange between European countries. The hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West referred to the danger of excessive bureaucracy. We want the minimum possible, but in achieving the ends that the hon. Gentleman asked us to address it will be essential to exchange information between countries.

I was reminded by both the hon. Gentleman and my hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East (Mr. Taylor) that at present we do not stop everyone entering the United Kingdom and search their baggage. Many arrivals pass through the green channel. In fact, the number of people using it is increasing. The Community aims at phasing out customs controls. The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland (Mr. Maclennan) was also worried about security, yet it would appear from his speeches that he shares that objective. However, he apparently desires that frontier checks should continue ad infinitum. We do not have full checks now, and under the Community proposals that he supports we will not have them at all.

Mr. Maclennan: I did not make that point, and would not have done so for the reasons that the Minister gave. The hon. Gentleman knows my views on that issue. However, I am interested to know the views of the police.

Mr. Lloyd: Both the Association of Chief Police Officers and its Scottish counterpart are concerned that we should maintain the controls on visitors provided by the British visitor permit scheme. That is why we believe it is not only essential to maintain the visitor permit requirement but that we should have the right to make essential checks at our own border. On both issues, the police and the Government are at one. Achieving those conditions is part of our objective in the continuing negotiations.

Mr. Hill: Does my hon. Friend take the view that more money needs to be spent on the customs service to provide up-to-date equipment for scrutinising baggage? At present it is a question of catch as catch can, and it is not working very well. Once in a while a load of drugs is detected, but when it comes to detecting weapons surely customs halls should be equipped with more high-tech equipment.

Mr. Lloyd: Improved technology as well as improved intelligence can help. It is a constant battle to stay ahead and to detect and catch people who bring weapons into the country for illegitimate purposes.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland asked whether the negotiated directive will touch on movements to and from non-EC states. It will not, except in so far as it implies a strengthening of checks on visitors from countries outside the Community. The same question was of concern to my hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries (Sir H. Monro), albeit from a different point of view.

The hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland and my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside (Mr. Colvin) mentioned the firearms consultative committee. We have kept the committee up to date with developments. My right hon. Friend the Home Secretary relies upon this small but important committee for advice. It will meet next week, and no doubt will give us the benefit of its informed views.

[Mr. Lloyd]

I must take issue with the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland about the treaty base. He seemed to believe that this should be settled first in the negotiations. As he is interested in EEC matters, I am surprised that he had not yet come across the practice whereby a directive is negotiated and, although a treaty base may be in mind, it is not finally determined until what should go in the directive is agreed. As this directive has taken shape, we have made clear our opinion on what the base should be. Some countries, particularly Ireland, share our views.

Mr. Maclennan: I have, of course, come across this procedure before, as the hon. Gentleman will recall, because it was raised by the Government in the debate on enfranchisement of foreign nationals from European Community countries. I am surprised that this practice continues. To reach a detailed agreement before deciding whether it has been established on a proper legal basis is to put the cart before the horse. This is not a matter with which the Minister can deal unilaterally, but it is open to the Government to challenge it and to seek an advisory opinion of the European Court.

Mr. Lloyd: We have been challenging it, but discussions go on in parallel. That is why our arguments about the treaty base of the emerging directive were made before completion of the directive. The directive has not yet been agreed.

My hon. Friend the Member for Weston-super-Mare raised several specific and detailed points. The semi-automatic weapons element of the draft directive has been dropped. It would have caught self-loading pistols used by, for example, target shooters. The military calibre ban has also been dropped. We expect new and better wording to be included that will not affect target and sporting shooters.

My hon. Friends the Members for Weston-super-Mare and for Dumfries asked about airgun pellets. That aspect is not affected because the domestic law on sales to young persons and possession by prohibited persons which we already have still applies.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries was worried about intensification of controls at external borders to which the directive referred, and I mentioned that point in responding to the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland. The fears that this provision will damage the tourist industry are unjustified. The article is simply intended to improve public safety in Europe as a whole. It does no less than require that all non-EEC visitors who wish to bring firearms into the Community for sport or competition should first obtain the certification that member states think is proper.

My hon. Friend the Member for Dumfries will find that the directive requires us to demand no more than we demand already of visitors who come here for shooting, which is such an important part of the industry of some parts of Scotland. I hope that my hon. Friend will feel reassured because the directive does not present any threat in that area.

My hon. Friend also referred to paraplegic shooters and to disabled shooters in general. We expect that in the new directive the limitations on the disabled will be wholly removed. We do not believe that such limitations are necessary. The working party agreed, and when the Commission publishes the next directive the limitations should not be included. I hope that that will reassure my hon. Friend and other hon. Members who are concerned about that point. However, I must stress for the sake of accuracy that certain minor limitations in existing firearms legislation—and my hon. Friends knows them better than I do—will continue to be in force. I stress again that our domestic law governs the rules in this area.

My hon. Friend also mentioned the military weapons ban, which has now been dropped. The definitions that we expect to be in place will not ban normal rifles and pistols; they will ban only automatic-firing military weapons. My hon. Friend also referred to age limits, but I have dealt with that in replying to the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West.

My hon. Friend the Member for Southend, East was very worried about the treaty base. I understand what he says and he will understand, not least because I responded to him and to the hon. Member for Caithness and Sutherland earlier, that we share his concern. We believe that the Commission is proposing the wrong treaty base. I can do no more that to repeat that we have put our arguments and that we expect a formal response. Until we have that response, it would not be useful to ask me how we shall decide to respond to it. Our response will depend on how strong we think the arguments are.

Many hon. Members referred to checks for security purposes. It is essential that we have rules that enable us to feel as secure as possible, and it is essential that in future we are no less secure than we are now. Within Europe, the old-fashioned customs checks are being reduced. Most travellers go through the green channel, and we have to rely on intelligence work and on the other ways of gathering information so that we can target our checks on the baggage and documentation on which our information suggests that we should most efficiently concentrate. That is how we now secure our frontiers against weapons and against undesirable elements such as drugs or other contraband. We do not secure our frontiers by having the right to challenge people who are going through the green channel.

I cannot stress too strongly that we believe that the necessary parts of the directive are those criticised by the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West for being bureaucratic. They will help to ensure that intelligence information, especially information on the movement of arms consignments, is available to the authorities. We also believe that it is essential that the British visitors permit should continue to be required. That is a central part of the argument that we have still to make in the working party.

Mr. Randall: I am grateful to the Minister for his comments, but can he tell the House how much that information system will cost?

Mr. Lloyd: I do not know. We must consider that carefully and sensibly. I suspect that, even without the present directive, we should want to establish and expand such an information exchange. The system may not cost much more than we should anyway have spent—possibly no more. The agreements which have already been ratified and which are in force in Germany and Italy seem to work well.

I think that I have answered most of the points raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Romsey and Waterside. I understand his argument that matters which seem to have been hanging fire for years suddenly move at great speed. Whether we like it or not, that is the way in which negotiations appear to be carried on in the Community. When an issue such as this comes to the forefront, we may move very fast on it in a series of meetings. That is why I shall say little about the fact that I was able to give the House what I knew was good news. With fast-moving negotiations, it is difficult to ensure that the House is kept fully informed, and I apologise to hon. Members on both sides of the House who came to the debate with well-prepared speeches only to find that the very argument that they had intended to press on me already seemed to have been conceded by our colleagues in Europe.

Mr. Wiggin: I am sure that we all accept that the Minister acted in good faith. Will he reaffirm, however, that the basic purpose of the directive is to ease trade across national frontiers?

Mr. Lloyd: That is part of the argument. The Community argues that the directive is intended to ease trade across frontiers and that is why it has chosen the present base, although the choice may have been influenced by the fact that it is a qualified majority base. We argue that the directive concerns the free movement of people who happen to be carrying weapons with them and that is why we are arguing for a different base. Both arguments concern ease of movement, whether it be of people or of goods.

I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth, North (Mr. Griffiths) for his helpful and constructive remarks. It was good to hear at least one hon. Member say that he wholeheartedly welcomed my remarks.

I think that I have answered the two additional questions raised by my hon. Friend the Member for Hyndburn (Mr. Hargreaves).

I am grateful for the wise remarks of my hon. Friend the Member for Southampton, Test (Mr. Hill), who knows well how the Community works, having himself been a member of the European assembly.

I hope that the hon. Member for Kingston upon Hull, West will not advise his hon. Friends to vote against the directive. It would be a pity if he did, because I think that he agrees with the general tenor of the Government's approach. We want this debate to be read and we want it to be understood within the Community, and if the Opposition voted against the directive it would look as though part of the House was not anxious for the Government to continue to press the points that we are determined to press. Having said that, I know why the hon. Gentleman argued as he did. As I said, I understand that hon. Members would like to have the most up-to-date information before a debate. With a fast-moving negotiation, that is not always possible, but I shall certainly speak to those who are responsible for these matters, for providing background papers and for the way in which the business is managed. Hon. Members' remarks will be drawn to their attention to be carefully considered.

Question put:—

The House divided: Ayes 78, Noes 15.

Division No. 15] [9.49 pm

AYES

Alison, Rt Hon Michael	Knapman, Roger
Amess, David	Knight, Greg (Derby North)
Amos, Alan	Lawrence, Ivan
Arbuthnot, James	Lightbown, David
Arnold, Jacques (Gravesham)	Lloyd, Peter (Fareham)
Baker, Nicholas (Dorset N)	Lyell, Rt Hon Sir Nicholas
Bowis, John	Macfarlane, Sir Neil
Brazier, Julian	MacGregor, Rt Hon John
Bruce, Ian (Dorset South)	Mans, Keith
Burt, Alistair	Maples, John
Carrington, Matthew	Mates, Michael
Chapman, Sydney	Monro, Sir Hector
Colvin, Michael	Neubert, Michael
Curry, David	Nicholls, Patrick
Dorrell, Stephen	Owen, Rt Hon Dr David
Dunn, Bob	Paice, James
Fenner, Dame Peggy	Patnick, Irvine
Fishburn, John Dudley	Portillo, Michael
Forman, Nigel	Redwood, John
Fowler, Rt Hon Sir Norman	Sackville, Hon Tom
Fox, Sir Marcus	Soames, Hon Nicholas
Freeman, Roger	Spicer, Sir Jim (Dorset W)
Gale, Roger	Stanbrook, Ivor
Goodlad, Alastair	Stern, Michael
Gorst, John	Stevens, Lewis
Greenway, John (Ryedale)	Sumberg, David
Griffiths, Peter (Portsmouth N)	Taylor, John M (Solihull)
Hague, William	Thompson, Patrick (Norwich N)
Hampson, Dr Keith	Tredinnick, David
Hargreaves, Ken (Hyndburn)	Viggers, Peter
Harris, David	Waller, Gary
Hawkins, Christopher	Warren, Kenneth
Hayhoe, Rt Hon Sir Barney	Wells, Bowen
Heseltine, Rt Hon Michael	Widdecombe, Ann
Hill, James	Wiggin, Jerry
Hordern, Sir Peter	Wood, Timothy
Howarth, Alan (Strat'd-on-A)	Young, Sir George (Acton)
Irvine, Michael
Jack, Michael	Tellers for the Ayes:
Janman, Tim	Mr. Tim Boswell and
King, Roger (B'ham N'thfield)	Mr. Neil Hamilton.
Kirkhope, Timothy

NOES

Bellotti, David	Pike, Peter L.
Campbell, Menzies (Fife NE)	Randall, Stuart
Cummings, John	Skinner, Dennis
Howells, Geraint	Taylor, Rt Hon J. D. (S'ford)
Hoyle, Doug	Wallace, James
Hughes, John (Coventry NE)
Jones, Martyn (Clwyd S W)	Tellers for the Noes:
McKay, Allen (Barnsley West)	Mr. Don Dixon and
Maclennan, Robert	Mr. Frank Haynes.
Nellist, Dave

Question accordingly agreed to.

Resolved,

That this House takes note of European Community Documents Nos. 10074/89 and 8836/90, relating to controls on the acquisition and possession of weapons; and endorses the Government's view that any Directive must preserve the right of Member States to make those checks that are necessary for public security and public safety and that any additional burden on business should be kept to a minimum.

STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, &c.

Town and Country Planning

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.),

That the draft Town and Country Planning (Fees for Applications and Deemed Applications) (Amendment)

Regulations 1990, which were laid before this House on 16th October, in the last Session of Parliament, be approved.—[Mr. Sackville.]

Question agreed to.

TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING (SCOTLAND)

Motion made, and Question put forthwith pursuant to Standing Order No. 101(5) (Standing Committees on Statutory Instruments, &c.),

That the draft Town and Country Planning (Fees for Applications and Deemed Applications) (Scotland) Amendment Regulations 1990, which were laid before this House on 16th October, in the last Session of Parliament, be approved.—[Mr. Sackville.]

Question agreed to.

CARAVANS (STANDARD COMMUNITY CHARGE AND RATING) BILL

Ordered,

That if the Caravans (Standard Community Charge and Rating) Bill be committed to a Committee of the whole House, further proceedings on the Bill shall stand postponed and that as soon as the proceedings on any Resolutions come to by the House on Caravans (Standard Community Charge and Rating) Bill [Money] and Caravans (Standard Community Charge and Rating) Bill [Ways and Means] have been concluded, this House will immediately resolve itself into a Committee on the Bill.—[Mr. Sackville.]

St. Helier Hospital, Sutton

Motion made, and Question proposed, That this House do now adjourn.—[Mr. Sackville.]

10.1 pm

Sir Neil Macfarlane (Sutton and Cheam): I wish to raise the subject of security at St. Helier hospital in my constituency. The debate takes on an additional tragic dimension because of the double tragedy at Wakefield earlier this week, which affected hon. Members—in all corners of the House. My hon. Friend the Minister will be as shocked and saddened as I am, but our right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has acted quickly to inquire into precisely what happened. It throws hospital security well on to the national health service agenda. Some guidance is essential now from the Department.

I shall outline the circumstances of a horrendous crime committed in St. Helier hospital, Sutton. The hospital serves a wide area, including my constituency, and enjoys a considerable reputation throughout many parts of south London and Surrey. The horrendous crime was perpetrated against a constituent.

On 14 October 1990, a young girl of only 11 years was raped and indecently assaulted in the children's ward. I am certain that my hon. Friend will share my prime concern not only about the background to this terrible crime, but about the overall security of the whole site, the buildings and the unit. I am deeply concerned about the welfare of nursing and medical staff, clerical and administrative staff, maintenance, professional and technical staff as well as the welfare of the patients.

The father of the child wrote to me. His letter states:

"My daughter has got a bit better physically and is now able to walk without help for over a week. She still gets very tired both physically and mentally but we hope and pray that as time goes by she will feel better."

Nobody can describe the distress felt by the parents, the community and, I suppose, the nation at large that a defenceless child left in the care of the local hospital could have been subjected to such an outrage. None of us can imagine the anguish of the parents of the girl as they try to help her come to terms with her terrible experience. Nobody in this House or outside it can appreciate the terror felt by the child who was unable to cry for help, alone in a cubicle and unsupervised, while the two nurses on duty were grappling with an emergency admission. Tragically, unknown to them, the real emergency was being enacted only yards away.

I emphasise that there were only two people on duty in that children's ward. I suppose that my hon. Friend and the inquiry board will query whether that level of staffing was adequate. One has to bear it in mind that the hospital and the area health authority are responsible for the girl's safety. This heinous crime should never have been allowed to happen. The fact that it did raises serious questions about staffing levels, both nursing and security, the quality of control and the direction exercised by the Merton and Sutton health authority and by the district general manager.

I am alarmed that my constituents were not given a little more tender loving care when it most mattered. The father said in his letter to me:

"Since they (Hospital Admin.) have found out from my wife that I am in contact with you regarding this incident their whole attitude has suddenly changed and they are now, at a very late stage, being extremely apologetic and diplomatic in their replies. I hope they do not give evasive answers to either you as my M.P. or to myself."

I hope that my hon. Friend will be able to comment on a number of points that need urgent consideration and, no doubt, action. We need to know how security requirements were co-ordinated between the Department of Health and the Merton and Sutton health authority, and with the St. Helier hospital itself. We need to know what instructions or guidelines were issued by the Department and whether they were followed to the letter of the law by the hospital.

If my hon. Friend's committee is satisfied on those points, will he consider issuing further and tougher guidelines? On 26 November, following the tragedy at Wakefield last week, the British Medical Association, through the voice of Dr. Patricia Price, a retired doctor from Birmingham, and one of the two BMA representatives on the Department of Health advisory committee on violence, said:

"Recommendations on training, preventive measures and other aspects to help reduce the incidence of violence were made in our report and health authorities were advised to put them into effect. Unfortunately, these recommendations have only been partially taken up. We recognised that we could not eliminate violence, but in view of this sad incident I would ask all health authorities to take a fresh look at their existing procedures to see whether they need updating."

What security system was in place at St. Helier at the time of the rape of this child? Is my hon. Friend satisfied that it was adequate? Is there any evidence of negligence by the security firm involved, or was it given inadequate and vague guidance by the hospital? Why was the child moved from the larger ward into the small private room at that time? How was and is liaison between security staff and the medical staff conducted? Is it good, and are the rules laid down scrupulously observed by all concerned? Were they observed on 14 October?

I had a communication today from the BMA's parliamentary officer, who has highlighted something that had been expressed by its members. The letter says:

"I understand from BMA members working at the hospital that the paediatric ward is situated at a distance from the main hospital and is somewhat cut off and also that there is no fence surrounding the hospital. I also understand that a number of female houseofficers have felt nervous about working at the hospital at night."

It seems that there have been general site security problems at this large hospital for some time and that the public and many schoolchildren use the gate at the rear of the hospital as a short cut through the hospital grounds. I am also told that people are allowed to walk their dogs and ride their bikes in the grounds and that shopping trolleys are wheeled across a corridor which is a connection between hospital units and blocks. There appears, sadly, to be no authority to stop them, and I suspect that many other hospitals face the same difficulties.

There are some interesting and revealing facts that the Minister may need to review in the light of this occurrence and the most recent horrendous crimes in Wakefield. Security at St. Helier until July 1989 was the responsibility of the portering staff. That in itself seems an onerous task for people who have other prime functions to perform and I find it astonishing, given the growth in crimes of violence on hard-working hospital staff in the past 10 to 15 years. One wonders how many other NHS hospitals still depend on that type of security.

The bitter irony is that, rightly and properly, the St. Helier hospital management wanted a more professional approach to security and appointed Gardner Merchant to handle site security. I hope that the Minister and his officials will be able to determine where responsibility lies when a private contractor moves into an NHS unit. Does that contractor take over duties without any day-to-day involvement of the hospital staff, and how frequent is that contact?

I have the feeling that, despite the devoted excellence of the staff in all quarters of St. Helier hospital, something is lacking in management direction. One wonders whether the reception area is manned properly at all times. I am told that hospital staff are vulnerable at weekends, especially on Saturday nights. Who supervises the security office, and what studies have been made by hospital and authority management staff of the work of the one person in the security control office? For what hours is the reception area manned?

I fear that there is anxiety and a lack of confidence in those responsible for the management of some aspects of the hospital, but is it their fault? Is not the unit at St. Helier too large for efficient and effective day-to-day control? Is not the site disadvantageous? What is the infrastructure like from the point of view of future planning, direction and control? Much work must be done now to restore confidence and morale.

There is another element of confusion. I received a letter from the chairman of the proposed St. Helier NHS trust saying:

"The security at St. Helier is arguably the best in the region and has been recognised by the staff as a huge improvement on the pre-privatisation system."

Unfortunately, the evidence at present does not point to that. He goes on:

"No-one associated with any normal hospital can expect prison-like security."

Of course not, and we do not want that, but we want an effective balance between the two extremes. He goes on:

"The inquiry found no negligence, but made some recommendations as to additional security."

Many questions must be answered. It is for the police to identify the way in which this depraved man was able to enter the hospital, and to bring him to justice, but that will not bring back this child's happy, carefree, innocent former life, probably now gone for ever. It is for the area health authority to determine whether security and nursing systems broke down, as in time they were bound to under the present administration in so large a hospital on such an unsatisfactory site; and it is for the district health authority to determine the capacity of an administrator who described this disgraceful and repulsive assault on an innocent child asleep in a hospital bed as "an untoward incident."

It is for the Minister's Department to determine whether the hard-stretched medical services in the hospital are receiving the direction and support that they have a right to expect, or whether the Merton and Sutton health authority has been negligent. I do not point the finger at anybody, but the time has come for the investigation to be made public and for the parents of their 11-year-old daughter to be made fully aware of what took place.

10.13 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): My hon. Friend the Member for Sutton and Cheam (Sir N. Macfarlane) is right to be outraged by the incident that took place in St. Helier hospital. He takes the district general manager to task for using the phrase "an untoward incident". While that may be national health service terminology, it certainly does not properly express the sense of outrage that any decent person would feel on reading the background to that incident. In addition, it does not express the sense of disappointment felt in the district health authority that the incident should have taken place in one of its hospitals. However, my hon. Friend should not read into that choice of words any sense that the health authority is any less concerned by the sad and tragic incident than he is or any right thinking person would be.

[Mr. Stephen Dorrell]

I associate myself and the district health authority with the sympathy that my hon. Friend expressed, primarily for the victim of the terrible crime, whose life is at risk of being scarred by what happened, at the very least for a long time, and possibly for ever. It is right that I should also associate myself and the district health authority with the sympathy expressed by my hon. Friend for the victim's family, as it is to them that the prime burden falls of trying to rebuild the victim's confidence, and bolster her belief and desire to pursue her childhood into a full and fulfilled adulthood. To that extent, the district health authority and I share my hon. Friend's sense of outrage and his sympathy for the victim and her family.

My hon. Friend asked me to go into some detail on the Government's attitude toward security in hospitals. As I think my hon. Friend would recognise, that is not an easy subject, particularly when set against the background of the incident at St. Helier hospital and the even more tragic incident of the murder of two people at Pinderfields general hospital earlier this week. Those are terrible crimes, which raise with a new urgency the difficult problems faced by hospital managers every day of their working lives as they try to secure a proper balance in the security policies pursued by their hospitals.

A hospital manager has to have a clear policy and to recognise his responsibility for the security of the premises, staff and patients. An important part of his duties is to ensure that he takes the necessary steps to discharge that responsibility. Proper security precautions must be taken in hospitals to ensure that NHS property is not stolen, NHS staff are not subjected to personal abuse, physical threats and violence of the sort that we saw earlier this week, and patients on NHS property do not become victims of the sort of terrible incident that we are discussing. Those are the primary responsibilities of NHS managers in dealing with security.

However, we must also remember that a hospital is a place of open access and it is important that we do not pursue a security policy that makes the legitimate visitor to a hospital feel that he has to get past a security guard before his condition can be treated. That difficult balance must be struck. The key of any successful security policy in an NHS hospital is the word "balance." We must meet our proper security obligations without making the visitor to an NHS hospital feel that he has to justify himself to the security guard. Many of the people who come to NHS hospitals are either suffering from a condition requiring urgent treatment, so that the last thing they want to do is negotiate their way over a security hurdle, or are emotionally upset because they are the friends and relatives of people who may be ill. The last thing relative of a cancer victim wants to encounter is a stro security guard. A difficult balance must be struck.

My hon. Friend has asked how the Department trie strike this balance and to discharge our responsibili First, we must recognise that security in NHS institut is necessarily and rightly the responsibility of manage those institutions. We cannot have Ministers secc guessing routine day-to-day managerial decisions in e hospital around the country—that way lies disaste firmly believe that the best way of ensuring efficient effective management of the NHS is to give manager authority to allow them to discharge their tasks and to support them when they make reasonable effort discharge them.

That is not to say that there is no place for guidance support for these managers. That is why in 1984 Government supported the production by the Nati Association of Health Authorities of an NHS secu manual, which is the reference volume that all N managers use to assess and develop their security poli

The National Association of Health Authorities Trusts, as it is now, proposed that the document shoul updated. In the Department's initial response we sugge that NAHAT should recover the cost of a revised secu manual from the sale of the books to health authoriti have reviewed that decision in the light of the recent ev in my hon. Friend's constituency and in Pinderf hospital earlier this week, and I have today asked £20,000 to be made available to NAHAT to meet pre-production costs of an updated version of the mar I am sure that NAHAT will produce an equally valu updated version that will take into account re experience. I hope that that shows the seriousness which the Government view recent incidents and determination to ensure that the lessons from them sh be learnt and applied.

I distance myself from some of the criticisms mad my hon. Friend of the way in which the incident i Helier hospital was acted upon by Merton and Su health authority. The authority is entitled to some c for having quickly set up an inquiry to look into al circumstances and to learn the lessons from the inci Merton and Sutton health authority spends £140,0 year on security at St. Helier hospital. Clearly, security did not work in this case, so the authority's re is not perfect, but security is taken seriously at the hosp

My hon. Friend suggested that part of the answer l the number of nurses on the children's ward. He ri said that there were two on duty that night—but he di say that it was a Saturday night and that there were patients on the ward. Two nurses for five patients Saturday night cannot be said to represent thin sta levels, and I do not believe that the right response security problem is necessarily an increase in staff nu levels.

More important, perhaps, is the fact that we shoul try to debate specific security precautions—in a sp hospital—on the Floor of the House. I take some cor from the knowledge that the health authority set proper committee to examine the issue quickly, and that committee in turn reported within a fortnight c incident.

Let me quote two of the comments made in committee's report. First, it states:

"it is the considered opinion of the Committee . . . following extensive interviews and receipt of comprehensive written reports and evidence, that security arrangements at St. Helier Hospital have improved over recent years, are valued by those working within the hospital environment and have been found to be a greater level of comprehensiveness than a number of systems in comparable hospitals."

That is not the report of a committee overwhelmingly concerned by its findings—although it went on to make a number of proposals, including some that were touched on by my hon. Friend, on such matters as the gate at the back of the hospital and the need for proper fencing round the hospital. Those proposals were considered, and recommendations were made—recommendations which the health authority has said it will take very seriously.

Secondly, the report states:

"It is considered that the staffing levels generally employed by Unitrust"—

the security firm—

"at St. Helier Hospital are adequate."

Although the report does not say—indeed, it could not, in the circumstances—that everything in the hospital is wonderful and no improvements can be made, it gives qualified support to the security policy pursued there and makes a number of detailed proposals for its improvement.

Let me quote from another report about the incident—by Merton and Sutton community health council, which is not always a friend of hospital management. It is on record as saying:

"Given the timescale the Committee conducted a thorough investigation"—

I take comfort from that.'

"The report and background evidence compiled show that St. Helier Hospital is comparable if not better than other hospitals with regards to security."

It also states:

"The report indicates an improvement in security since the appointment of a specialist security firm and an improvement in the security consciousness of staff".

I hope that my hon. Friend accepts that that suggests that the health authority has taken the problem seriously. It has set up a committee to advise it on how steps can be taken to improve the position and, furthermore, the committee's report has been examined by the CHC, which has declared itself satisfied that it is a serious piece of work which makes sensible proposals about how improvements can be made.

We are talking about a tragic incident, which demonstrates the existence of a problem to which we have not yet found a wholly satisfactory answer. I hope that my hon. Friend will welcome the fact that the Government have acted today to provide additional money to ensure that the NHS security manual is fully up to date, and that all the lessons of recent experience are learnt and applied. I hope that he will also accept that the district health authority has taken action to try to ensure locally that lessons are learnt, and that at all levels in the NHS—local management and Department of Health—we shall do what we can; but, if I may return to my first point, we must recognise that security policy in NHS hospitals is properly and inevitably a matter of balance.

It would be wholly irresponsible for any Minister to stand here and say that any steps taken by him, or any taken by NHS managers, can constitute an absolute assurance that such an incident will never happen again. Such an assurance cannot be given; the assurance that I do give is that we will try hard to learn the lessons of these incidents, and also try to stop them from happening again.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at twenty-nine minutes past Ten o'clock.

House of Commons

Friday 30 November 1990

The House met at half-past Nine o'clock

PRAYERS

[MR. SPEAKER in the Chair]

The Environment

9.34 am

Mr. Michael Neubert (Romford): I beg to move,

That this House, while welcoming the general improvement in people's living standards and the increasing freedom which they enjoy in their everyday lives, believes these advances must now be more closely matched by a quality of life in which clean air, pure water, unpolluted beaches, graffiti-free buildings, litterless streets, reduced noise levels, efficient waste management and recycling of material resources and support for the maintenance of our historic heritage, together with other enhancements of the natural and urban environment, will all assume much greater importance; and calls on the Government, through the necessary minimum regulation, education and encouragement of individual self-discipline, to continue to play its full part in developing a healthier, safer and more attractive environment for all our people, in town and country alike.

Mr. Barry Field (Isle of Wight): My hon. Friend mentioned clean air. Did he read the medical briefing in The Times on 1 November, entitled, "Dose of blocked flue"? In that article, Dr. Thomas Stuttaford described the problems of blocked flues in people's homes and the danger of carbon monoxide poisoning. He said:

"Minor degrees of carbon monoxide poisoning provide a wide variety"—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. Gentleman may well have an opportunity to make a speech later. This is an intervention.

Mr. Field: I am coming to a conclusion, Mr. Speaker. The article stated:

"Minor degrees of carbon monoxide poisoning provide a wide variety of vague symptoms: headaches, muscle weakness, dizziness, breathlessness, and an intellectual deterioration accompanied by a poor memory."

Does my hon. Friend agree that that is something from which the Opposition are suffering?

Mr. Neubert: This may be one of those occasions that have a large number of unusual features. My hon. Friend's intervention, even before I began my speech, is one of them. I missed the report in The Times, and I am grateful to my hon. Friend for drawing it to my attention. I shall go to the Library as soon as the debate has ended and bring myself up to date.

It is almost 40 years since I joined the Conservative party and began in active politics. In all that time, I cannot recall anything to match the intensity of the events of the past few weeks. The leadership contest in the Conservative parliamentary party has taken up every waking minute and hour, and it has dominated the media. Yet on Wednesday 14 November, the very day on which the challenger declared his intention to stand for the leadership and battle was joined, it was business as usual in the House of Commons, including the ballot for private Members' motions.

As chance would have it, I was first in line to sign the ballot book, and I took the opportunity to sign my name against No. 1. When No. 1 came out first in the ballot, enabling me to initiate today's debate, I realised what a simple system it was. When I came to sign the ballot book for the private Members' day next Friday, I did not make the same mistake—I signed against No. 87. I am happy to leave the debate to my hon. Friend the Member for Basildon (Mr. Amess) and other hon. Friends while I keep my programme of engagements for that day.

When it came to choosing a subject for debate, it was difficult to concentrate on policies when personalities were so much the order of the day. With a parliamentary day at my disposal, I thought that to raise the subject of people's local environment would be worth while. I am pleased that a number of my hon. Friends and other hon. Members are present to support my choice, and I look forward to hearing their contributions. I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Minister for his attendance and participation in the debate. He has achieved significant progress already in his time at the Department.

Another reason why I thought that my choice of subject would be appropriate is that in the six days of debate on the Loyal Address the environment did not feature. The choice of subjects was a matter for the official Opposition, so in raising the subject today I am repairing their omission. I am giving the House an opportunity, at the start of a new Session, to debate the many important issues.

The importance that the Government attach to the environment is demonstrated by the passage of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 and the publication this year of the White Paper "This Common Inheritance." Its importance was underlined by our new Prime Minister who, speaking for the first time as premier outside No. 10 Downing street, referred to an "open society", and to the importance of

"a better quality of life for all citizens."

An uncharacteristic lack of modesty on my part allows me to point out that his words echo some of mine in the motion, which was printed the day before he made that speech. That shows the unity of purpose and outlook that characterises the Conservative party—Front and Back Benches alike.

On that historic occasion, my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister referred also to the general uplifting of standards that the people of this country have enjoyed over the past eleven and a half years. That cannot be taken for granted. There could not be a starker contrast than that between the benefits of private enterprise, free-market capitalism as embodied and personified by this country's Conservative Government and the prospect of starvation in the Soviet Union, where the socialist state system has held so much sway for the past 70 years. That situation is a cause for great concern, compassion and fellow feeling for our fellow human beings, but we should not allow that to blind us to the system that has brought the Russian people to that catastrophic pass. We have the luxury this morning of indulging in a debate on the quality of life, whereas mothers in Moscow are worried about life itself and whether they will have sufficient food to allow their young children to survive the winter. Let us be clear about the benefits of the society in which we live and the principles that activate our policies by comparison with state socialism.

[Mr. Neubert]

My motion is not so much a subject for debate as an agenda for action. It mentions a number of issues that I shall raise, but it does not pretend to be exclusive. No doubt it will be added to by my hon. Friends and others with issues that they consider important, but the motion does serve to highlight some of the principal concerns of the public, particularly in our towns and cities—and most notably of all in our capital of London, where I have the privilege of representing Romford, which is on the city's outer, eastern edge.

Clean air and pure water have long been regarded as everyone's birthright, yet increasingly we see that even they cannot be taken for granted. Members of Parliament, and certainly myself, often find it difficult to point to any legislation that can irrefutably be said to have conferred benefits on the human race. I have always had the greatest confidence in pointing to the Clean Air Act 1956, which undoubtedly benefited the people of this country. It transformed the atmosphere in our cities and removed that Dickensian miasma of life-threatening industrial smog that was such a killer on many past occasions.

Even that achievement of the Government is now put at risk by the increasing freedom, brought about in turn by increasing prosperity, of people to own and drive their own cars, pumping poison into the atmosphere and polluting the street scene for millions. I will give credit where it is due to the Government as I progress through my speech, and I acknowledge that the differential price of lead-free petrol has produced a rapid increase in its use, and thus has significantly reduced the level of pollutants in the atmosphere. That is an example of the role that the Government can play—though as I shall make plain, I do not look to the Government for every contribution in achieving that which we would all like to see. However, in respect of lead-free petrol at least, Government action has proved beneficial and effective in a short time.

London Transport has made a major contribution by banning smoking on the underground. That action was forced upon it by public outrage at the loss of life in the King's Cross fire rather than by health considerations. It followed up that decision with the announcement the day before yesterday that smoking is also to be banned on London buses. That is good news for the 4 million passengers who use London Transport's fleet of 5,000 buses. It has the environmental advantage, as well as the health benefit, that the travelling public will no longer find themselves ankle-deep in cigarette cartons, Cellophane, fag ends and ash—all the detritus of modern pollution that much dismays visitors from other countries, where the public transport systems are often spotless.

London Transport has always suffered the handicap of being first in the field with its underground. Some of its stations and tunnels were constructed in the 19th century, but now it has the chance to come up to date and to run not only an efficient transport operation but one that looks as smart as the transit systems of other countries. One that comes to mind is Washington DC. A clean transport system will be a great asset to our city, and that is the kind of standard we should try to set.

I touch on a theme that will recur in this debate, in referring to the higher expenditure that better environmental standards will incur. However, that investment will be well worth while and advantageous. Self-interest will determine the need for high expenditure. It wi idealistic dream, but a matter of self-in alternative will be a fall in traffic as people ar the idea of using public transport; they will ab other forms. We shall find ourselves in a vic until the subway system becomes dirty and dar a risk to all who use it. I pay tribute to Londo for its courage in leading public opinion awa belief that smoking is an embellishment to the and in banning it completely from its transp

There is certainly a need for greater invest water supplies and water industry. The Riv which flows past this place, was at one time a if one fell into it there was little point in being Today, the Thames supports 60 varieties of attractive part of the townscape, which has enc development of residential and commercial p both banks. That again proves that there is self-interest in creating a pleasing enviro Thames is once more worthy of the capital thr it flows.

The National Rivers Authority, which wa the legislation to privatise the water industry, of the strongest independent environmental agencies in Europe. We can look to the Nati Authority to maintain the quality of our wat have never had any problems about priva Romford because we have always had a pr supply, supplied by the Essex Water compa been the Member for that constituency for m years, I can testify that in all that time I have up complaints with the water company on occasions. So I have every confidence in the p industry. In the next 10 years it plans to invest £28 billion—£5,000 a minute. That will do wo quality of our water. By comparison with developed countries, British water is alread quality, but this investment is needed to continuing quality. The higher charges whic from the need to finance such investment will b while if it ensures the quality of such a vital to life.

The Government have taken action t marine waters around our coastline, and pollution of beaches. Swimming in the sea from our beaches never used to entail any ris nor should it have done. However, it is now disease and often of viral infection. Appar affected one does not need to ingest such infec can be absorbed through the skin. Ther imperative for us to clean up our act in that

In 1987—the European Year of the Enviro European Commission launched the blue award scheme. At present we have 29 such that is not nearly enough. We must give encou that more reach the same high standard. I a that the planned huge investment in sewage tr achieve a much cleaner coastline environmen

Seaside resorts and coastal towns, dependi upon tourism for their livelihood, have an inte clean, tidy and healthy. But my motion is prompted by the squalor of our inland towns cities—notably London. Earlier in the yea Singapore, which is a small, highly suc prosperous island state. Despite being a hive activity, and having a limited amount of spac is like a garden suburb. The streets are clear of all litter and refuse. Traffic congestion is limited in the town centre, and the wide avenues, with well-planted shrubberies and grass verges, are immaculately kempt and are free from all rubbish. The contrast could hardly be more stark. For those who persist in the view that the east is synonymous with primitive living conditions and the west has more civilised standards, it comes as a shock to find that the reverse can be the case. One realises how far our standards have sunk in that respect when one returns to England and drives from Heathrow along our urban roads, which are strewn with every kind of rubbish, to Westminster.

My constituency of Romford, which is otherwise an agreeable place in which to live and work, has not escaped this modern decline. In recent years we have had a problem with litter in the town centre, to such an extent that the local paper, the Romford Recorder, has embarked upon a tidy town campaign. It persuaded the previous council to introduce "operation clean sweep" and new equipment to combat the rising tide of rubbish and filth in the town centre. It had some success, but the problem is unrelenting and fresh impetus is required. I look to the new council to carry on the good work and to bring Romford town centre up to the standard that it deserves if it is to continue to prosper.

There is a growing contrast between conditions within buildings and their external surroundings. I recently visited the social security offices in Romford and was most impressed by the high quality and comfort, by the well-furnished offices, the civilised surroundings awaiting visitors and the improved working conditions for staff. After my visit, I stepped outside the door and was appalled by the scene—refuse, dirt and degradation immediately outside the door of brand new offices. I should say that the rubbish had been there for months.

I welcome the introduction of the draft code of practice on litter and refuse by my right hon. Friends in the various Departments responsible because I believe that this scourge of modern life is now likely to be met by adequate measures. Public authorities are frequently among the worst offenders.

In Romford, it is a question of self-interest for people, especially traders, to endeavour to clean up their act. Romford has become a boom town in recent years, with growing developments of commercial and retail property. It attracts people from all over the area—from east London, Essex and even across the river in Kent. Romford has a wide range of shops to attract people, who can do all their shopping in one visit. However, shoppers will increasingly be put off because standards are not being maintained.

Romford now faces competition from other developments: a £350 million Lakeside development in Thurrock; Eastgate in Basildon; The Royals at Southend; and the £100 million Exchange development in nearby Ilford. All those developments are imaginative and modern, and will prove irresistible to shoppers. Business will be lost to Romford unless we tackle the problem adequately, and ensure that our standards are as high as those anywhere else. Therefore, taking the required action is simply a matter of survival for the town's commercial livelihood. I shall be pleased to play an active part in supporting their efforts.

Many other towns suffer from the same blemish. I welcome the fact that the code tackles the problem of public authorities which allow their land to become an eyesore. I wish the code all success. I hope that it will receive prominence and will be put into effect forcefully, and as quickly as possible.

I have observed that, although many Conservative-controlled London boroughs have given priority to the question of the environment—for example, my former London borough home, Bromley, which was the first with its clean and green campaign—some Labour-controlled inner-city authorities, despite high expenditure, give low priority to street cleaning. I can only conclude that that is a deliberate party-political policy. By creating squalid conditions for their people, they are encouraging the sense of underclass which underpins their political support.

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): That allegation needs to be refuted. I cannot speak for any particular inner London borough, but I remind the hon. Member that Sheffield, a Labour authority, is the recycling city of the United Kingdom. It is leading in this activity.

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for the Environment (Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory): With Government help.

Mr. Griffiths: I am not denying that. Cardiff, again a Labour authority, is taking a similar position in Wales. It does not become the hon. Member, in a debate such as this, to pin a party-political label on the good and the bad. He will find both good and bad Labour and Conservative councils.

Mr. Neubert: I am open to reports that other cities under Labour control have done better, but I can judge only as I find. Being a Member of Parliament for a London constituency and working in London, I observe the street scene in London and can only notice the relative differences between Conservative and Labour authorities there. In London, the worst examples are Labour authorities. This cannot be for lack of money. It is simply that they have put a low priority on this activity. It is open to them to give it a higher priority if they wish to refute my allegation. I realise it was a serious and provocative allegation in what would otherwise be an all-party debate, but it was necessary to make it because it is simply not necessary for such squalor to continue in our inner cities. Living in the heart of one of our modern cities does not mean that people should have to endure the living conditions forced on them when local authorities do not carry out their duties.

Help is at hand. I have here a booklet containing a code of practice that will make it possible for lack of implementation of such policies to be challenged by individuals. An aggrieved citizen will be able to seek a litter abatement order and, given the increasing interest in the environment, I am sure that there will be no lack of aggrieved citizens ready to act. The code of practice lays down definitions of litter and will be innovative in two ways. First, it will define standards of cleanliness achievable in different types of locations—an important part of my motion. People who live in towns should not have to suffer a less attractive environment than people in the country or in more rural areas. The code sets a common universal standard for Britain as a whole.

Secondly, the code is concerned not with having a regular rota of cleaning and with how frequently streets are cleaned, but with the achievement of a level of cleanliness. In other words, if a street does not need to be cleaned so often, it should not be. Attention will be targeted on those streets that need continuous sweeping or cleaning. Expressed in its simplest terms, the code of practice says, "If it's not dirty, don't clean it." As I have explained, that is not the problem at the moment. I look to the code of practice, to which no doubt my hon. Friend the Minister will refer, for some help in dealing with the major problems of graffiti, litter and refuse in our streets.

[Mr. Neubert]

I shall pass quickly over how to reduce noise levels because the House recently had an opportunity to discuss this matter. However, my experience in politics and public life has shown me that noise is of utmost importance. I support the aims of the Noise Abatement Society. I wish success to anybody who aims at reducing noise.

Complementary to clearing our streets of litter and refuse is efficient waste management and recycling of material resources. The throwaway society has become a contemporary cliché, but people are now realising the folly of such a policy. Modern ways of over-packaging and over-presenting products cause people to be angry because not only is this wasteful, but it causes extra litter. Fast-food outlets are very much in sight here because people realise that fast-food containers threaten rain forests—it is as serious as that.

Efficient waste management is coming very much to the fore. I am glad to say that some local authorities—the hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) may have some sterling examples—are active in this. He mentioned Sheffield, but I shall mention three Conservative authorities. East Sussex has developed a solid fuel that is waste derived, and that will greatly benefit the environment. It recycles six different products, and is very much to the fore in these matters. Test Valley has recently appointed a recycling officer and the money saved by recycling is going back to the community. That incentive should be encouraged. Devon county council has been designated a recycling county and it now recycles 10,000 tonnes of waste a year, which is about 2·5 per cent. of its total waste every year.

The Government have set the demanding target that, by the year 2000, 50 per cent. of recyclable household waste should be recycled. I shall be interested to hear how they are planning to achieve that. We must appreciate that these resources are valuable. For example, water, unmetered and unlimited at the tap, is a precious natural resource that should not be profligately used, as it has been, without thought for the future.

Mr. James Arbuthnot (Wanstead and Woodford): My hon. Friend spoke of the code of practice and mentioned that it includes graffiti. I rushed out to get a copy of it. One of the things that concerns me in my constituency is that there is far too much graffiti, but I am not sure that the code of practice deals with graffiti in as much detail as I would like. I have leafed through the White Paper as carefully as I can, but I am not sure of the effect that it will have on graffiti. This is one of the most important issues in the environment of Wanstead and Woodford and probably in the constituency of my hon. Friend. Will he comment on it?

Mr. Neubert: My hon. Friend is right to highlight the need to remove graffiti from buildings. I, too, did not find much promise in the code of a solution to this problem, but I have no doubt that my hon. Friend th heard what my hon. Friend has said and w it later. I commend London Transport f prosecution of the mindless vandals wh appearance of so much of its rolli spray-painted graffiti. The public should every effort to remove this anti-social beh

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): Do no recent prosecutions of people going in for destructive painting of underground trains show that small groups of people manage t of the landscape? The vast majority of involved and they disapprove, and they authorities to police the underground by sa notice people spraying graffiti so that th caught before they make it look as t widespread habit.

Mr. Neubert: Those are salutary words that I have the support of the House whe must look to the public to support the authorities are taking because this is a soc is a matter for peer groups. Parents and inculcate in children a concern for the en consideration for others. Some youngster graffiti attractive, and this must be rigoro

To conclude my list of items for action, my head above the level of the gutter and and talk about that part of our enviro represented by our stately homes and garde heritage is part of our life. With increas mobility, people are able to enjoy a heritag to this country.

The National Trust has been one remarkable success stories of the post-w millions of people have access to propert longer exclusively accessible to the we aristocracy. I am happy to say that I am a the National Trust. I very much support a preserve our heritage.

The Historic Houses Association, unde of the Earl of Shelburne, covers properties by no fewer than 11 million people a yea are owned and maintained by individua expense. The responsibility for looking af ruinous. Apart from natural disasters, su storms and those that we suffered earlier th repair and maintenance can be extren particularly because of the need to u materials and techniques. Some of the ow the costs too hard to bear; they have be resources. During the past 10 years, 250 been sold. That is no surprise, but it is a m In the main, those properties will probab open to the public, or even be used as resid purpose they were designed and built.

Some owners have established mai They provide the owners with no direct The funds have been established to finance repair and to improve visitor facilities. N income from the funds is taxed at 35 per ce Houses Association believes that to be a maintenance of this part of our heritag owners sell works of art for this purpose, they have to pay the full capital gains tax. Value added tax also has to be paid on repair and maintenance work.

A country confident of itself and concerned to maintain its heritage should be alarmed about such a trend and ought to seek to arrest it. Other countries make major tax concessions for this purpose. Although this may not be a popular theme on Conservative Benches, given our unique heritage I believe that the Government ought to be prepared to do more to help the owners of these properties. The Government may believe that the owners ought to look after them, but that is unrealistic. The owners recognise the public value their houses and believe that the Government ought to make a contribution towards their upkeep. A balance has to be struck. The Government have provided help in the past, but there is scope for further Government help. As prosperity increases, more and more people will want to visit these houses.

There are many other aspects of the environment to which I could draw the attention of the House. The Government's role ought to be limited to implementing the minimum amount of regulation. They should also encourage the education of young people about the importance of the environment. Environmental policy is a subject in the new national curriculum. Like so much else, however, it comes back to the individual. It starts in the home and continues in school. Parents and teachers need to work in partnership to bring about greater awareness of the need not to foul our own nest but to maintain a pleasant, attractive and healthy environment.

There may be a need for even stricter regulation. There is a hint of autocracy in Singapore. I should not be averse to the introduction of a regulation that requires property owners to be responsible for the appearance of their property and even for the pavement in front of it. It is all a question of discipline and good order. Evidence of health hazards has shocked us into taking action. They have made us more aware of the importance of the environment. It is not just a question, however, of safety or health considerations, or even of legal requirements. An attractive, well-ordered and tidy environment is part of our birthright and part of our responsibility as members of the community. We should all endeavour to play our full part.

10.14 am

Mr. Alan Williams (Swansea, West): I congratulate the hon. Member for Romford (Mr. Neubert) on his good luck in winning first place in the ballot and even more on his choice of subject. I thank him for giving the House this opportunity to debate the wide range of issues that he included, helpfully, in his motion. My hon. Friends and I were fascinated to hear of his experience when travelling from what he thought was the civilised west to the less civilised east but finding standards in Singapore which, constrasted with what he found when he returned to Heathrow, were much higher, thus leading to his belief that the balance was in favour of the east.

What interests my hon. Friends and I is that this is not just a matter of hemispheres, of east versus west, or of the east compared with the west. It just so happens that what the hon. Gentleman left in the east was a socialist society and that he returned to a conservative society when he landed at Heathrow. Therefore, we welcome his example. We understand the problems that he faces in Romford. The poll tax and the other policies and philosophies that he so ardently supports have led to much of the dirt, muck and mire that we see in our streets, because local authorities have had either to contract out their cleansing services or to cut them. We are most grateful to the hon. Gentleman. He has told us about two experiences that we shall certainly note and quote on future occasions. I assure him that he will get full attribution when we do so.

I shall concentrate on the gulf between declared Government attitudes on green issues and Government decisions, and I shall give three examples from my experience. The first is a general point; the others are specific. They demonstrate that an important change is taking place because of the loss of control over the local environment by the local community and its switch to central Government. Increasingly, ministerial administrative diktat, without reference to the House of Commons, can overrule the rights of the public, local control and local environmental considerations.

The first general change was made by the right hon. Member for Cirencester and Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley). Among a series of disastrous decisions—one of which is the abomination of a tower that one has to look at across the Thames—he made a very important administrative decision that did not need the approval of the House of Commons. He said that, in future, the presumption in planning applications would be switched in favour of the developer, the applicant. We live under a regime where it is presumed that land is suitable to be developed, unless those who oppose the development can prove that there is good reason why it would not take place.

That change did not attract the attention that it deserved. It massively switched the balance of advantage from the local community and those who protect the environment to profit-seeking, often parasitic, developers who have only one interest—to make a quick buck and then to withdraw from the area, leaving local people to live with the consequences of their greed.

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): The presumption is in the process of being changed. The right hon. Gentleman is therefore no longer correct, because an application must be considered according to the current structure plan and local plan. Under a current local plan, there will no longer be a presumption in favour of building, but if the proposal is outside the local plan the presumption will be against all development.

Mr. Williams: I shall give an example of a Minister doing the opposite under a local plan. I am glad to receive the hon. Gentleman's endorsement of the sanctity of the local plan. The hon. Gentleman says that the system will change. I am delighted to hear it, but why is it not changing now? Such a change needs not legislation but a Minister to issue guidance, and the emphasis would be switched back to the local community. If the Government believe that a change is necessary in a week's time, it is necessary now. I hope that it will be announced that as from today the balance has been restored to the local community. Councils are increasingly reluctant to refuse marginal planning applications. They fear that, because of the prejudgment of the Department, appeals will go against them and they will have to pay the applicant's costs for counsel, architects and so on.

That change weakened the protective function of local authorities and was an important alteration to the framework. If the Government will now admit that it was a mistake, I should be the first to applaud that admission and to welcome an urgent change in the guidance given to local authorities.

[Mr. Williams]

In many ways, the second problem is far more important constitutionally. Ministers exercise an Executive function and, because of their role in Departments, a quasi-judicial function. The Secretaries of State for the Environment, for Scotland and for Wales make decisions on planning applications.

Let me demonstrate a new and invidous situation that is dangerous constitutionally. It cannot be challanged in the courts or it would have been, but it has shades of Crichel Down and it worries me when I see this clear confusion of functions within Departments. West Glamorgan health authority had about 12 acres of land, much of which was being used for allotments. The Welsh Office issued a circular stating that health authorities had to dispose of any land surplus to their requirements at the best possible realisable value. In other words, they had to get the best added value. The same circular said that this would normally mean applying for planning consent for the land. If it was refused, they were told to appeal to the Welsh Office, which had issued the circular telling them to sell the land. What chance did my constituents have? Allotment holders, who had been there many years, waged a campaign on behalf of the whole community to keep this green wedge in the heart of a built-up section of Swansea. All the residents in the area, the local authorities, the city and the county opposed it. To their credit, the protests continued for a long time, but—surprise, surprise—eventually the health authority, in keeping with the circular, appealed to the Welsh Office.

It does not take much imagination for hon. Members to guess the outcome of the appeal. But where is the quasi-judicial independence? At some time, every hon. Member present has written to a Minister about planning and has received a reply saying, "I note the points that you make, but I cannot comment on them because in the event of an appeal I exercise a quasi-judicial role." We all know that it is the constitutional reality, but that independence is distorted by the Department telling authorities not only to sell land but to apply for planning consent and to appeal to the same impartial Minister if it is refused.

Hon. Members will gather that I do not regard the Welsh Office as the most competent administrative centre in Whitehall. In England, as far as I can gather—the Minister's office was most helpful in trying to get information for me at short notice—there has been one instance of an education authority being told that it must sell land that had been preserved for school use. That had never happened in Wales, but within days of taking office the Secretary of State for Wales issued such a directive to West Glamorgan county council. It was opposed by local residents, even local Conservative councillors, the county and the city, and petitions were handed in. The Secretary of State admitted in a parliamentary answer that he had received only one representation in favour of it, two and a half years ago, from a developer outside Swansea. The then Secretary of State wisely sat on it for two and a half years. In a letter, the developer said that the land was needed for development and to create building jobs in Swansea.

In the two and a half years since that made—this touches on the point of the h South Hams (Mr. Steen)—more than 40 have been released on planning consent i Most of them are still empty—so much —because developers are unable to go released plots. The Land Authority for said that more plots are not needed
Swansea.

Almost two years after the initial appl plan was approved in April. In that pl marked clearly for future school developn who had originally applied for use of th did not appeal against the local plan. Give Office considered that the site shoul residential rather than school developmen any such suggestion during the consultati local plan. At the very time when there c proper inquiry and democratic discussio plan and the allocation of the land, the the developer kept their heads down and

In July, just three months after the approved, the Welsh Office turned rou directive to the West Glamorgan educat sell the six acres. The Welsh Office has im of 22 December on the education autho
the Welsh Office will enforce its decision

The local authority, however, will application for the residential use of the marked in the local plan for school use desperately needed. It will do so on the plan approved and lodged with the Wels Subsequently, an appeal will be made to and the Secretary of State will put on hi that respect his need is not as great as mi of State, having told the local education a land must be sold, will then purport to m judicial decision on the planning ap application does not command the sup people; only one supporting representatio and it comes from outside the area. The is that the Secretary of State is not just ju prosecutor, too. In fact, in terms of Swan the villain, the prosecutor and judge an exactly popular, as I am sure hon.
understand.

When the hon. Member for Romfor was at the Ministry of Defence I had ma helpful discussions with him, but I regre
MOD is also disposed to use administ override local opinion. The House will assume that Swansea is suffering fro complex, but a recent decision of the M serious environmental impact on the are

We were all astonished at the recent pr a £100 million refit of a nuclear subm suddenly decommissioned. However, S had a new status conferred on it by t decided that that city is to have a Z-ber nuclear submarine. No chance was giv discussion of that decision; the Ministry j
To be fair, that does not mean that the for the Armed Forces reached his reference to outside advice. He put tha committee. That nameless, faceless co mous for security reasons—consists

Seventeen members are either former military staff, former MOD staff or existing MOD officials. The odds are slightly in the Minister's favour, particularly as I gather that the other half dozen committee members are almost certainly representatives from the nuclear industry.

Public opinion appears not to count and the only check on the MOD decision is a committee appointed by the Minister, largely staffed by his men. The MOD has been challenged about that, but it states that it always follows its advice. That is hardly surprising given that the advisory committee is made up of the Minister's own men. They consider the proposition and it is not subject to any democratic appeal or meaningful representation.

My hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, East (Mr. Anderson) and I welcomed a deputation who came up from Swansea with a petition about the decision. The Minister refused to see them, so they went with us to the MOD where we intended to hand in the petition. At the MOD the Minister had the cheek to send down a message to say that he would see the two hon. Members, but not the people who brought the petition. Not surprisingly we told him that we could do without that type of meeting.

Swansea docks are in the heart of the community and they represent the dividing line between the two Swansea constituencies. A nuclear reactor is now to be stationed in those docks. One does not want to be theatrical about it, but it is hard not to be when the MOD is decommissioning its nuclear submarines as fast as it can. Given that it wrote off overnight a £100 million refit because of faults with the reactor, one is left with the suspicion that something must be wrong.

What rights do we have in Swansea to oppose the MOD decision? Absolutely none. All that we get are assurances from the Minister of State for the Armed Forces that, in his opinion, the reactor is safe. If it is that safe, he should have it in his constituency. The city council, the county council, the citizens of Swansea and my hon. Friend and I do not want it, but the Z-berth will be imposed on us. The Government are willing to write off £100 million, but what assurances are we given about protecting the environment? We have been told that there will be a 550 m security zone.

Mr. Arbuthnot: My hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Mr. Neubert) will not make the point for himself, but I assure the right hon. Gentleman that Romford is not a suitable place to berth nuclear submarines.

Mr. Williams: I would not want the nuclear submarine to get lost in the sea of rubbish which it would encounter if it tried to go down Romford high street. The hon. Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot) was gallantly trying to protect his hon. Friend, but he had no need to because I was not attacking him. I was attacking the present Minister of State for the Armed Forces.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The present Minister of State for the Armed Forces also has a landlocked constituency, so the same argument applies.

Mr. Williams: If the Minister tried for either of the Swansea constituencies, he would not be elected. Perhaps he can afford to be so insensitive about the issue because his constituency is not affected. As a former Parliamentary Private Secretary to an ex-Prime Minister, the Minister knows his way round Whitehall and he should understand the way in which the system works. I was not attacking the hon. Member for Romford, who gave me the opportunity to make this speech.

I gave three examples: of a hospital site, of a school site and of a decision about a nuclear submarine berth. I have tried to show that Ministers may make the right sounds on environmental matters, but that their actions and decisions belie their green pretensions.

10.40 am

Mr. Peter Bottomley (Eltham): I am grateful to my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Mr. Neubert) for giving the House the chance to discuss this important subject. No one but he could do justice to the whole range of issues, and I congratulate him on the way in which he canvassed the various subjects to which other hon. Members will want to return. Some hon. Members have long-term interests in some of the subjects. My hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen)—I am pleased to see that he has flown in—has been dealing with derelict land for many years. He shows that continuity of interest which is so important, and the House is grateful that he has been able to adjust his diary to be here today.

The right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) has given us some interesting ideas. Epsom and Ewell is not a nuclear-free zone, but one must remember that submarines tend to go by water and not by land. No one could accuse Conservative Ministers of a NIMBY syndrome on such issues. The House will remember that Lord Pym, when he was a Member of this House, agreed to medium-range missiles being based in his own constituency. Such toughness has led to some of the changes in eastern Europe to which my hon. Friend the Member for Romford referred.

It is only when we allow the media to see what is happening in different countries that we discover what an environmental disaster state socialism has been. It has also been an economic disaster for the people and a military disaster.

I want to raise some important environmental issues in my own constituency of Eltham. That area is well known to my hon. Friend the Member for Romford because, early in his 40 years of distinguished service to the community, he was the youngest mayor of Bromley. At that time he would occasionally have driven into London through my constituency and, for all I know, he may still go through it on his way to east London.

He will have noticed that there has been an environmental improvement for 21,000 of my constituents as a result of the building of the Rochester way relief road. I am grateful to the Rees Jeffries Road Fund for funding an appraisal of the operational, environmental and economic impact of that important road. As many hon. Members will know, the A2 goes through the middle of my constituency, which lies in the southern part of the borough of Greenwich. The road has had traffic jams since 1381 when Wat Tyler came up from Canterbury with his band of friends. He was held up at the Well Hall roundabout for four hours and had to camp overnight on Blackheath so that the right hon. Member for Chesterfield (Mr. Benn) could give an annual address on the back of a flat-top lorry.

It is worth noting that the missing three miles of road between Falconwood to the east and the Blackwall tunnel approach to the west had been a planning disgrace, an environmental disgrace and a transport disgrace. For 40 years, there had been a gap and the reason was that, traditionally, my constituency has been a marginal seat.

[Mr. Peter Bottomley]

It was felt that building a necessary bit of road might swing the votes of 200 people, which could decide whether there was a Tory or a Labour Member of Parliament. That in turn could decide whether there was a Tory or Labour Government and that could decide whether we made progress in the European Community, depending on which side of the fence the Labour party was sitting in a particular year when an election might take place. The missing road was being held hostage for the political fortunes of the country.

Fortunately, there were some local people who were willing to fight. In 1974, when I was first adopted as a prospective parliamentary candidate, I began to go for walks with mothers with prams along the Rochester way at 5 pm on a Friday. We had a police escort and, of course, if the police had told us not to do it, we would not have done it. We were a law-abiding community group and, as a Conservative Member, I would not dream of getting involved in some of the ludicrous arguments that we noticed this morning on television when we heard the results of the Paisley by-elections. The Labour party and the Scottish National party were discussing whether to break the law.

We believe that the law should be obeyed and we are grateful that the present leader of the Opposition agrees. I wish that he would say so to Councillor MacParland, a Labour councillor on Greenwich council, who is the prime organiser of the Greenwich campaign against the poll tax. Let us begin to see some steel and determination from the Labour leader even if he is at risk of being replaced by the right hon. and learned Member for Monklands, East (Mr. Smith).

From 1974 to 1978, we had great difficulty with the local council, which was Labour controlled. However, I agree with other hon. Members that we should be as non-partisan as possible today. I give the council its political label for those who will read the report of the debate later. It was only in 1978 that Greenwich council realised that the people of Eltham were keen to have the road. The council needed a fig leaf to cover its change of policy. It asked the Greater London council to carry out an assessment of the environmental impact of a new road and to see what damage the old road was doing.

The three-mile stretch of poor road was adversely affecting 25,000 people. The economic analysis showed that the new road would not quite pay in cost-benefit terms, but the reason for building it was the environmental improvement for local people. At Deansfield school, on the old road, children were exposed not only to the traffic dangers of 42,000 vehicles a day going past, but to the lead, to the fumes, to the smog, to the smoke and to all the poisons that are part of the cost of our present motor engine.

I look forward to two developments. In the long term, I look forward to the development of the electric engine for shorter journeys of up to about 50 miles. Being able to use cars that are pollutant-free as they go through the areas in which people live will be an important development.

In the shorter term, I hope that many more people will switch to lead-free fuel. It is good that my hon. Friend the Member for Surrey, South-West (Mrs. Bottomley) helped to push up the sales of lead-free petrol from less than 1 or 2 per cent. to 31 or 32 per cent. That was a great achievement, but we must realise that almost three times as many people could use lead-free fuel.

I have recently disposed of a 13-year-old Ford Fiesta. The adjustment to lead-free fuel took two minutes at Ryan's Van Hire of Romford. I dropped in without an appointment for 10 minutes on the way to opening a lead-free fuel pump.

Mr. Irvine Patnick (Sheffield, Hallam): By appointment?

Mr. Bottomley: I had an appointment to attend the opening. That old car could use lead-free fuel three times out of four. If that Ford could do so, many other cars, especially new cars, could do so as well. I hope that, when people take their cars in for winter servicing, they will check with the garage, with the Society of Motor Manufacturers and Traders, which has a help line, with the Royal Automobile Club, with the Automobile Association or with the Department of Transport. They will then find out whether they are wasting 10p a gallon and whether they are contributing to throwing into the air tonnes of unnecessary lead, which falls on our faces, is breathed in, falls on our food and is a potential development hazard, especially to children.

Last night I was privileged to give the St. Andrews lecture at Holy Trinity church in Barnes. I discussed the idea that we could do a great deal more to improve the environment if we halved the distance between our homes and our places of work. That may not be possible for all Members of Parliament but, in time, people who travel for an hour or so by train or car to get to work and back ought to be able to change their jobs or their homes. People would spend less on train fares, cars and petrol and their well-being would be greatly enhanced. They could probably double or treble the amount of spare time that they enjoyed. I think that it is that kind of well-being that my hon. Friend the Member for Romford was anxious to promote in initiating this debate.

We should accept the need for mobility, for improvements in public transport and for some capital investment in public transport, not all of which can be underground. I welcome the large increase in investment in public transport, which has come about largely because of the change in people's travelling habits in and around London.

Between 1982 and 1987—a period of unparalleled growth and economic prosperity—the number of people commuting to London by car each day fell from 190,000 to 160,000. That fall should have been noted and welcomed by the environmental campaigning groups, but either they did not know of or they chose not to notice the information being put out by the Department of Transport during my time there.

The number of people commuting by rail increased by 20 per cent. during the same period, and that led to reinvestment and to the further improvement of the service, although it also caused overcrowding. The same applied to London Underground which unfortunately has not yet reached the London borough of Greenwich. We hope that the link to the east of London will come through the Greenwich peninsula, even though that will not directly help my constituents. I hope that massive capita investment will continue, especially as the number of journeys on London Underground each day increased by 70 per cent. during the five-year period to which I referred. Again, that development was not noted or welcomed by Transport 2000 or Friends of the Earth.

The Rochester way relief road was built because local people wanted it. I cannot say the same about the approach road to the east London river crossing. I think that I was the first person to point out, in 1983, that an approach road through Eltham would only damage local people.

The bridge itself may or may not be necessary to those north of the river. I know that Newham is strongly in favour of the bridge and of the construction of a decent road, as well as a rail link, to connect Newham to the channel ports and the rest of Europe. I pay tribute to the way in which Labour Members who represent Newham have argued in favour of that opportunity for economic development. But I want them to know that in Eltham the approach road will do only damage. There is no gain to Eltham. There may be some gain to Thamesmead, which needs jobs and needs to be linked in as far as possible. But in Eltham the approach road would be an environmental disaster, not least because of its potential effect on Oxleas woods. Before I became a Transport Minister, I was a leading member of the campaign to avoid or minimise the damage. While I was a Minister, I continued to convey the representations that I received, although Ministers are not allowed to take decisions about their own constituencies —a necessary and wise protection against corruption and special dealing.

Since I left the Department, I have been able once more to say openly what my constituents have been saying and what I was saying before. I object strongly to the suggestion by some environmental campaign groups that there has been a U-turn in my behaviour. I ask them to stop spreading lies because it does not help.

The person in the best position to help secure protection for Oxleas woods and Eltham is me. I have focused on a matter with which Greenwich council has failed to deal. Incidentally, I should like to tell the House of a coincidence. Greenwich council cut off funding to the objectors at the second inquiry into the bridge. The objectors came to me. I took up the matter with Greenwich council, which decided to spend £67,000 on representations. The announcement was made by Councillor John Austin Walker, who happens to be the prospective Labour candidate standing against the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) and by Councillor Clive Efford, who happens to be the prospective Labour candidate standing against me in Eltham. If we are to take a bipartisan approach to trying to reduce the impact on the woods, the local Labour group had better stop giving the impression that it is spending £67,000 of local residents' money to help its candidates at the forthcoming election.

Mr. Alan Williams: One interpretation is that the prospective candidates will be able to do what the sitting Member of Parliament has failed to do.

Mr. Bottomley: It is true that, as councillors, they can divert £67,000 of local residents' money for purposes that they choose.

There is a second coincidence. When Greenwich council last appointed members to the district health authority, it did not just pick Councillor John Austin Walker, the prospective Labour candidate for Woolwich, and Councillor Clive Efford, the prospective Labour candidate for Eltham; it appointed Mr. Nick Raynsford, the prospective Labour candidate for Greenwich. If there is one reason for changing the system of appointments to health authorities, it is Greenwich council's behaviour.

In 1982, Greenwich council decided to increase the rate burden on local residents by 59 per cent. in one year. That is the equivalent of a property revaluation of 50 per cent. under the old system, and we saw what damage that did in Scotland.

If we want to protect and improve our environment, we had better start working together. People had better not fall into Greenwich council's habit of turning everything into a party-political issue. The council changed its mind two or three times on the Rochester way relief road and I expect they will do the same with the approach road.

Part of the £67,000 that Greenwich used could better have been spent on an independent analysis of whether the slip roads off the approach road to the east London river crossing—at the Shooters hill interchange—could be dropped. If those slip roads are not needed, the money can be used to cover over the road as it cuts through the woods. If, as was decided at the first inquiry, it is necessary for the road to go through the woods to serve those north of the river—the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) may have a view on that—we ought to cover it over. That will be decided following a decision on whether the slip roads are needed. Department of Transport engineers believe that they are necessary. I ask Greenwich council to switch some of its resources to an independent assessment of whether those slip roads can be dropped.

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I did not intervene when the hon. Gentleman was complaining about the appointment of Greenwich councillors, although I could have done, as the Government made great play of appointing the chairmen of the regional health authorities and of ensuring that they were all good loyal Conservatives. That sort of think tends to happen. Having said that, I entirely support the hon. Gentleman's campaign to avoid the destruction or deterioration of Oxleas wood—a very historic part of London.

Mr. Bottomley: In defence of regional health authority chairmen, I should point to the record of the chairman of South-East Thames regional health authority. I am having a dispute with him because of the authority's ludicrous decision to spend £50 million on moving its neuroscience department from Shooters hill to Denmark hill. There will be no economic gain from the move, which is merely intended to tie in neuroscience with psychiatry. However much that may please my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden), it is a ludicrous waste of resources.

To the best of my knowledge and belief, however, the chairman of the regional health authority has no publicly expressed politics. He was a distinguished permanent secretary. He gives much of his time to voluntary groups. He has done much to promote mobility for the disabled and he chairs the authority in a distinctive and distinguished way.

Mr. Banks: He is a Tory.

Mr. Bottomley: I do not think that he is a Tory at all. I give a public warning that that £50 million is not available and will not be spent to maintain hospital services in the south and the east of the borough of Greenwich.

I am grateful to the hon. Member for Newham, North-West. He confirms that, even though people north of the river are desperate to have the bridge and a road to link to the bridge to bring Newham into the road network, there is support north of the river to minimise the impact on Oxleas woods. I hope that Newham would be willing to contribute with Greenwich to the assessment of the slip roads.

Normally, covering a road by constructing a tunnel would treble the cost of a road. I suspect that, in the case of Oxleas woods, only an extra £10 million or £12 million would be necessary to cover the road if the slip roads are not necessary. If Greenwich council, with Newham's help, carried out a study which confirmed that the slip roads were necessary, my case would become more difficult to argue. However, so far we do not have any information.

I was shocked and horrified to discover that Greenwich has spent so much money in so many ways, but it has not assessed the slip roads. If we deal with the specifics, we will provide arguments that lead to progress. That is what happened with the Rochester way relief road.

I want to consider briefly the conclusions of the independent study on the effects of the Rochester way relief road. As I have said, the road was built for the benefit of local people. I believe that it is the only major trunk road to be opened in inner London, within the old London county council area, in the past 10 years or [illegible] confirms what I used to say at the Department of Transport—that roads are built only if there are significant advantages for local people. I cannot say that about the approach road to the east London river crossing, but in general that is true.

The conclusion of the independent study entitled "An appraisal of the operational, environmental and economic impacts of the Rochester way relief road" includes the fact that most of the objectives set down in advance were realised in practice. It is interesting that the traffic model did not predict the significant reduction in traffic on Shooters hill road. That unexpected reduction in traffic may influence whether the slip roads are needed in Oxleas woods for the link to the road to the east London river crossing.

The study states that the impact on the urban landscape has been achieved at the cost of

"some disruption during construction and some considerable sacrifice in terms of lost homes and businesses and some loss of open space. Nevertheless, it has been designed and built in such a way that very little additional severance has been created either physically or visually."

In South-east London, far too many people suffer from the effects of traffic and many of us are part of the problem. One of my constituents asked me whether he could help in the campaign about the impact of the road on Oxleas woods. I told him that he could and that he should tell me how many cars were in his road at night and how many in the middle of the day. I was told that nearly all the cars moved. We are all part of the problem and we need to find ways of reducing our impact on the environment.

Part of the solution is to park and ride. Preferably, people should park as far outside London as possible instead of driving in and crowding the roads. It would be far better to allow British Rail to carry people as long distance as possible. Part of the impact of t improvements to the railway station and to the roads Eltham has been that the commuters' cars are bei parked all day in unsuitable residential roads.

I hope that in the various transport Bills that are to introduced this Session we can find ways to enable lo authorities to say that, apart from residents, no outsi should be able to park on a residential road near a stati for longer than three hours. That would allow plenty time for shopping and it would be good for local tra However, it would stop someone coming in selfishly 7.30 am and avoiding the station car park. It would st that person leaving his car in that residential road all d thus making life miserable for local people who have drive around and then find it difficult to stop to shop trade.

An associated problem is that, unfortunately, there vandals and delinquents around. Eltham station car p is half empty partly because people can park free—it is f parking to them, but it has an environmental cost to oth —in nearby streets and partly because of car break-in shall be asking British Transport police and Metropolitan police to set up a study group w Greenwich council with a plan for action to cut by t thirds within 12 months the number of break-ins in Eltham station car park.

We should also spend more time dealing with d dealers. Whether they peddle hard drugs or soft, t generate crime on an almost unbelievable scale. One d dealer may have only 20 clients, each of whom may sp £200 a week on his habit. The client will not earn t money, he will have to take about £2,000 worth of go to the people who handle drugs to get his £200. To £2,000 worth of goods a week, he will probably have to £40,000 worth of damage. If we multiply that £40,00 week of damage caused by people trying to fund t habits, we are talking about more than £750,000 damage to the community from one drugs dealer.

Anyone in Eltham who notices drug dealing or u should contact the police. That is the way to cut crime to have confidence in the station car park. It is one wa improving the environment, and it would also cut d the number of juveniles who are led into persis delinquency and to crime.

The Rochester way relief road study also revealed the traffic flows have been virtually as expected. No e traffic has been generated. Many of the arguments a the impact of building roads were wrong and many o arguments used by people like me have been right. possible to design roads to make local improvem without tempting people to throw away their rail se tickets and get back into their cars to commute.

If we can persist in those approaches, we can reduc number of people commuting long distances by However, I call for partnership. I got myself into hot w on the day of the launch of that good magazine Express when I said that I would not spend any mon help people to divert from rail to road. There wa uproar. The British Road Federation and others aske Prime Minister to sack me. Well, they were successful or three years after that, but not on that issue. environmentalist contacted me to say that I said the thing. I was told, "Don't worry about the car lobby, y doing the kind of thing that will help protect the environment." My shoulders are broad enough in case, but we must persist to find the right way of improving the environment with the help of individuals, local councils and Government.

I hope that we can continue to work together and that we shall have a debate similar to this in two years in the hope that this debate will have helped to reinforce the good work that many are doing and woken up those who have been apathetic or ignorant about the problems.

11.6 am

Mr. Simon Hughes (Southwark and Bermondsey): This is the first specific debate on the environment under the new Administration. I congratulate the hon. Member for Romford (Mr. Neubert) on choosing this subject and on his motion. I agree with everything he said, but I have one reservation. I am not sure whether his interpretation of the phrase

"and calls on the Government, through the necessary minimum regulation", would be my interpretation of that phrase. The difference between the rest of the House—and I generalise here—and my colleagues and I is that we believe that there is sometimes a need for local government and authorities to be specific and to intervene to prevent things.

In certain matters, relying on education, encouragement, exhortation and financial incentives is not enough. I am not saying that I assume that the hon. Member for Romford rejects intervention in all cases. I am sure that he does not. However, the difference between us is that there are times when he would say, "No, we must leave that to people's judgment, to education and to the market." I believe that environmental damage is too harmful and we must be far more interventionist in two ways: first, by using economic levers to encourage or discourage, and, secondly by occasionally saying, "I'm sorry, you're not allowed to do that."

I have also a reservation about this week's changes on the Government Benches. I told the right hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. Major) that, had I been a Tory, I would have voted for him not just because he is a south Londoner and out of geographical loyalty, but because, of all the people standing for leadership of the Tory party, he had a better understanding of the concerns of ordinary people and a greater commitment to social equality and justice. I look forward to that being regarded as a change in his Administration compared with the Administration of his predecessor.

However, there is one respect in which I already have a great reservation about the new Administration. I do not know whether the Under-Secretary of State for the Environment will retain his position after the reshuffle, so I do not impute to him any blame at all. In his pronouncements on the steps of No. 10 Downing street the new Prime Minister said that, among other things, he was committed to an improved quality of life for all our citizens. One word that has disappeared from the Prime Ministerial vocabulary since the handover is "environment". His predecessor's sudden interest in the environment has disappeared. In the priorities that the new Prime Minister has made clear, the word "environment" has not even once passed his lips.

In the Tory party's desperate need to shake off the political albatross of the poll tax—I do not blame the Tory party for wanting to get rid of that legacy of the previous regime—it has chosen somebody to go into the Department of the Environment, not for environmental reasons, but to deal with the poll tax. For the foreseeable future, the Department of the Environment is the Department for sorting out the poll tax. That is sad.

However hesitant and restricted he was, the previous Secretary of State for the Environment, now the chairman of the Conservative party, at least tried to paint Government policy green and make sure that green issues were more central in all Departments. He was having trouble with the Department of Transport and the Department of Energy, but he was trying. There is a danger that, because of the trouble of the poll tax and because the poll tax is the responsibility of the Department in charge of housing, local government finance and environmental issues, the Tories' green period may already be over. It will have been a very brief green period. That is to be regretted.

I fear that, as we approach the next election, concerns about the global environment—for example, global warming, harmful emissions or nuclear waste—will be further from the front of the new Administration's shop window as other, more domestic and short-term matters are put forward. I am not saying that somebody should not sort out the poll tax and get rid of it before the next election. Everybody seems to offer advice to the new Prime Minister and his Ministers. I join the Leader of the Opposition in offering advice to the Prime Minister. If he decided to abolish the poll tax rather than refine it, he would increase his and his hon. Friend's electoral prospects. Perhaps his hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Bowden), who has a thin majority, would benefit from the abolition of the poll tax like no other now that the former Prime Minister is resident in his constituency and exemplifies its unfairness for every resident of our borough.

Mr. Steen: There is nothing wrong with the community charge; it is just the amount. What we have to do is get the amount down and it will be a great success. I would not go down the hon. Gentleman's track.

Mr. Hughes: If the hon. Gentleman has survived so far and still has that belief, he is a less intelligent political diviner than I thought. I have not found many people who, even if the poll tax is lower, think that it is wonderful. The only gainers are the people who had a high rates bill and now have a low poll tax bill, and even they, in large measure, say that it is grossly unfair.

Mr. Steen rose——

Mr. Hughes: I shall not give way. Other hon. Members want to speak. It is not a debate about the poll tax.

Mr. Steen: The hon. Gentleman brought it up.

Mr. Hughes: Yes, I did, because it has suddenly appeared on the environmental agenda instead of proper environmental matters. It is in that context that I made the point.

The hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) and I have at least two things in common. First, we are both inner south-east London constituency Members, and, secondly, our constituencies are joined by the A2. It begins in my constituency as it sets off from the old borough of Southwark to London Bridge and on its way down to Dover.

I agree with many of the hon. Gentleman's comments. Transport is a crucial local environmental issue. I agree that to have improvements in the fuel that we use—for example, much more lead-free petrol—would be greatly beneficial. I agree also that if we could reduce journey distances between home and work, we would make a great advance in reducing the amount of wasted energy and unnecessarily consumed energy. In planning terms, I hope that we can build our new settlements near to existing rail lines and road networks and will not need to extend roads or build roads for new settlements in greenfield sites.

[Mr. Hughes]

Like the hon. Member for Eltham, I am sympathetic to the idea of electric cars. We must remember that, although there is a benefit in the electric car, it still uses energy which must be provided by plugging in a recharging device. That is part of the use of renewable or non-renewable energy sources. It is not a simple equation: an electric car is not necessarily environmentally better than a car that runs on other types of fuel, although it has many attractions, not least that it does not pollute.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman is right. I suspect that we shall see greater improvements in the fuel efficiency of the initial primary generating plant and of energy transmission. As the hon. Gentleman rightly identified—I give him full credit for it—the key point is that, when those vehicles go through his constituency or through mine, they do not emit exhaust fumes. Carbon monoxide, lead, some of the nitrous oxides and the sulphur oxides, are the worst elements.

Electric cars will not have the boy-racer image. They will travel at a maximum speed of 30 mph in town. I hope that they will not tempt people to race off at the lights. Even with our present petrol engines, if we drive sanely we can use 20 per cent. less fuel and bring an instant benefit to our budgets.

Mr. Hughes: One of the consequences of the debate is that it is important for the consumer to know the balance between environmental interests and options. The hon. Gentleman referred to consumer education. Happily, according to opinion polls, young people say that environmental issues are their most important concern. It is important that people should be able to make proper choices and realise that they have to decide how they can best reduce emissions from vehicles and also make sure that they are consuming least energy. There is a balance, and it is to do with the size of cars, the size of engines and so on.

Mr. Arbuthnot: Will the hon. Gentleman give way?

Mr. Hughes: I shall give way once more, but I wish other hon. Members to be able to speak.

Mr. Arbuthnot: One of the most curious cars that I have seen in the Members' car park is an orange and black taxi that belches smoke like no other car that I have ever seen. Is it right that it belongs to the hon. Gentleman? If so, how does he put his money where his mouth is?

Mr. Hughes: I am glad that the hon. Gentleman has asked that question. I do own a black and orange taxi. It is a diesel taxi, which is preferable to a petrol vehicle. The only problem with diesel engines, as the hon. Gentleman may be aware, is that for the first minute after they start from cold they produce a lot of smoke. I was fearful that it might be more environmentally harmful than that.

The Mail on Sunday carried out an environmental t on my taxi, the car of the former Secretary of State for Environment, the right hon. Member for Bath (I Patten), and the car of the hon. Member for Dagenh (Mr. Gould), the Labour party shadow spokesman. hon. Gentleman can check with The Mail on Sunday if wants—it was about a month ago. My taxi environmentally far better than either the customised of the right hon. Member for Bath or the car of the h Member for Dagenham. I accept that there is a sm problem. The taxi is at the garage at the moment hav that problem dealt with, but environmentally otherwise it is far more efficient. I can always give the h Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthno free ride in it, which will stop him using his car.

If we are really to improve the environment of peo in their locality, particularly in urban areas, we n reduce the number of vehicle journeys, the numbe vehicle journeys with only one person in a vehicle, number of vehicle journeys that can be made by o means, and, therefore, the number of environme disadvantages to people from the number of people use cars when we should encourage them to use o forms of transport.

The problem is not just that people park so that t vehicles cause an eyesore, but that they park pavements, which has environmental implications bec people fall over and local authorities have to spend m on repairing pavements. Horrendous congestion s down people's movement, and commuters travellin work from east London and south-east London bec frustrated because there are daily traffic jams and jou times are unpredictable.

We must be tough. One of my concerns when the hon. Member for Hertsmere (Mr. Parkinson) was a Department of Transport was that the transport lobby still winning arguments against the environmental lo I hope that matters will improve under the new Secr of State. Unless we reduce the number of cars in u districts and the number of car journeys, and increas amount of public and other investment in public trans by fare payers and others, we will not change that bal

I am sure that the Minister knows that there are places in the world where public transport works so that people never need to use private cars. I live Strasbourg for a while and the buses always came they were meant to. I could go to work on p transport. I lived in Brussels for a while when the r had just been built. I could rely on it for getting to on time.

Mr. Tony Banks: What about Paris?

Mr. Hughes: I have never lived in Paris, and I never been to Singapore——

Mr. Banks: The hon. Gentleman will.

Mr. Hughes: I hope that I shall not live in Singa although it may be better now that Mr. Lee Kuan Y no longer the Prime Minister. I hope that the Depar of the Environment will tackle the Departme Transport and make it an environmentally Department because as yet it has not been one.

I offer a suggestion that I know has to be passed o must be tough and license urban districts and i additional costs on people from outside the district i want to use it. I see that the hon. Member for Eltham does not like my idea. He may have thought about it and rejected it. We must say, "We are sorry, but if you do not need to come in, you will have to pay to do so" in much the same way as the old Greater London council lorry ban operated.

We can take other steps. The Netherlands and other countries allow people to use bus lanes if their cars are full. We should consider such proposals. There are many ways to ensure that one minimises the number of vehicle journeys.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: The hon. Gentleman has raised a serious point that I should have touched on. The problem with the prosperity that we have had in the past 10 years is that many people can afford money but not time. Any suggestion such as road pricing, which means that all one has to do is have a fistful of fivers to buy one's space, will lead to more traffic, not less, on the roads. Local authority workers and Members of Parliament will have their fares paid, small businesses will want concessions and big businesses will be able to afford the costs. The House should realise the loopiness of believing that road pricing will work; congestion is far better because those of us whose time is valuable will switch to public transport because it gives us a better option, not because it is cheaper.

Mr. Tony Banks rose——

Mr. Hughes: The hon. Member for Newham, North-West is itching to intervene, but he can have his chance in his speech. If he will excuse me, I shall not give way to him, as I normally do.

This is an important debate because urban environment and urban life are afflicted more by traffic and related issues than by anything else. Those issues include safety, accidents, injuries, deaths, damage to buildings, collisions and pollution. I do not want to launch, in extenso, into a debate about the options—road pricing is not the be all and end all. We must have a package, one part of which is to start investing in public transport. People will not move from private to public transport until public transport is of a quality that allows them to use it effectively. London's public transport is sometimes a nightmare, and so people will not change to using it but will prefer to make their journey more quickly in a private vehicle.

We should adopt policies such as encouraging people to use bicycles and not cars. My Liberal Democrat colleagues control the London borough of Sutton which is recognised as having led the way in public transport. Its staff are given an incentive for using bicycles, just as company employees have traditionally been given tax incentives to use company cars. We must end the tax incentive on company cars completely, not just partially. I accept that we need a package of policies, but we must ensure that combating the growth in individual motorised transport, which is the product of an affluent society, is one of our chief political targets.

The hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) has an interest in the issue of empty property and empty land, which constitute an environmental blight in urban districts. Increasingly, the Government have the tools to deal with empty land. During the past 10 years the Government have taken steps to deal with derelict land——

Mr. Steen: They were not sufficient.

Mr. Hughes: I agree that they were not sufficient and there needs to be a change in the way land is taxed if we are to deal with the problem efficiently. It is no good merely having a register and the Government making orders.

The Environmental Protection Act 1990 allows people to complain about litter where the culpable party is from the private rather than public sector. Therefore, if someone has litter on his land and is not doing anything about it, we can take action—I am grateful for that. That should be the case with empty property. If a private property owner is holding on to property and doing nothing, the Government should be able to intervene or give local authorities the power to intervene.

Various methods could be used to help to solve the problem. I am not a believer in expropriating other people's property, but I believe in saying that if someone is not using it and it is an eyesore, subject to the freehold remaining with the owner, control of that property should be taken away if its owner is not carrying out his duty to society. Empty property which is lying waste in inner cities could often be used for housing people.

I hope that the new team at the Department of the Environment and the Government will be tough in tackling the problem of empty land and property in urban districts because it is a nuisance and the cause of many problems, including environmental blight.

I ask the Minister, in a gentle and encouraging way, to seek to persuade his colleagues and the new Secretary of State to accede to the following, often repeated and uniquely London request. London is the only part of Britain prohibited by law from having parish and community councils. I end my speech where the hon. Member for Romford began: one of the best ways for people to influence their local environment is by coming together in a recognised forum which has status to discuss truly local matters, such as how to clean up the parks, rivers and ponds or where to put street lights and seating. Why is it that in London there can be no proper forum for such discussions, whereas in every other part of the country—England, Wales, Scotland or Northern Ireland —people can have a local parish or community council to deal with such issues?

I hope that the new team at the Department of the Environment will seriously consider legislation. I was the last person to present relevant provisions to the House in the previous Session in the form of the London Local Government Bill, which was printed, and has been approved by the relevant parish and local authority organisations. It has been presented before by other colleagues and parties. I hope that the Government will seriously consider legislation because people are most effective in campaigning about the environment on their own doorstep where they know exactly how they are affected.

Today's debate is about the local environment. Global and local environments are interrelated, but most people feel that they can affect most the local environment. If we encourage them to do that, we shall at the same time encourage them to act to help to save the global environment. I hope that the Government will give a positive response to the request that we should give people such encouragement.

11.28 am

Mr. Anthony Steen (South Hams): I thank my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Mr. Neubert) for providing us with an opportunity to debate such a far-reaching and widely-couched motion. It is the sort of widespread, blanket environmental discussion that this House does not have often enough. It is a pity that some Opposition Members have spoken exclusively about road safety to the exclusion of the issues of the wider environment. The House debated road safety only a fortnight ago, and some of the matters raised by Opposition Members this morning could have been conveniently fitted into that debate. Indeed, their speeches would have been more appropriate to that debate than to this far wider debate about people and their local environment—which, as we would expect, my hon. Friend has couched in broad terms.

Unfortunately, but understandably, the majority of hon. Members in the Chamber today are from the London area. However, the motion goes far wider than London, so I hope that the House will forgive me for introducing a different aspect from an exclusively rural area 250 miles away in the west of the country. I wish also to call on my experience in my youth, many years ago, when I represented the inner city of Liverpool.

Mr. Peter Bottomley: My hon. Friend did it very well.

Mr. Steen: I am grateful for that encouragement.

Concern about the environment is moving further and further up the political agenda. it is becoming quite fashionable, and to talk about green issues is in vogue. People are aware of the problems caused by the hole in the ozone layer, and everyone is talking about global warming and the destruction of the rain forests. They are critical issues and people are right to be concerned about them. The Government are also right to be taking some action —although most of us would agree that it is not enough —to minimise pollution. However, what affects people most is not global issues but the local environment—the point made in my hon. Friend's motion.

People's own areas, their neighbourhoods, their villages and their towns are all important. All hon. Members know that when we knock on doors, whether in or out of election time, and talk about macro-economic issues, people become boss-eyed and say, "Come and look out the back, we have not had a litter collection for a fortnight." The understandable interests of people relate to their backyards and their immediate environment. Those hon. Members who can say to them, "We will get that litter cleared up", rather than talking about major world issues, can be assured of their votes.

The environment is all important, and people are concerned about any changes. All hon. Members receive hundreds of letters when any change is proposed in the immediate environment in which people live. Whether for better or for worse, most people perceive all changes to be for the worse. Bypasses or new housing estates are far more likely to provoke letters than is the hole in the ozone layer. During the past three months, my postbag has contained hundreds of letters about planning and environmental issues and about local life in the villages and towns of Devon, but only half a dozen about the tropical rain forests and the ozone layer. The local environment is immediate and critical to most people.

The environment must change if it is to su cannot be locked into a time warp. People's needs and the environment must change with them. It i say that if the environment is to change to meet c needs, we must ensure that we have correctly ant the needs of tomorrow. That is really the troubl months ago I spent a day at the Office of Po Censuses and Surveys, trying to get a grasp o forecasts demographic change. I came away unco that anyone really understood where the populatio go, why, and when. For example, in the 1970s th forecast the need for many hundreds of thous houses to be built in the south. Of course, such a becomes a self-fulfilling prophecy. Those houses h built in the south because the county structure pl account of the forecast that more people would in the south. Every time the OPCS forecasts that t be a growth of population in a particular area, a time the statisticians in the Department Environment say, "Yes, there will be that grow planners allow new building and the growth foll

In 1988, the Government said that 165,000 n would be needed by the turn of the centur south-east. They have now decided that de declining and that only 40,000 will be needed. think that the OPCS has any more idea than an of how many houses are needed and exactly wher expensive operation. I am sure that my hon. F Minister could tell us how many hundreds of sta are employed by the Department of the Enviro work out population forecasts. The counties statisticians working out where populations will get it wrong.

I understand that single flats and small h currently being built, on the basis that more old p living longer and there are more single people a mothers. That particular boom has passed, yet current policy. In fact, what is now ne three-bedroomed houses for the babies of boomers. That is the current demand. The sys slow to respond to current circumstances that bu still building single flats for the elderly and mothers. Not only are the figures wrong, but so of the units.

In 1992, people will be coming to this country Community and from eastern Europe, and, a l Britain will have some of the Hong Kong Ch cannot consider population trends in a time warp consider movements in world populations which the lives and the local environment of many peop not have either the numbers or the type of build There is conflicting evidence from acade statisticians about the demographic and social t Ermisch's report "Fewer babies, longer liv excellent analysis of the probable trend.

Having determined that there is great confus numbers and movements, we must recognise tha be changes and that we must deal with the p where to put people who want new homes. Minister at the Department of the Environment that there should be a free market and that peo be allowed to build wherever they wanted. He fo there would be 394,000 more houses in the sout that if he could possibly allow it, the number doubled. He suggested that if buildings coul wherever people wanted, it would reduce inf cause the economy to boom because there would be no housing shortage. That would tackle high mortgage repayments, which are the largest single vehicle for inflation. He said that if everybody could buy a house at half the present price, Britain's economy would boom, and that the reason why it was not booming was the housing shortage.

Mr. Simon Hughes: One can change the system of house financing to overcome both inflation and shortage by altering mortgage tax relief, without removing all planning controls. The Minister to whom the hon. Gentleman refers can have had no concern for the environment if he suggested that people should be allowed to choose where they build without control. That would impose the biggest blight of all on the environment.

Mr. Steen: That is why I do not agree with the Minister who made that suggestion. Such a policy would have a profound effect not only on environment but on this country's inflationary tendencies and interest rates. I do not go along that line, but it is worth mentioning.

Local plans provide the only opportunity for residents and interested parties to draw up a blueprint for future development that will protect the immediate countryside and locality. I am most encouraged by the view expressed by Ministers over the past few years that if effective and up-to-date local plans exist, the Government will honour them and safeguard the right of local people to enforce them. The introduction of local plans and the provision of new housing within them is an important step in the right direction.

Cheap, affordable housing can be built outside the area covered by local plans. Even though the parish, district and county may approve a local plan that regulates development in any particular area, a loophole exists in that low-cost, affordable housing—which we all welcome in rural areas—can be developed outside that plan. Green field sites outside villages and towns will be the subject of planning permission for low-cost, affordable properties of the sort that have become so rare because new council housing has not been built to replace that which has been sold. Villages will be extended, just as they were in the 1950s and 1960s by public housing estates. In my constituency, council housing can be found just outside the villages. In future, villages will be kept sacrosanct, as they should be, by the local plan, with council housing estates located just outside them. Many of those properties will have been sold off or be occupied by a declining number of local people. A new estate will then be built of private housing, in the same way as public housing estates were built in the 1950s and 1960s, for younger people and those who cannot afford to buy property in the villages themselves because second-time buyers and holiday lets have forced up prices. Scarcity, resulting in an inflationary spiral, means that younger people just cannot afford those prices.

Low-cost starter developments should be encouraged, but cheap and affordable housing does not have to be badly designed and constructed from poor quality materials. It is not so much development to which people object, but its design and appearance. Bad design is to be found in estates all over the south and south-west, and that fuels anxiety about the environment. In highlighting that aspect, my hon. Friend the Member for Romford should perhaps also reach a conclusion. The only conclusion that can be reached is that development is not a bad th Villages cannot remain in a time warp or stand still. where there is to be development, it must be of quality.

The Government have been wrong to resist testin quality of new buildings. In the ca[illegible] of a collectio buildings, a panel of designers and architects shoul established at each local authority planning leve examine the design of a development and the quality o materials that will be used, and to offer prac comments, so that the final appearance is much sympathetically related to the environment.

In addition to all the problems that I have alr mentioned, there has been a failure to deal properly the infrastructure, despite the increasing population i south of England. One should not provide new h without ensuring that there are sufficient public fun finance a complementary infrastructure. The popul of South Hams has grown by 20 per cent. over the pa years, but there has been no increase in the funds avai for police cover, school places, hospital beds, supplies, or sewage disposal. That influx of people ove past decade has not been accompanied by a grow public investment. The National Rivers Authority rightly recommended an embargo on all new develop in Dartmouth and Kingsweir. The NRA is beginnin use its teeth, and is saying, "Until you put the sewera order, you cannot go on building more housing."

Private companies have been allowed to dev without the support of a corresponding public infras ture. I welcome the NRA's intervention. The neces infrastructure does not mean just adequate sewe provision but recreational facilities, extra police c better schools and sufficient doctors. Although plan authorities have tried to grant permission on the basis the planning gain to the developer will be returned t community, getting the private developer to cover aspect will knock up the price of his houses. Propert young people will then be more expensive than it sh be, which will in turn add to inflation, as buyers higher incomes to pay for their houses.

One or two of my hon. Friends mentioned derelict I have been speaking about that subject in the Hous the past 12 years, and I apologise for repeating my However, it is clearly right that we should find ou amount of vacant public land that exists in our towns cities and is surplus to requirements. The right Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) spoke a surplus land in his constituency, and it is true that areas of underutilised, derelict, vacant land are avai which should be used first for building before we sta eat into the green fields outside our towns.

It is paradoxical that it was my right hon. Friend Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine), the new Secreta State for the Environment, who, as a Minister, set u public land registers in 1981. The registers were set u identify all land in public ownership in this country w was surplus to requirements. In 1982, I believe th amounted to about 120,000 acres. To the credit of Government, about 60,000 acres has already been However, our planning process creates public va dormant, derelict, under-utilised land. So, however m land is sold, more is coming on to the register.

Furthermore, the land register is selective. As a re much land which should be on the register is excl because it is the wrong shape or size, or because the p authority has plans for the land. When a public utility is privatised, its land is taken off the public register because it is private.

[Mr. Steen]

Despite all the sales, and everything that has been done to reduce the amount of vacant land, about 90,000 acres of public land has still not been utilised. Academics generally consider that that figure would be 200,000 acres if the limitations and conditions which prevent certain land from being included were lifted.

I suspect that one of the issues that the Minister will wish to deal with in his wind-up speech is whether he will find a way—perhaps in the new planning Bill—to lift the conditions which exclude many acres of public vacant land, so that people will know how many hundreds of thousands of acres of vacant, dormant land are surplus to requirements. The Secretary of State for the Environment must take powers to do something about that.

Since 1978, I have been asking successive Secretaries of State to do something to release public vacant dormant, derelict, or under-utilised land. Every Secretary of State does a little more, but none has been adventurous enough to ensure that that land is used before the green field sites around our towns and cities are spoilt. Will the Minister offer us something a little more practical today than his predecessors have done? They have cried crocodile tears and said that it was dreadful that we had all this waste land and we must do something about it, but no one has done much.

I direct the Minister's attention to a splendid publication entitled "Public Land Utilisation Management Schemes", which I had the privilege of writing some 18 months ago. It illustrated the scale of the problem, and invited the Government to adopt a sensible solution. It is a disgrace that more public waste land has not been developed. It would vastly improve our urban areas if it was. Not only does it mean that rural land outside our cities is being used, when derelict land within them could be used first, but vacant land has a dramatic effect upon surrounding property values. It also affects the neighbourhood, as the tax base on the land is reduced. Local shops do not have the custom that they would have if the land were developed. One would have thought that there would be an incentive to public authorities to use the land, as they would then have a greater rate base, whether it were used for industry or, if it was developed for residential use, from the community charge.

I have mentioned these matters before in the House, and I do not apologise for mentioning them again in such a wide-ranging debate. Their importance cannot be over-emphasised. Unless we get forecasts, planning and design right, we shall damage the character of the local environment and diminish the quality of people's lives.

11.53 am

Mr. Tony Banks (Newham, North-West): I, too, congratulate the hon. Member for Romford (Mr. Neubert) for his widely termed notion, and I apologise to the hon. Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) for bringing the debate back to the area I am most concerned about and familiar with—the capital. The motion states:

"while welcoming the general improvement in people's living standards and the increasing freedom which they enjoy in their everyday lives".

It would be wrong to suggest that there have some benefits for some people in eleven and a hal Conservative Government, but all things are When one considers my borough of Newham, i end of London, or indeed, when one considers L a whole, one realises that everything is relative a large number of people have suffered badly as a eleven and a half years of Thatcherite policies.

The front page of yesterday's edition of Mirror carried a picture of the ex-Prime Ministe the back of a car, looking tearful as she left street. A similiar picture appeared in the Daily not think that those pictures should have been The way newspapers intrude into private unacceptable and vulgar. I did not like that pi drew no satisfaction from it. On a human level, felt compassion for the Prime Minister becaus understand how she felt—but on a political leve compassion for her. Having been ousted premiership by her own party, she was weeping a but at my weekly Friday night advice surgery in tonight people will be weeping buckets of tears. exaggeration—it happens every week. I take a tissues with me to hand out to constituents wh tearful when trying to describe their prob housing, social security, visas, and how to su breakfast to dinner—assuming that they are a those meals. They describe circumstances w largely been brought about by central G policies.

When I see the ex-Prime Minister weeping tear on the front page of the Daily Mirror and t constituents crying buckets, I have no c whatever for her at a political level.

Yesterday we heard the new Prime Minis about looking at policies afresh, at his Minister's Question Time, saying that he was hi He said that he did not intend to beat his chest a those policies that he was intent on changing, b it clear that he intended to change a number of night, in a speech in Manchester, I believe, he talk about a more caring society—an admissio is something to rectify in our present society absolutely right to say that there is much to b that policies will have to be changed. He w answer to the House and to the electorate, an why he supported those policies as a loyal Minister for all those years when he now says t to be changed. We need to know that. Enorm has been done to my constituency, to my borc London by eleven and a half years of the uncaring, selfish Thatcherite policies that the Minister supported so loyally in the past.

I remember Councillor John Major o borough council. He was a good chair of certainly a good one for a Tory but he was s kind of money that borough councils can about these days. I believe that he presided ov investment budget of £100 million. Things ha dramatically since then.

Now that we have Prime Minister Majo know whether Chancellor Major is complete buried, or whether there will be some renais progressive figure whom Lambeth witnessed b and 1971. I should be the first to welcome the

I doubt whether the changes in policy will be so drastic —as one of my hon. Friends said, they may have changed the singer, but the song remains the same.

In those eleven and a half years, my borough has suffered greatly. We are the second most deprived local authority area in England. Unemployment has gone up dramatically. In 1979, we had 6 per cent. unemployment, and by the mid-1980s, it was up to 18 per cent. Thank goodness, it has come down to only 10 per cent., but that is still considerably higher than it was in 1979, and once again it is on the increase. In 1986, the average earnings of Newham male workers were 15 per cent. below the London average, and by 1988, the most recent figure that I have, they were 19 per cent. below. In 1986, women in Newham received average London earnings, but by 1988, these had fallen 7 per cent. below. One can see the same in London as a whole. In 1979, unemployment in Greater London was 3·4 per cent. In September 1990, it was 6·3 per cent. Not once since 1979, all those years of the Tory economic miracle, did unemployment fall below 3·4 per cent., the level inherited by the former Prime Minister in 1979.

As can be imagined, there is much poverty in my borough. In 1989, 35 per cent. of households were dependent on income support. In 1985-86, the DHSS single payment grant for the borough was £2·5 million. That was money for grants for specific vital items of household equipment. There was a change in the regulations in 1988 and the money that was made available to the social fund budget was limited to £1·8 million. We knew that there would be an increase in demand, but the amount of money that could be called on was dramatically reduced.

Newham health authority estimates that it lost £2·5 million between 1982 and 1987. Between 1979 and 1989, the number of hospital beds fell by one third. When one considers the indices which matter to ordinary people, the terms of today's motion fall flat. When I hear about the economic miracle, and all this social advance, I accept that in certain areas and among certain categories of the population, benefits have been derived from eleven and a half years of Thatcherite policies, but it has mostly been by those who can afford the best. The poorest have got poorer in comparison with the rich, as the statistics show clearly.

This gap is shown most markedly in housing and the homeless, in London as a whole and Newham in particular. Some 70 per cent. of all the cases with which I have to deal in my advice surgery—it will be the same tonight—involve housing problems. I suspect that it is the same for virtually every other London Member of Parliament and probably for a large number representing constituencies outside London. People come to my surgery desperately wanting somewhere to live, but there is nothing that one can say. All I can provide is a shoulder to cry on, with my infinite supply of tissues. Unfortunately, I cannot offer them what they really want —the early prospect of somewhere decent to live.

One does not have to have a PhD in housing administration to find the causes of the problem. They are the massive reduction in housing investment programme money, which is down 80 per cent. in real terms since 1979, the attacks on local authorities and the restrictions placed on them in their attempts to deal with housing problems. Make no mistake about it—local authorities still have responsibility for housing. When mortgages go up because of high interest rates and the building societies repossess homes, people turn to the local authority, which c put them in bed and breakfast. That is crazy. On have thought that it would not be beyond the Ministers to devise a scheme whereby local authori building societies could get together and work ou is cheaper for a local authority to pay the building to keep people in their homes rather than put ther and breakfast accommodation. Furthermore, it co to put people in bed and breakfast accommodation build new units of accommodation. Those economics of the madhouse, particularly in Londo the pressure is greatest.

My case is proved by the number of council starts in my constituency in the eleven and a ha since the right hon. Member for Finchley (Mrs. T became Prime Minister. In 1978-79, Newham start new units of accommodation. In 1979-80, it was 4 figures go down, but I shall not go through all of will take just the last few years. In 1987-88, there starts; in 1988-89, there were 105; in 1989-90, the 191, and in 1990-91 the number of starts is estimat a big fat zero—Newham will build no new accommodation.

On the other hand, applications from homeless more than doubled from 1,059 in 1981 to 2,347 in The real scandal, and what really annoys me—I ha the point before and I shall continue to make it bec situation is so outrageous—is that the cost of p temporary housing in Newham has increase £52,000 in 1983-84 to £5·5 million in 1987-88. crazy, given how many units of accommodation c built for that amount of money if the Governmen only sanction such expenditure. The figure for breakfast and temporary housing this year wil million.

In common with other London councils, part Labour councils, Newham has been able to decre cost by using leased accommodation, which mak because there are more vacant properties about Newham and in London as a whole because cannot sell units or building societies have rep them. Four out of five vacant properties in Londo the private sector, not the public sector.

As the sane individual I know you to be, Mr. Speaker, you would think that it would make sens local authority to lease from those who cannot sell who want to rent so as to accommodate the homele the Government want to stop that, and I want the to explain why. Such a scheme would sure everyone, but in the Cabinet there is an ide hangup, which I assume still exists, about lettin authorities be involved in housing. The Governme local authorities to provide basic accommodation as the final safety net, but no more than th Government's ideological fixation about the role authorities stands in the way of dealing with on most critical problems of London and of my bor that of housing.

The problem in London as a whole is similar to Newham. In 1979, there were few people begging streets of London or sleeping in cardboard b challenge Conservative Members to rebut that. there were 1,200 families in bed and breakfast in L and 14,000 had been accepted as homeless. In 199 eleven and a half years of economic miracle, progress and Thatcherite policies, there are 3,000 sleeping on the streets of London and 8,000 families, comprising some 30,000 people, in bed and breakfast accommodation. There are 32,000 families homeless, and young people denied social security are forced to sleep in shop doorways on the Strand or the subways under Waterloo bridge—what a testament to eleven and a half years of Thatcherite policies. I therefore do not feel sorry for the Prime Minister, weeping a little tear as she moved from No. 10 Downing street to a mock-Georgian mansion in Southwark. When I think of the tragedy that she has inflicted on so many families in my constituency and in London as a whole, I have no compassion for her whatever.

[Mr. Tony Banks]

In 1978, London councils built no fewer than 13,000 council houses for rent. In 1989, the figure for London as a whole was just over 1,000. My borough was building more than 1,000 council houses per year when the right hon. Member for Finchley was first elected Prime Minister of this country. When will the Government wake up to this enormous crisis, realise how much misery has been inflicted on so many Londoners and start to do something about it instead of talking about the mythical miracles that we are supposed to have experienced in the past eleven and a half years?

In 1979 it was possible for people to afford to buy their own homes. Now, however, we have astronomical interest rates—higher than in any other European country. Our inflation rate and balance of payments deficit are also higher than in any other European country—some miracle! In 1979, young people could afford to buy their own homes, but the average price of a home in London in 1990 is £85,000, so it is impossible for large numbers of people—indeed, for all those to whom I have referred, the genuinely homeless—to afford to buy their own homes.

Local authorities provide the basic services that people need in their day-to-day lives. When I walk about the streets of Forest Gate, people regularly ask me what I am going to do about litter on the streets, the broken paving stones, the abandoned or illegally parked cars, and about housing—I have never yet been asked what I am going to do about the Gulf. That is not to suggest that the people of Newham are not interested in what is happening in the Gulf—when we have solved their day-to-day problems, we can get down to talking about the situation in the Gulf, but ordinary people will not spend a great deal of time thinking about world events if their streets are not clean, they have nowhere to live and there are no buses or trains to get them to work in the morning. Local authorities deal with many, if not all, people's basic requirements. That is why the local authority role in London, as elsewhere, is so crucial to the lives of our people. Local democracy underpins parliamentary democracy. In those circumstances, one would have thought that there would be a genuine partnership between central Government and local government in dealing with these problems.

I am not a natural consensual Member of Parliament. As a socialist, I bitterly oppose capitalism. The hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) paid me a tribute when he said that I and my hon. Friends the Members for Newham, North-East (Mr. Leighton) and for Newham, South (Mr. Spearing) fight hard for the economic advancement of our borough. We regularly invite Ministers to Newham. I have no hang-ups about talking to Tory Ministers—if I could win benefits fo would sit down and sup with the devil, and h certain Ministers to Newham, I feel that I h that. I do not understand why I cannot get t to the Government—if boroughs do not sa like you because you're a Tory Governme Labour local authorities", why are the Go prepared to walk half-way to meet us? Wh partnership between central Governmen authorities gone? Local authorities used to get on with the job they were elected to d basic services. Why do the Governme confront, attack and denigrate local author they slander local councillors and use pejora referring to "spendrift Labour councils," in when they know in their heart of hearts tha authorities are struggling as hard as they p deal with enormous social and economic p

I accept that some authorities are not so e ought to be, and that some of them spend could be better spent on other projects, reason for the Government's wholesale as authorities since 1979. I hope that Councill will re-emerge at some stage and remember as a local authority member, and that that change many of the policies pursued by h who had no contact with local authorities— fact that her father was an alderman—an love, affection or concern for local author

The amount of money being taken awa local authorities amounts to billions of p hardly surprising that they have run into rates increases. Money has been taken av regularly by central Government, but authorities are provided with the resource their problems there will be no respite for t area, or for the people of London as a wh

The hon. Members for Southwark ar (Mr. Hughes) and for Eltham referred to t London's transport could be improved, needs to be improved. We have one overcrowded, overpriced and inefficient tra in the whole of Europe. It may even be the system in the EEC. If London's tran improved, additional resources must be There must also be a strategic plan for tr very well to say that London boroughs providing cycle lanes, but it is pretty silly lane or a bus lane which goes only as far boundary and then disappears. There mu plan, and London needs a strategic autho planning, transport and other services provided only on a regional basis. Londo Birmingham or Manchester, nor is it a sm region, and if a region is to be properly p a strategic regional authority.

Another legacy of eleven and a Thatcherism in London is an empty coun monument to the right hon. Member fo Government wanted to turn it into a lu surprise, surprise—the deal fell through that? It was because high interest rat pressures on the property market and s wanted to be involved in mega-million d fell through, and I am glad that it did. I those in the consortium a great deal finan that they have learnt their lesson. The Government are now thrashing around trying to find another use for the building. I suggest that if there are to be any policy changes, one of them should be directed towards county hall and the need to restore a strategic authority for London.

The Minister should make it clear that the Government will do nothing with that empty county hall until we have had an election and the people of London, and of the country, have had an opportunity to say whether they want to proceed with Toryism—Thatcherism with a new face and a big pair of glasses—or whether they want socialism.

When the Labour Government are elected, we shall reintroduce a new strategic authority for London. It will be called the London council, and it will be responsible for transport, for planning, for the emergency services and for sewage and waste disposal, because we can achieve the efficiencies and economies of scale by planning those services regionally. That is the sensible way to plan for our capital city—the only capital city which does not have city-wide local government. It is done everywhere else, and it ought to be done here. In their hearts, Conservative Members know that we need a strategic authority for London. If, under the new premiership, they have not the courage to throw in the face of the right hon. Member for Finchley the absurdity of her views and her attacks on the GLC, the next Labour Government most certainly will. That is what Londoners want—and when they have a Labour Government, that is exactly what they will get.

12.20 pm

Mr. Gerald Bowden (Dulwich): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Mr. Neubert) on his good fortune in the ballot and compliment him on his choice of subject.

During the debate, and particularly during the flights of fantasy of the hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks), I pondered our dependence on the word "environment". As Conservative Members must say now, I have modest origins, but it was not an unlettered household. I never heard the word "environment" used during my childhood. It was about 1965, when I was at university, before I heard it used. I wondered how we dealt with the concept that it embraces without the benefit of the word in currency. I suspect that we used the word "community" or "society", which had an elitist ring about it, and that we felt that there was some local connection which "environment", in its broader sense, now embraces.

I became conscious of the importance of "community" —the local connection—shortly after becoming an hon. Member and following the welcome abolition of the GLC and the devolving of its powers and responsibilities to the boroughs. Some boroughs dealt with them well, and some less than satisfactorily.

One task that the GLC did well was leisure and recreation, particularly the management of the parks under its control. Dulwich park was one of the GLC's particular prides. When it was handed over to Southwark, one of the first decisions that Southwark took was to close the park on Christmas day. I then became aware of the strength of public feeling on such issues. I cannot recall an event or decision that increased my postbag to the extent that that small decision did. Many local residents, and indeed those from further afield, placed reliance on the opportunity to walk in the park on Christmas da family and I had many times. It gave the opport kids to try out their new tricycles, hoops or toys parents to get them out of the house on Christ

That decision was made by Southwark counc am glad to say that it will not make it again. Mu Christmas day that year was spent at the locked Dulwich park explaining why it was happening who were unaware of the change. For that r became conscious that local recreational needs represented by the local authority which control

Mr. Jeremy Corbyn (Islington, North): I thank Gentleman for giving way, especially as I have arrived. London Transport delayed me—but not hours. He is making the same point as my hon. Fr Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) that poor, hard-pressed inner city areas need a strategy to provide recreational facilities. On that should have thought that the hon. Gentlema support the reintroduction of a strategic auth provide resources for poorer areas.

Mr. Bowden: The hon. Gentleman is rather jum gun. I am coming round to the opposite point of v he has given me the opportunity to make it more Local authorities can be efficient or inefficient. E park was a GLC park, but it is much better Wandsworth council than it ever was by the GL

Mr. Corbyn: Come on.

Mr. Bowden: You go and look at it, my old frie your pardon, Mr. Deputy Speaker. A comparison the way in which Battersea park is run and the which Dulwich park is managed by Southwark shows where responsibility is well recognised and d and where it is ill-recognised and badly delivered

It is not only local authorities, the boroughs, failing to recognise and meet the needs of th community and protect the local environment, other agencies which may be less accountable tha of the London boroughs. If I were not participatin debate, I would be at Sydenham hill woods, woodland is being managed by the London Wildli with a view to providing recreational facilities fo who wish to enjoy the wilderness aspect of woodla has been there since the ice age. It is par responsibility of Southwark, and partly of the governors of Alleyn's College of God's Gift, who a readily recognised as the estates governors of I college. Like Southwark, they have an interest in la adjoins that ancient woodland. An enduring camp which I have been involved has tried to resist p develop land bordering on that ancient wo Southwark sought to develop council housing there perhaps was a commendable ideal. I could not that, with such a narrow majority as I have, ther have been a political motive in developing a counc there, in the often mistaken belief that council automatically vote Labour.

Currently before the planning authorities is a proposed by the estate governors of Dulwich co develop the site adjoining the ancient woodlan scheme, quite rightly, has met tremendous opp from the local community, the local councillors a My opposition is especially appropriate as I h opportunity to draw to the House's attention that affront to the local environment. If one develops that adjoining land the topography will be changed. The water courses and rainfall tables will be altered so that the balance of nature is disturbed. That issue is part of the local environment, an environment about which we must be vigilant to ensure that it conserved.

[Mr. Bowden]

The planned Channel tunnel rail link also has wider implications for the local environment. If we are part of Europe and have a fixed link with it via the tunnel, it is logical and sensible to develop a rail link from that tunnel to serve all of the United Kingdom. It is important that we do not merely have a prestige fast route to London to a prestige London terminal at King's Cross. It is a desirable ideal to have a fast, fixed link to serve the United Kingdom, able to convey freight and passengers. That link would also have environmental benefits as freight which is currently carried by lorries on the road and crosses the Channel by ferry causes damage. It is also sensible for those who get on a train at Edinburgh or Glasgow to be able to travel straight to Paris or Brussels without changing at King's Cross. Those who want to travel to the continent from the west country, Cardiff or Swansea should be able to travel direct without having to change at Paddington for King's Cross—crossing London by whatever means they can find.

We have had some limited success in opposing the half-baked, cack-handed plans of British Rail for its original link to terminate at King's Cross. However, reconsideration of those plans has brought attendant damage to the area that was to be originally affected—Warwick gardens in my constituency. When the plans were first proposed they caused great turmoil and anger. Those original plans have now been shelved and will be reconsidered, but, as a result, a blight of searing depth has settled on the community. It is difficult to see how those dispirited feelings can be revived without providing a positive alternative to the original plans.

Mr. Arbuthnot: To what extent is that blight the result of the old compensation law which means that people whose houses are compulsorily purchased receive only the market value for them—a pretty poor market value? The proposed Planning and Compensation Bill will, I hope, offer a 25 per cent. increase over and above the market value of houses to be so purchased. Does my hon. Friend agree that that should deal with the problem to some extent?

Mr. Bowden: The key phrase in my hon. Friend's intervention is "to some extent". I know that the Planning and Compensation Bill had its Second Reading in another place earlier this week. I applaud its provisions because I have always believed that we have been foolishly small-minded about the compensation rules that apply.

If one's land or home is compulsorily acquired one is not only involved in the anguish and agony of having to move, but in a tussle with professionals arguing about what the market value of one's property might be. That has engendered resentment and delay. It would be much better if, as suggested, there was a 25 per cent. premium on the market value. People would then feel that they were receiving a windfall and would greet such a purchase with enthusiasm. I also suspect that the whole process would be cheaper in the long run because the expensive lawyers, the planning silks, and valuers would no longer argue the case while charging great fees. The only people who make a profit out of such activities are those professionals, but their services would no longer be required to such an extent. The process would be speedier, there would be more satisfied customers and the interests of the public at large would be better served.

However, although new legislation will help some of my constituents in the Warwick gardens area, it will have no effect on the planning blight. The areas in which there is no requirement for British Rail to acquire the homes or the land are most affected by the blight. The homes, quality of life and way of life of those who live there have been damaged by the proximity of the operations.

Under its statutory requirement, British Rail has purchased properties that people wish to sell. Those properties fall within a corridor in which the route and the operations work may go. However, the people who live around that area have no right to have their properties acquired. Whether it acquires adjoining properties is at the discretion of British Rail and it can acquire properties in cases of hardship, if it wishes.

I am dealing with about 12 cases of hardship at present. I am negotiating with British Rail and I hope that we shall come to a satisfactory solution. These cases involve people who have agreed to sell because they are moving away, perhaps because they have a new job. I have two cases in which couples have decided to part on amicable terms and a divorce is pending or has taken place. The couples have decided to sell one property and each partner will buy another property elsewhere, but the sales have been thwarted by the blight on the area. There is a tragi-comic situation of a divorced couple who are obliged to live together in the same house. That could be the substance of a Whitehall farce, but for those involved, it is a tragedy. Such issues arise as a result of an authority—in this case British Rail—not looking at matters with a great interest in the community and in the human environment, but applying the dead letter of the law to a problem that should be dealt with in a human, sympathetic way.

It is especially sad that Warwick gardens has been affected by planning blight. It was first developed about 150 to 180 years ago and it contains a number of fine Georgian and Regency properties. The area went into decline and then became an area of London in which young people with little money, but with a lot of energy, could make their first family homes. They worked with loving care on their own homes and co-operated with their neighbours. Over the past 15 years, Warwick gardens has grown as a community of great maturity. There are young and old residents, there are original residents and those who have moved in from outside. Those involved in the early stages of the professions gave their talents, time and energy to creating and promoting a local community.

At a stroke, with the threat of the Channel tunnel rail link sub-surface junction at Warwick gardens, the neighbourhood has declined. Properties purchased by British Rail have been left vacant and are now occupied by squatters. Properties that had been lovingly maintained are now becoming derelict. If we are not careful, the area may sink back into its old dereliction within 15 years.

Local authorities, statutory authorities such as British Rail and bodies such as the estates governors of Dulwich college must play their part and bear their responsibilities in ensuring that their work is for the benefit of the local community.

It is particularly apposite that, in one of his first speeches, our new Prime Minister referred to "a country that is at ease with itself".

Perhaps I may borrow that phrase and adapt it slightly. We want communities that are at ease with themselves. In introducing the debate, my hon. Friend the Member for Romford has set the tone and made a keynote speech for the years ahead, in which, under our new Prime Minister, we shall try to ensure that our local environment is such that communities can live at ease with themselves.

12.39 pm

Mr. Martyn Jones (Clwyd, South-West): I thank the hon. Member for Romford (Mr. Neubert) for choosing this subject for debate. I was unlucky enough to come second in the ballot for private Members' motions, which is the worst position in which to be because one is obliged to sit here all morning listening to hon. Members talking about the first motion on the Order Paper in the knowledge that one's own motion will never be reached. Thanks to the fact that the hon. Member for Romford has kept the wording of the motion so wide, however, I shall perhaps be forgiven for concentrating on the local environment of the people of rural Wales.

The hon. Member for Romford contrasted the free market system engendered by the Tory Government with what he described as the socialist country of Russia and the starvation that it faces. I dispute his description. The USSR may describe itself as socialist but it is in fact an example of state capitalism. Self-praise is no recommendation, as has been illustrated by the Government's description of themselves as caring. I would also remind the hon. Gentleman that two thirds of the world's population are starving, predominantly under the capitalist system.

The motion is important none the less and, as the hon. Gentleman acknowledged at the outset, it is not essentially a party-political motion. But hon. Members should recognise that we have been discussing state intervention or intervention by society as a whole in the actions of some of its members, whether it be in planning, in the disposal of waste and litter or in the removal of graffiti, and that that approach conflicts markedly with the Government's stance.

The hon. Gentleman concentrated on urban areas. I venture to suggest that there are much greater threats to the quality of life than litter and graffiti. They include acid rain, global warming, the depletion of the ozone layer, the generation of huge amounts of waste that are simply dumped in the sea or in holes in the ground, heavy metals and nuclear waste. All those factors affect people's immediate local environment—in the long term, in a potentially lethal way. In some places, they have already proved lethal. We have witnessed the dumping of PCBs in the Love canal in the United States, on top of which houses were then built, for heaven's sake. Admittedly, that is an extreme example, but such things will happen more often unless we take action against those who pollute our environment. Other well-known examples are the accident at Bhopal and the toxic algal blooms in the North sea.

As we are unlikely to reach my motion——

Dr. Dafydd Elis Thomas (Meirionnydd Nant Conwy): Shame.

Mr. Jones: It is a shame because, although we have had two short debates on rural Wales recently, we have yet to address the essential problems of farming in Wales.

Dr. Thomas: May I, too, record my regret that we have not reached the hon. Gentleman's excellent motion, which I would have supportedly strongly. I am sure that, while staying within the rules of order, the hon. Gentleman will be able to say something about the agricultural environment in Wales.

Mr. Jones: I thank the hon. Gentleman for his intervention. I certainly hope to make one or two points about that without straying too far from the motion.

I call attention to the problems of rural Wales and to its quality of life, which were hardly touched on by the hon. Member for Romford. That is not surprising, because he represents an urban area and he is probably unaware of the problems of the rural environment. However, I believe that they are equally important, not only for the people who live in rural areas in England and Wales, but for people who live in cities and wish to enjoy that rural environment.

There will be a catastrophic impact on the local environment of Welsh people if farming in Wales is allowed to decline. Farming throughout Britain is under pressure from two directions. First, intensification and modernisation threaten the industry's sustainability. They also harm the natural environment, the social structure in rural areas and public health. Secondly, current methods of farm support—and even this free market Government seem to turn a blind eye to state intervention in agriculture —are discredited by farmers, consumers and taxpayers.

Farmers can continue to maintain the countryside in Wales, an environment which most people want to continue as it is, only if there is support for farmers, not for prices. Price support does not help the consumers of produce or of the environment in rural areas.

Farmers cannot continue to protect the visual and amenity value of the rural environment if prices continue to decline. At last month's draft ewe sale at Machynlleth prices were abysmally low. The average ewe was fetching £15, whereas it fetched £27 last year and £35 the year before. If prices decline and price support is also forced down by the need to reach agreement in the GATT Uruguay round, farming has little future in the hills of Wales.

The price decline of produce, coupled with higher prices for machinery and inputs, huge interest rate rises, the poll tax, reduced services in rural areas—and bus services have been decimated in rural areas since deregulation—have all had an effect. Water connection prices have quintupled since the privatisation of water and telephone connection charges have increased. Post offices are closing and small shops are becoming non-viable. The rural environment in Wales and elsewhere is under serious threat.

If farmers are driven off the land, which, as I have said, is already happening, whole parishes will become wastelands. Faced with that depressing scenario, the Government must consider whether the time is right for an alternative policy for agriculture.

I realise that that is extremely difficult for a monetarist free-market Government, forced into state intervention by the common agricultural policy of the European

[Mr. Jones]

Community and by the votes of farmers in rural areas—at least, by the votes that they used to receive from farmers in rural areas—but the Government cannot ignore the problem because it will not go away no matter how much the Government would like it to do so.

People want to enjoy the rural environment. They do not want it to revert to a derelict industrial site. However, what can the Government do? The Labour party believes that there is only one alternative which may be very distasteful to free marketeers. There should be output control, or supply management, which can take various forms, some of which will be more appropriate to certain commodities than to others. Those forms include extensification—or taking a proportion of output out of production—and set aside, which has already been tried in a small way, which involves taking a proportion of land out of production. The latter could have some environmental disadvantages because it alters the visual environment of the countryside detrimentally. The forms of control also include quotas, which are especially effective for commodities when there are only a few purchasers, and nitrogen quotas, which would restrict nitrogen applications. That would reduce yields and pollution, both of which would be beneficial.

Other policies could be pursued to great effect. For example, green premia would encourage low input systems and the positive management of countryside features by farmers. I suppose, in effect, that that is an extension of the environmentally sensitive areas. It would be much more used and much more effective.

Farming is an essential element in the maintenance and creation of environmental value. Integrated policies with agricultural and environmental objectives can encourage farming practices that lead to diverse and high-quality landscapes and maintain ecological systems. Such practices would pay more heed to traditional husbandry methods and less to production intensity. At present, farmers' only alternative to the economic mess that they are in is to increase production or to go out of business, both of which would have a devastating effect on the local environment. A less production-oriented view of agriculture could also recognise the role of small and part-time farmers in rural areas and rural affairs.

The current focus on the agricultural aspects of farming means a policy bias towards the larger farm, despite the clear part that smaller units can play in the maintenance of environmental quality, especially in Wales.

There is a danger that if the role of farming is not shifted in that way towards environmental and agricultural requirements, the decline in the environmental quality of rural areas will accelerate. The need for enhanced agricultural production is declining, and, if agricultural policy remains the guiding principle behind support for rural areas, the justification for public support of rural areas will also decline.

The central importance of the European dimension in rural policy making is inescapable. Farming in each member state will be driven in directions that are determined at EC level, and it is primarily to that level that environmental interests must address themselves. The incorporation of environmental considerations involves a more regional approach to agricultural policy than has hitherto been the case. That should bring economic a political advantages to communities that are by-passed the mainstream of development.

It is necessary to ensure that EC legislation is framed ways that are sufficiently sensitive to be amenable to loc implementation, and to monitor that implementation in adherence to the spirit of EC intentions. I hope th national or regional specialisation of agricultural poli will become easier when the single market is a reality a the credibility of the EC rests less on the continui operation of the common agricultural policy as the or truly common policy.

Individual countries attempting to set high enviro mental standards may face the suspicion that they attempting to restrict free trade and may even encoun threats of legal action. As the single market conce approaches reality, it is vital that the Europe Commission should continue to take the lead environmental matters if the concept of Europe integration is not to be brought into disrepute and clash with national policies are to be prevented. Comm environmental policies must be seen not as an impedim to European integration but as an essential part of it.

An environmental approach stresses the holistic nat of environmental benefits, a characteristic that reflects wide variety of elements that form the environment a the fact that much environmental activity is essentia co-operative, requiring the co-ordination of individ farmers' decisions. It implies a programme for the wh countryside rather than for discrete areas in particu need of protection. Although there is a clear case specific local measures to protect limited sites or featu of particular environmental sensitivity, such a piecem approach on its own is not enough to produce the chan role of farming which is increasingly necessary environmental and financial grounds. The bounda between protected and non-protected areas can only arbitrary, and are increasingly irrelevant in the face pollution and our growing appreciation of ecolog interdependence. The best results will arise from promotion of major changes in farming systems and farming philosophies.

A shift from product price support to environme management payments is capable of simultaneo reducing agricultural output, maintaining farm inco and farm populations, reducing the total cost of suppor society, and providing unequivocal environmental bene such as reduced pollution, improved wildlife habitats landscapes, and improved food quality. That is Lab party policy, and it is the only way forward for preservation and future of farming in Wales and elsewh for consumers, taxpayers and all those who wish to e the rural environment.

12.54 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Environment (Mr. David Heathcoat-Amory): I hope the hon. Member for Clwyd, South-West (Mr. Jones) forgive me if I do not mention all the points he m Although they are important for his constituents and n widely, they fall outside the scope of my minist responsibilities. However, I shall ensure that the rele Government members see his remarks and, w appropriate, respond.

I join in congratulating my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Mr. Neubert), who selected well in choosing this subject for debate. He introduced it with a fund of background knowledge about the environment, drawn from acute observations of the issues and his sustained interest in the subject over many years. His speech and those of other Members have touched on all the environmental issues with which our constituents are concerned. That does not deny the importance of the global issues, which are of increasing concern to the Government.

The hon. Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) rightly said that when people are initially asked about environmental issues that worry them, they tend to list neighbourhood concerns and local issues before turning to the global problems of ozone depletion and global warming which, although important, attract their immediate attention less often.

I pay tribute to my right hon. Friend the Member for Bath (Mr. Patten) for his skill and leadership of the Department of the Environment during the past year, particularly in the context of global issues. It was very much this skill and leadership that enabled this country to participate constructively in a number of international environment conferences and to bring some of them, including that on ozone depletion, to a successful conclusion.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey (Mr. Hughes) suggested that the appointment of my right hon. Friend the Member for Henley (Mr. Heseltine) to the Department of the Environment was a sign of a lessening in the Government's commitment to environmental protection. I assure him that that is not so. I know that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State will carry forward, undiminished, our policies to protect and enhance the built and natural environment. My hon. Friend the Member for South Hams (Mr. Steen) spoke about planning issues and the hon. Member for Newham, North-West mentioned a number of housing matters. If I cannot answer them all in this debate, I shall ensure that others read the remarks of those hon. Members.

I think that everyone who has examined the issues would agree that although the Government have a leadership role, the duty of the concerned and responsible individual is also important. A range of issues—from litter to energy efficiency, dog control, and recycling—are best tackled by a partnership between central Government, local government, individuals, voluntary groups and businesses. To achieve that, we need a knowledgeable and well-informed public. Throughout our White Paper and the Environmental Protection Act 1990, we stress the importance of public access to information. The active citizen needs relevant information, a certain amount of which is already available from voluntary groups such as WasteWatch, which produce a good national directory of recycling facilities.

The new Environmental Protection Act marks a milestone in that it sets in place the systematic provision of information. It establishes a framework for public information on diverse subjects such as litter control areas, areas of land that may be contaminated, processes that are subject to integrated pollution control and, perhaps most notably, a range of public registers that will contain raw monitoring data as well as licensing information, to which the public will have access free of charge. Our best defence against exaggerated or baseless scares is a well-informed public, able to make their own judgments about the real risks that we face.

My hon. Friend the Member for Romford made much of the problems of litter, and that theme was picked up by other hon. Members. I agree that a littered high street or locality is not just an eyesore, but a health hazard. A littered area also invites disrespect. To put it more positively, if we can improve our neighbourhoods and keep them clean and litter free, that will invite respect. It is a commonly observed phenomenon that people are more likely to throw litter on to an area that is already littered.

The Environmental Protection Act puts in place many new measures and policies to clean up the country. It is a double approach. We must prevent people from dropping litter, but, recognising that some people will always do so, we have improved the means and the duty to collect it. From 1 April next year, local authorities can employ litter wardens, based on the so-called Westminster model. No doubt they will concentrate mainly on getting people to sweep up their litter, and on asking them not to drop it. However, they will also have the power to hand out fixed penalty notices in appropriate cases. I remind the House that the maximum fine for dropping litter has been increased from £400 to £1,000.

Local authorities will be under a duty to keep their public areas clean. They will need to have regard to a code of practice that is currently before the House. The code has been developed with the aid of an advisory group. containing representatives from local authorities and industry. We have also had advice from the Tidy Britain Group. The main change that the code heralds is a switch from input-related to performance-related cleaning standards. Of course, we understand that, in some cases, that will require more expenditure by local authorities. We therefore commissioned a study by Coopers Lybrand Deloitte to estimate, in a sample of 20 authorities, how much extra funding would be required to comply with the new code. As a result of its findings, an additional £50 million has been taken into account in the revenue support grant settlement for 1991-92.

In addition, the public will be given new enforcement opportunities. They can apply to a magistrates' court for a litter abatement order to require their local authorities to keep their areas litter and refuse-free. We are mobilising public enthusiasm in the right direction.

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): If a member of the public has obtained a litter abatement order, will it be mandatory for local councils to comply with it, or will they have discretion? I hope that it will be compulsory for local authorities to take action, as some of them are laggardly in dealing with litter.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I reassure my hon. Friend that local authorities will have to comply with a court order. If they do not, they will be in breach of it. I hope that most local authorities will comply in advance, when it is drawn to their attention that they are apparently in breach of their duties, and will send someone round to do the necessary work. If a local authority fails to do that, the court will be able to require that it honours its obligation, and will have regard to the code of practice in assessing the standard of street and area cleanliness required.

[Mr. Heathcoat-Amory]

My hon. Friend the Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley) is unable to be in his place at this stage in the debate, but courteously gave me advance notice of his absence. He introduced into the debate the subject of roads and traffic, which was taken up also by the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey. My hon. Friend the Member for Eltham made the good point that occasionally more roads and bypasses are needed and that they can improve the local environment and save lives, by taking traffic away from congested urban areas. In my view a policy of outright opposition to all roads would be irresponsible.

My hon. Friend also made the point that the switch from leaded to unleaded petrol is far from complete, but that change is a good example of a market mechanism delivering an environmental result. Successive Budgets produced a duty differential between leaded and unleaded petrol that has made it financially and environmentally worthwhile for motorists to switch to unleaded fuel. My hon. Friend was right to say that many cars being driven today could use unleaded fuel, and I hope that their owners are not being put off by misleading claims that their vehicles would suffer a significant reduction in performance if they changed.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey occasionally exhibits a lack of liberalism. I agree with my hon. Friend the Member for Eltham that some of the administrative traffic controls that the hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey suggested would be complex and difficult to enforce. However, hon. Members in all parts of the House acknowledge that we must civilise the car. We should also make provision for a higher volume of traffic, because all the projections that I have seen for this country and others point to increased vehicle usage. That does not mean that we will be driving the same sorts of vehicles in the same way.

No doubt great advances will be made in types of fuel, and the electric car could have a part to play—although, on the face of it, electric vehicles would simply move the pollution from the roads to the power stations, and there is a problem with dragging round heavy batteries that work against fuel efficiency. Doubtless, science and technology will rise to the occasion and we will see in the future different cars, driven in different ways, at different speeds, powered by different fuels, and manufactured from different materials. I am glad that manufacturers are giving greater thought and attention to recycling cars at the end of their lives. Instead of old cars being scrapped, more attention should be paid to how they can be taken to pieces and their useful plastic and metal materials reused.

The hon. Member for Southwark and Bermondsey also mentioned parish councils. That is well outside my responsibilities. However, he will have noticed that two of the Ministers of State in the Department represent London seats and may be interested in the arguments, if not in the conclusions, about the need for parish councils in the London area.

The right hon. Member for Swanage, West made some interesting remarks.

Mr. Alan Williams: It is Swansea.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I apologise. The right hon. Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams) seemed to be under the misapprehension that Singapore is a social society. In fact, it is a testament to the success of fr enterprise. To see how a socialist society deals with t environment, he should look at eastern Europe, fro which he would draw very different conclusions. Fo years of state socialism behind the iron curtain have l those countries in a state of environmental catastrophe. will require at least the next 40 years to clean them up, a to undo the ravages of too great a reliance upon cent command and control planning.

The right hon. Member for Swansea, West alleged th the presumption in favour of development was introduc by my right hon. Friend the Member for Cirencester a Tewkesbury (Mr. Ridley). That is not the case as th principle has underlined the modern planning system sin 1949, when it was put forward in a circular issued by t Labour Government.

The principle simply means that a local authority mu demonstrate good reason for refusing development cannot comment upon individual planning cas especially as the ones concerned are in the Principali However, those responsible will doubtless read the ho Gentleman's remarks.

I cannot let a debate like this end without mention dogs—not because I think that that subject has not be adequately debated in the past, but because the lack control of dogs has a most unfortunate impact on the lo environment. I am glad that we finally have in plac system which promises to deal directly with the problem stray dogs, and to enforce the requirement that a dog i public place must wear a collar and identification tag. T duty of enforcement will be discharged by district counc which are in a much better position to do so than county councils or the police.

The Home Office has also made available a grea range of strengthened byelaws to deal with stray do Officials in my Department are holding a series of meeti with people interested in dogs, and the problems that t cause, to work out details of what could be called the d package for introduction by April 1992. Once that is place, it will be a big step forward, will introduce a grea sense of responsibility for dog owners, and will help to d with the undoubted environmental problems that re from irresponsible dog ownership.

My hon. Friend's motion also mentions recycling. I tribute to the wide range of local authorities, voluntary and industrial groups, which are implement our policy to improve our recycling performance. We h a target of recycling half of the household waste that possible to recycle by the end of the century. That requ partnership between all concerned.

Increasingly, facilities are being provided for recycling of materials such as glass, aluminium, s paper and textiles. I am glad that supermarkets beginning to provide facilities for recycling pla shopping bags. We must never forget the need not sim to collect recyclable materials, but to ensure that there demand for them. In other words, we must balance supply and demand for those materials. Consider damage was done to the cause of recycling by temporary glut of low-grade waste paper caused by tremendous enthusiasm to collect newspapers without corresponding adequate means of using them to pro new paper. I am glad that it looks as though at least new large newsprint mill will come on stream soon, making use of this paper and bringing about the balance that is required.

Everyone has a part to play in stimulating demand for recycled goods. My Department uses 100 per cent. recycled paper in all its correspondence. I do not believe that the House of Commons does that yet, so I hope that hon. Members will follow the lead of my Department in using recycled materials whenever possible.

Mr. Tony Banks: There is some available.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I look forward to receiving the hon. Gentleman's letters on recycled paper.

Mr. Simon Hughes: Will the Minister clarify a point? Last year, I asked one of his colleagues about this and was given to understand that the Department uses offcuts rather than properly recycled paper. Is that still the case, and if so, will the Department soon have properly recycled paper?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The use of offcuts is legitimate, because it is paper that would otherwise have been wasted. However, the hon. Gentleman puts his finger on an issue —the problem of defining exactly what recycled paper is. Another problem is that a different percentage of recycled fibres is used in making paper. That is one reason why it is unwise to use fiscal measures to promote the use of recycled paper. In deciding, for example, to relieve recycled paper of VAT, one would have to decide what constitutes recycled paper and in so doing make a number of difficult and arbitrary decisions. The best way forward is to promote the use of recycled paper wherever we can. I agree that post-consumer recycled paper is preferable, but the use of offcuts is also valid.

We need to mobilise public enthusiasm more generally in pursuit of environmental aims, not just by increasing public access to information but by improved labelling. Every day, customers and consumers making purchasers in shops make millions of environmental decisions. We want those decisions to be better informed, so we are working out a scheme for labelling products with environmental information. We should like to take this forward with our partner countries in Europe, in the interests of free trade. If that does not prove possible, or if matters become too delayed, we shall consider a national scheme. Those environmental labels will be awarded on the basis of a number of criteria, including the use of recycled materials in the product, the potential for recycling the materials, and the packaging of the product.

My hon. Friend the Member for Romford spoke with authority about air pollution, which he emphasised was, in his experience, of central importance if we are to improve the quality of our urban environment. He will recognise that the types of pollution with which we have to deal are different from that which afflicted us when he first entered Parliament. That was in the last days of the smog problem, which was effectively resolved by earlier legislation. That problem has now been replaced by greater concern about different kinds of gases—sulphur compounds, oxides of nitrogen and low-level ozone. I assure him that these concerns were very much to the fore when we drew up the White Paper on the environment and during the passage of the Environmental Protection Act.

During the discussions on the Bill, all sides agreed that a decisive step forward must be taken by introducing tighter regulation over emissions, not just to the air but to land and water. That takes the form of our system of integrated pollution control which will extend and clarify the controls that are now exercised by Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution. In future, we shall require the use of best available techniques not entailing excessive cost to maximise our control over pollution and to render emissions to the air and other media harmless and inoffensive.

We are determined to require new plant and equipment in Britain to use the very best control techniques available anywhere in the world. Under the system of integrated pollution control, authorisations will be required before certain industrial processes can begin. Again, the public will be able to take action in the courts for contravention of any condition. For the first time the public will be given full details of the proposed pollution controls and will be invited to comment on them. Furthermore, they will have access to local authority offices in which will be held the details of the control conditions imposed on those industries and the monitoring data, showing how well they are complying with them. Similar controls will be enforced by local authorities over the so-called part B processes —the less potentially polluting processes and industries.

My hon. Friend wisely coupled his remarks about air pollution with the cost implications. We must never forget that higher environmental standards do not come cheap. We are, therefore, putting in place by means of the Environmental Protection Act a cost recovery system, which is the embodiment of the "polluter pays" principle. It will enable Her Majesty's inspectorate of pollution and local authorities to recover the cost of administration, enforcement and regulation direct from the industries. That will be a new source of revenue for the regulators, which will ensure that the costs are not simply thrown on to the general taxpayer and chargepayer.

In the water industry, too, the principle is being carried forward of the separation of the regulator from the operator. The cost of the regulator will increasingly fall on the regulated—again, the "polluter pays" principle. The public are rightly requiring ever-higher standards of water purity and treatment. It is only right, therefore, that they should see those higher standards coming through in the form of higher costs, which ultimately must be borne by us all. A virtue of the Water Act 1989 is that it brings transparency to the system of enforcement and cost.

My hon. Friend the Member for Romford said that drinking water quality is generally high and gave his own water company as an example. I confirm and endorse his remarks. The new regime established by the Water Act will ensure, for the first time, an effective system of regulating drinking water quality for which there are appropriate back-up powers. It sets out precise standards for drinking water that must be attained and specifies in detail the monitoring that must be carried out. Again, the results are publicly available. The new drinking water inspectorate that was set up in my Department at the start of this year ensures that water companies comply with the new statutory duties. Local authorities, too, have a significant part to play, and the Water Act places a duty on them to keep themselves informed about the quality and sufficiency of water supplies in their areas.

My hon. Friend the Member for Romford mentioned the need for unpolluted beaches and inshore waters. He has an inland constituency, whereas my constituency has several miles of beach. I, too, am anxious to improve the quality of our inshore waters. The controls on litter have an important role, and they will apply in those areas. We must recognise that much litter comes not from people dropping it on beaches but by its being washed up from other sources; some of it originates from ships. It is not only unsightly but is a health hazard to marine life such as seals and sea birds.

[Mr. Heathcoat-Amory]

There is an international agreement to prohibit the dumping of all plastics and most forms of garbage close to the coast. The Government have introduced regulations that make it an offence for any yacht or commercial vessel to dispose of such waste in the sea.

That is reinforced by a public information and publicity campaign undertaken by the Department of Transport.

Mr. Tony Banks: It is highly desirable that dumping inshore and on the high seas should be made illegal. It is one thing to pass a measure saying that it is illegal but another to enforce it. Will the Minister say—I accept that it is not his direct departmental responsibility—what enhanced enforcement powers are being taken to ensure that irresponsible people do not continue to pollute our coastal waters?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The hon. Gentleman makes a fair point: regulation is one thing, but enforcement is important. It is difficult to know what is happening on board a ship many miles off the coast. I invite members of the public on shore or on vessels to report breaches of the regulations. The regional offices of the Department of Transport rely on information from the public and from crew members to help to enforce the regulations.

I reassure the hon. Member for Newham, North-West that port authorities are paying attention to the regulations. Recently, I visited Bristol port authority, where I saw facilities and provision for receiving waste from ships when they dock. Ships and boats of all sizes have no excuse for tipping their rubbish overboard rather than taking it into harbour and disposing of it responsibly.

Mr. Neubert: My hon. Friend has responded to a series of points made in the debate, but he omitted to refer to graffiti, which was mentioned by my hon. Friend the Member for Wanstead and Woodford (Mr. Arbuthnot). I hope that my hon. Friend agrees that the defacing of buildings, walls and bridges by graffiti is as much a detraction from amenities as are litter and refuse. The code of practice does not appear to mention it, but will there be any action to deal with that modern phenomenon?

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Graffiti was not overlooked in our discussions about litter during the passage of the Environmental Protection Bill or when we drew up the code of practice. We reached the conclusion, however, that it is a different sort of problem. It would not be altogether fair to require the victims of graffiti to keep their buildings free of it. To place an expensive obligation on the victim approaches the problem in the wrong way.

We prefer to draw to the attention of the enforcement authorities and the courts the means that already exist to take action against that form of vandalism. For example, section 1 of the Criminal Damage Act 1971 makes it an offence, punishable by up to 10 years' imprisonment, to damage, recklessly or intentionally, any property belonging to another. Under section 3 of the Act it is an offence to possess anything with the intent to destroy damage property. The law is already extremely tou when dealing with that nuisance and vandalism.

It is also important to emphasise the need incorporate in designs the means of preventing or reduc graffiti damage. I have seen new materials and new ty of surface that are available to those designing shopping town centres that are resistant to spray paint or mak easier to remove. A small investment in anti-graf measures can bring a considerable return in terms of environment. A graffiti-free part of town generally st that way, whereas when a potential vandal sees a pl already covered in graffiti it almost invites him to appe his signature to it.

I assure my hon. Friends that the omission of graf from the code of practice does not mean that we insensible to that form of environmental irresponsibil

I am grateful to all hon. Members who have spoke am not, of course, formally replying to the debate, contributing to it. If, during the remainder of the deba other points are made which are my responsibility, I sh ensure that they are considered and responded to wh appropriate.

1.32 pm

Mr. Win Griffiths (Bridgend): I, too, should like express my congratulations to the hon. Member Romford (Mr. Neubert) on his success in coming first the ballot and on presenting a wide-ranging motion t enables us to discuss not just the local environment that of the world. When John Wesley undertook his sea for souls in the 18th century, he said:

"I look upon all the world as my parish."

That applies even more so today as we grapple w problems to ensure that our local communities are dec places in which to live.

The motion gives us the opportunity to deal with matters from the stratosphere to the street. It is howev a sad commentary on eleven and a half years of To government that a Tory Member has had to introduc motion that pleads for advances in the quality of life covers just about everything. In that sense, it is commentary on what J. K. Galbraith so long a described as the presence of "private opulence" w "public squalor". In the 1980s, that public squalor become worse because the Government have not given local environment the priority that it deserves.

Mr. Neubert indicated dissent.

Mr. Griffiths: The hon. Member for Romford shal his head in disagreement. However, we are debating motion today and it pleads for advances in the quality life.

Mr. Neubert: I deliberately tabled a motion that did rise to the stratosphere as I wanted to emphasise the lo environment. The hon. Member for Bridgend (M Griffiths) has made political points about the motion. I the local authorities that have received the most gra from the Government in recent years which have m street cleaning their lowest priority.

Mr. Griffiths: The hon. Gentleman says that the mot deals not with the stratosphere but with the lo environment. However, the hon. Gentleman's plea for clean air involves issues that, if they were discussed in one debate, would not have been dealt with in every aspect.

One of the Government's problems in the past decade is illustrated by a tautology in the motion. It calls on the Government to act

"through the necessary minimum regulation".

Any good English teacher would say that the phrase "necessary regulation" is sufficient and that there is no need to use the word "minimum" as well. The wording shows the state of mind of the hon. Member for Romford and of his party. The Government do not want to become closely involved, which contrasts with the attitude taken in other countries. The United States is a good example. If the capitalist economy has worked fully and freely anywhere, it is in the United States, yet there are strict regulatory controls there on all aspects not only of industrial production but of the conduct of commerce and of high finance. We do not need adjectives such as "minimum" to govern our approach to the local environment. As other hon. Members have already stressed, the local environment is important to individuals. People write to us at far greater length and on many more aspects of the local environment than on the matters of great moment that we often discuss here.

Clean air is not merely relevant to a debate on the local environment. When we discuss the air that we breathe, whether in the House of Commons, in London or in our constituencies, why is it important to consider the international implications? A few simply examples will show that it is important to take international considerations into account. Chernobyl showed just how important it is that we should have an international dimension to our thoughts about clean air and a decent environment. In some parts of England and Wales, the farmland is still so contaminated that the livestock cannot be sold in the marketplace.

Let us think for a moment that acid rain. We have heard this morning about the failure of the Soviet-type system to produce a clean industrial environment and regulate pollution. Incidentally, the Labour party has never claimed that it wants to ape the Soviet system, so comparisons are wholly unnecessary. Britain is often described as the dirty man of Europe because of the acid rain that we caused to fall on Scandinavian countries but sometimes wind and weather change, and when that happens, we have our own problems.

The hon. Member for Romford described how when he was a younger man, new to the House, great success was achieved in dealing with the problem of smog. That was good, but it was perhaps easier to tackle smog because one could see it—or, rather, one could not see beyond one's nose when one was in it. Many of the threats to clean air today are not so easily seen. That is why it is crucial that we should focus on the problems of acid rain and low-level ozone which are the more insidious because they cannot be seen.

As in so many matters, the quarrel between the Opposition and the Government centres on urgency and on the pace of change. We believe that we should espouse the precautionary principle. If there is an element of doubt about the harmful effects of a practice or substance, we should immediately take steps to investigate it. If it is proved that there is no cause for consternation, the practice can be resumed or the substance deemed safe. That is better than ruling out action on the grounds that there is not sufficient evidence. If one waits for evidence to appear, it may be too late to act. It is better to take an urgent look at what is happening if there are doubts about it.

The two major causes of air pollution are the production of energy and the vehicles on our roads. We could make tremendous progress if only we would undertake a full flue gas desulphurisation programme instead of relying on the possible use of low-sulphur coal. Supplies of low-sulphur coal are not necessarily guaranteed. Most of it will have to be imported and the price could prove prohibitive. In a short time, gas desulphurisation could look like a cheap option.

The Labour Government of the 1990s will set up an energy efficiency agency charged with dealing with precisely those matters. We could then reduce significantly our carbon dioxide emissions, a third of which come from power stations. We could also reduce significantly our sulphur dioxide emissions, 70 per cent. of which come from power stations, and one third of our nitrogen oxide emissions, which also come from power stations. All that would help to contribute towards clean air in this country. Combined heat and power schemes, especially those that utilise waste, must also be considered and promoted with the utmost vigour.

I do not want to dwell for too long on transport because many hon. Members have underlined the problem of air pollution and also the danger from cars and lorries on our overcrowded roads, particularly in city centres. However, large lorries can be just as dangerous on narrow rural roads.

Eighteen per cent. of our carbon dioxide, amounting to 28 million tonnes, comes from vehicle pollution. The more that we can do to introduce an effective public transport network in which buses, railways and underground systems are all considered together, the better. Unfortunately transport deregulation has not helped. Large cities now find it difficult to plan large integrated transport systems. For example, since deregulation in Newcastle it has proved difficult for transport schemes like the Metro to link up with the bus services. The result is that huge traffic jams involving minibuses are blocking bridges across the River Tyne. We must pay more attention to public transport investment and to our rail services. We must get the long distance lorries off our roads. We must promote intermodal freight so that containers can be moved off trains straight on to lorries so that the lorries make only local journeys.

Although we need roads where they will provide a direct benefit to the community, some of our plans for the 1,500 miles of motorway and trunk roads must be reconsidered to discover whether they are really necessary. Reference has already been made to the controversy over Oxleas woods. There is a united approach among the local hon. Members concerned about how that problem should be tackled to stop the desecration of that ancient woodland. However, there are similar examples of concern around the country. People are up in arms about the impact on their local environment. That is why it is important to have a proper assessment of the environmental impact of road schemes. It is estimated that 162 sites of special scientific interest would be damaged if all those schemes went ahead. On that basis alone, we should reconsider what we are doing in that massive programme.

[Mr. Griffiths]

Another major factor that produces much justifiable local outcry is the use of inefficient incinerators. It has been a problem in trying to get efficient combined heat and power systems that incinerate waste to work successfully. Emissions from inefficient incinerators have been bad for local communities. We now have European Community standards, but none of the 35 incinerators yet complies with those standards. They have until 1996 to do so. I hope that the Government will give those who run such incinerators—often local authorities—extra financial help to meet the standards before 1996. From the end of this month new incinerators will have to meet those standards. That is good news for members of the public who have often been bedevilled by incineration.

Hon. Members have referred to noise pollution. Hon. Members are often plunged into neighbourhood disputes, particularly when flats are involved. There are several lessons to be learnt. In addition to moves that are already being made to improve heat and noise insulation—the two often go together—there is still more to be done in respect of new houses and the renovation of old properties. We need new standards and proper Government implementation of them. We need also the financial carrot to help people, in particular those who are less well off, to afford to implement the new standards that will benefit everybody.

We also need environmental health officers to implement the law. At the moment, a noise dispute between neighbours can be settled only by the complainant going to court. Neither the police nor environmental health officers can become directly involved. Also, there are difficulties in placing proper monitoring equipment at the right time of day. Noise often happens at 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning. One will not get environmental health officers at that time because of local authorities' difficulties in financing their budgets. The Government should give environmental health officers the power to intervene in neighbourhood noise disputes.

On noise pollution that is caused by industrial activities, the "polluter pays" principle should be applied, again under Government regulation so that the rules are clear. Factories or rail shunting yards that cause noise problems should be responsible for providing the noise insulation that neighbours require.

Much has been said about pollution of our rivers and beaches, and reference has been made to the standard of our tap water. There is a certain complacency among Conservative Members. Modern pollution problems are more insidious and are often more difficult to track than the old ones were. The lead problem was known for years and lead piping has been progressively replaced. We now know the possible links between aluminium and pre-senile dementia. Polycyclic aromatic hydrocarbons, which are linked to cancer, are to be found in the coal tar lining of many of the older water supply pipes. Pesticide residues are raising problems in relation to the quality of our drinking water and because of the nitrates that pollute them. We must deal with the many problems relating to the intensification methods used in agriculture. The Government are taking steps to deal with the nitrate-sensitive problems, but once again they are acting too slowly, not enough of the difficulties have been identified and the measures taken have not b enough to ensure that there is no abuse through nitrate fertilisers.

Problems relating to the proper disposal waste have not been adequately tackled. Far discharge variations are being allowed, and mor in five sewage works are unable to stay dispensations they have been given. It is no won have problems with the cryptosporidium para causes gastroenteritis. Some large scale outbr been detected, but one wonders about incidence outbreaks have not been so serious and conseq problem has not been identified.

As the Minister mentioned, there is a drin inspectorate in the Department of the Environm is hard pressed and has only sufficient staff to water companies' own monitoring results. The believe there is a case for creating a totally in drinking water inspectorate, within a wider envi protection executive, which would be properly able to pursue those matters much more freely. might be said about the quality of our water, worried about it.

Mr. Arbuthnot: As we tot up the cost of the n party manifesto, it would be helpful if the hon. said how much that scheme would cost and wh is a Labour party commitment to spend mone

Mr. Griffiths: If we were to adopt the "poll principle—the Minister referred to exampl Government introducing such systems—many measures would be self-financing. One of the gr in the past has been that we have let industry get polluting our environment. An article in today Mail, which serves a substantial part of Wales, Kent company called, I think, "Clean Drain", o south Wales, which dumped 3,000 tonnes of wa through a drain into the River Taff. The pollu the river's total fish stock of over 12,000. I am say that the court fined the company £70,000. involving the "polluter pays" principle wou many of the schemes to which the hon. Mem Many of the issues are governed by European C regulations, which means that other coun obligations similar to ours. It should be our duty through our elected Members of the European and through direct Government representati Commission, that the regulations are properly in the other countries. There need be no disad our country. While an element of cost is bo involved, both for the Government and authorities, much of it will be recouped by "polluter pays" principle.

I wish now to refer to our beaches and insh One in four of our designated beaches do no European Community standards for pollution from sewage. I have to admit that both L Conservative Governments have dragged their issue. However, the Conservative Government more culpable because the bathing water dir approved in 1976, to come fully into operatio

When the Labour Government left p Department of the Environment had prepared the criteria to govern beaches in the United When this Government came to power, I under they designated only 27 beaches in England and Scotland, and none in Northern Ireland and Wales, as coming within the terms of the directive. The Minister will no doubt correct me if that is wrong. There was uproar in the European Community and among the directly elected British Members of the European Parliament, of which I was one. The Government were threatened with being taken before the European Court of Justice, and in the 1980s they produced a revised list of almost 400 beaches that came within the terms of the directive. Although 1986 was the date on which the directive's terms should have been fully met, it was only in that year that the Government finally made a proper designation of beaches.

Britain is currently before the European Court of Justice because the Government envisage the directive being met in about 1995, in most cases. It is possible that the European Court will decide that, given the original 10-year time scale for the directive, the Government will have to speed up the process. Legally, compliance is the Government's responsibility, although in practice the water companies will have to ensure that the standards in the directive are met.

The Department recently appealed to the private individual to report examples of ships dumping waste or sewage at sea. As my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West (Mr. Banks) said, more than that is needed, and in particular there should be a proper inspectorate. One of the great failings of the Government has been a lack of the proper inspection to ensure compliance with existing regulations. For example, the issue of street parking was raised by a number of hon. Members including the hon. Member for Eltham (Mr. Bottomley). Every week in my constituency I receive complaints about motorists parking illegally. I contact the police, the traffic wardens, and the local authority, but they all say that although they are trying their best, they do not have sufficient staff to enforce the parking restrictions and to ensure that motorists are aware that if they park illegally they will be fined. If there are proper inspections and the law is enforced, and if people know that if they do not respect the law it is more than likely they will be caught, that will help to improve the local environment.

Mr. Jessel: The hon. Gentleman is making an interesting and important speech, and of course he has the right to continue. However, he may forgive me if I point out that he has already been speaking longer than the Minister, and three other hon. Members hope to catch Mr. Deputy Speaker's eye.

Mr. Griffiths: I do not want to get into a dispute with the hon. Gentleman, but I have been on my feet for 32 minutes, and the Minister spoke for 38 minutes. It was my intention to conclude in six minutes' time, at 10 minutes past 2 o'clock at the latest—and perhaps earlier.

A number of hon. Members, including my right hon. Friend the Member for Swansea, West (Mr. Williams), pointed out that a Government Department often plays more than one role, which may be seen by the public to prejudice a particular planning application which could have a significant impact on a locality and which is the subject of almost unanimous local opposition.

Hon. Members may have noticed that I excused myself from the debate for a few minutes this morning, during the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Newham, North-West. I was asked to go to the phone to speak to a lady calling from Huntingdon who had hoped to spea the Prime Minister, thinking that he might be participa in this debate. She had read about it in The Independ thought that it was extremely important, and, as it wa the behest of a Conservative Member, imagined that Prime Minister would be taking part.

The issue that the lady wanted to raise was a plan application for 111 houses on Spring comm Apparently, Baroness Blatch, who is a trustee of common, was recently elevated to the position Under-Secretary of State at the Department of Environment. The Prime Minister's predecessor as Member for Huntingdon, Lord Renton, who held the for 45 years, has written to Baroness Blatch to seek undertaking about the way in which the application wi dealt with. The lady hoped that the Prime Minister, wh view she has not yet been able to ascertain, will supp those campaigning to save Spring common. It seems li from the remarks of the hon. Member for Eltham Baroness Blatch will withdraw from any consideratio her Department of the Spring common application, there should surely be a review of the way in which Department of the Environment, Welsh Office Scottish Office handle planning applications.

Over the past few years, we have seen an increas opencast mining, much to the consternation of pe living near the sites of that activity. Labour is commi to maintaining strict control of it and to implementing Flowers report, which will limit extractions to 3 mil tonnes less than the current figure. That subject has arisen in the debate, so I wanted to mention it now.

I did not get around to mentioning either the ques of waste from heat, which, with recycling, is an impor way of dealing with domestic refuse, and should be co properly by comparison with keeping and manag landfill sites.

When the Companies Bill was going through House, the Government rejected environmental audits the United States, companies such as Procter and Gam produce a company policy, entitled "In Partnership W Our Environment", and they take significant steps reduce the amount of packaging and to ensure that it be either re-used or recycled. That is a positive comp strategy. We need a similar strategy in Britain. We need Government to encourage stronger action and m urgency and less of the voluntary or persuasive appro which, frankly, is not good enough.

2.10 pm

Mr. Toby Jessel (Twickenham): I am grateful to hon. Member for Bridgend (Mr. Griffiths) for his court as it was apparent from the impressive pile of notes in fr of him that he could have continued. His speech especially interesting on the important subjects of wa and air. I remind him that since the Clean Air Acts w introduced under successive Governments there have b great improvements in the quality of air in Londo remember the smog which used to pollute us in the days. We no longer see that.

I join in warmly congratulating my hon. Friend Member for Romford (Mr. Neubert) on introducing debate and giving us this opportunity. I wish that I co have been present throughout the debate, but I ha previous engagement with my dentist—I should m rather have been here so that I could have heard the whole of the debate. I look forward to reading the speech of my hon. Friend the Member for Romford.

[Mr. Toby Jessel]

I hope that when my hon. Friend refers in his motion to "reduced noise levels" he does not mean the noise made by military bands, which are trained in my constituency at the Royal Military School of Music, Kneller Hall, with which he had some association with last year, when he was a Minister with responsibility for the Army. As a musician, he will know that the noise that they produce is splendid, and that their high standard of excellence is the envy of the entire world. They contribute to the quality of life, to which he also referred in his motion.

The River Thames loops around my constituency and two-thirds of my constituents live within one mile of the river. They greatly treasure the Thames as an amenity, and as a facet of their lives. They are well aware that it is not only important to people in Twickenham, Teddington, the Hamptons, and Wickham, but to greater London as a whole.

My hon. Friend the Member for Richmond and Barnes (Mr. Hanley)—a neighbouring constituency—made a major contribution when he campaigned in the mid-1980s against the lead weights used by fishermen, which endangered swans. A large number of swans have now come back to the River Thames. Opposite Hampton, in my constituency, they are now to be seen in large numbers every day in the park, where they are fed by children and others who live in the neighbourhood.

I am worried about the quality of water in the River Thames because of two new factors. First, recent hot summers and low rainfall have led to drought, so that most of the water in the river has to be taken out upstream to provide enough for the water supply, which means that there is not enough water flowing downstream. To maintain a reasonably quantity of water in the river, the lock at Teddington has to be closed, which turns the River Thames above the lock into a stagnant pond. The improvement that we have seen in the river in recent years, which means that salmon have been found as far upstream as Molesey lock, is thus being jeopardised. At the end of his speech, my hon. Friend the Minister said that if points were made in the debate to which he could not reply, he would take account of them, so I ask him to look into both that and at the toxicity of the River Thames.

I am glad to see that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Wales has come into the Chamber, not only because he was a Minister at the Department of the Environment but because of his undoubted concern for rivers in Wales. Too much poisonous matter is still going into our rivers. At Hampton Court, one sometimes sees bubbles in the water coming out of the River Mole, a tributary of the Thames. I suspect that that comes from a car wash a little upstream.

Will the Government look most carefully at the issue of discharges from car washes into rivers? In drought conditions, we are told to save water and forbidden to water shrubs and plants in our gardens because of the water shortage. Yet car washes seem to go on without any constraint. It is wrong, and nonsense, that just because they are commercial activities and part of trade, they can continue to use copious quantities of water, mixed with pollutants which then go into rivers. The are given too much autonomy in decidin curbs.

Will my hon. Friend the Minister mak Department to see what can be d conditions, if we have fine summers like t past, to curb the use of car washes so th be given to allowing people to water pla their gardens?

2.16 pm

Mr. David Bellotti (Eastbourne): I Member for Romford (Mr. Neubert) important issue. I have a number of con pollution of the beaches and the constituency which I guess is similar seaside towns. We were awarded a blue fl was tested, but some groups suggested t not taken along the whole length of the b us with the worst of all worlds. If our bea we should like to take action because we and for the good of our economy mus However, if the beaches are not polluted statement so that fringe groups cannot m the local economy. The Government mus in this matter and ensure that testing for beaches is clear and respected by all, so t understood. We need a great deal more truth.

Our local environment has a particul which I hope the Minister will talk to his Department of Transport. One of the gr the pollution caused by the inability to one part of the constituency to another. T to the problem, the Hampden Pa Unfortunately, local government doe financial capacity to introduce this relief have the busiest level crossing in the queues of people have to wait for hou across the constituency. This causes industry and causes concern to local peo it pollutes the environment because disgorging fumes. Unless the Departm encourages local government to spend problem will not be resolved.

The hon. Member for Romford refer Department of Transport, as part of it main roads in my constituency, has bu Unfortunately, it did not use the materi Minister referred—that deters people graffiti on the walls. The underpass regularly redecorated, but the materi Department of Transport have no effect I hope that the Minister will encourage o to think carefully about using materials t less graffiti in our towns and villages.

The hon. Member for Newham, Banks) referred to complaints about n who come to his surgeries. A number of come to my surgery at Eastbourne have noise. I took up their complaint with the environmental health department. It is not have the financial resources to em with the matter. Furthermore, the legislation does not help the authority as much as it should. I hope that the Minister will consider what he can do about the problem.

Eastbourne park is an area of considerable beauty, but the pressure to develop it is considerable. The Minister and the Government should consider whether they favour the developers or the preservation of the local environment. One always has to perform a balancing act, but we want Eastbourne park to be preserved. We hope that in that case, and in similar areas throughout the United Kingdom, the Minister will always favour the preservation of the environment.

Many of my constituents are concerned about the pollution caused by the development of the Crumbles in Eastbourne. The developers were not required—because it was felt that it would not be successful—to provide alternative access from the main highways. Some of my constituents have to put up with large numbers of lorries going down their residential roads to reach the site. The Government must make it clear that when developers cause pollution, whether it be noise pollution or other forms, they must put it right. If the Government believe in the "polluter pays" principle, they should ensure that developers do not allow pollution to be caused by their developments.

The motion is about quality of life. Many of my constituents believe that the quality of life has not improved in recent years. They have sent me here to give the message to the Government that they must do something to improve it.

2.22 pm

Mr. James Arbuthnot (Wanstead and Woodford): I congratulate my hon. Friend the Member for Romford (Mr. Neubert) on securing the debate. In one well-worded motion he has captured the theme of the 1990s and beyond. He highlighted the areas on which we must concentrate in future years. In particular, he highlighted the fact that we must try to improve the quality of our life.

I thank the hon. Member for Eastbourne (Mr. Bellotti) and my hon. Friend the Member for Twickenham (Mr. Jessel) for their brevity as well as for their interesting speeches. They have cut short their speeches to allow me a little time in which to speak.

The widely worded motion allowed hon. Members to cover many aspects of the quality of life. My hon. Friend the Member for Romford referred to our historic heritage, of which we are becoming more and more aware. One problem caused by increasing prosperity is that people have more leisure time, and they spend more time visiting historic sites. Pressure on our beautiful sites has become intense. It is difficult to know how to cope with the increasing number of visitors to the Lake district, to our cathedrals and to Epping forest. Moreover, how do we cope with visitors to Stonehenge? If we try to preserve Stonehenge from being worn away by fencing it off completely so that no one can get near the site, are we not destroying its point? Yet what choice do we have? I have no answer to that problem, and I suspect that it will be difficult to find one, but it will become increasingly important to do so.

I welcome what the Government have done this year to improve the environment. The Environmental Protection Act 1990 was an extremely important step forward and the White Paper published in the summer was an excellent addition. Those measures set out a programme committed action to improve the environmer decade. In that respect, my hon. Friend the M South Hams (Mr. Steen) reminded us environment is, for the moment, a fashionabl believe that it will remain fashionable and will r the rest of my life. As the planet becomes mor the pressures on its resources increase, the spac to us reduces and the stresses of living cheek b crowded world and at a frenetic pace increas have to control and husband the resources of ever more carefully.

I welcome what the Government are doing, b when I intervened on my hon. Friend the M Romford, and as he said when he interven Minister, the White Paper does not appear t graffiti. It may seem a small subject, but in my co it is extremely important. It not only makes bui and dirty, but creates an impression of negl society not caring about appearances. In permeates other areas of life. I do not want to far, but one could suggest that graffiti left on bu walls creates an air of lawlessness and of society interested in upholding its laws or values.

The consequences of that impression dangerous and far reaching. Graffiti tends to rabbits, and if something has been written o tends to encourage people and to remind them they can write on walls and, secondly, that tha wall to write on. The answer to graffiti must be it as quickly as possible. The quicker it is remov likely it is to attract more, and the more like discourage the vandal in the first place.

Redbridge council has done what it can graffiti on council property as quickly as possib a reward of £250 to anyone who gives informati to the arrest and conviction of a vandal. Pu context, it costs the council £100,000 a year to the problem of graffiti, which could be spent social services, increased lighting, improv collection, or other important areas of its respo is not available because of people who mistaken themselves artists, but are vandals. Removal would be made easier if architects, plan decorators became aware of the paint that mal easy to wash off.

Litter is another problem that grows if left al sees a sofa discarded in the street, the chance there will be a mattress nearby, possibly a three- and an occasional table. To some extent, the p such bulky refuse has been reduced by the intro civic amenity sites, but the smaller refuse proble remains.

The Government have introduced litter notices against the owners of commercial fron regularly fail to keep their frontage clean. Tha should be extended to this country. In some countries it is obligatory for householders a commercial enterprises to keep the frontages buildings clean of litter.

If such a practice was introduced here it wo that we had a new army of litter collecters— population. That would have to lead to a cleane however badly that new army performed its task also encourage a new sense of community becau would have to get together, particularly those blocks of flats, to arrange how to keep the frontages of their buildings clean. Most important, it would bring home to everyone a point that they have so far appeared to evade: that litter is a problem——

[Mr. James Arbuthnot]

It being half-past Two o'clock, the debate stood adjourned.

EUROPEAN COMMUNITY DOCUMENTS

Ordered,

That European Community Document No. 8182/90, relating to the draft General Budget of the European Communities for 1991, shall not stand referred to European Standing Committee C.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

Ordered,

That European Community Document No. 9431/90, relating to political union, shall not stand referred to European Standing Committee C.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Ordered,

That, at the sitting on Tuesday 4th December, if proceedings on the Motion in the name of Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer relating to the draft European Community Budget for 1991 have not been previously disposed of, Mr. Speaker shall at Seven o'clock put the Question already proposed from the Chair, and, if that Question is for the Amendment of the said Motion, then put forthwith the Main Question or the Main Question, as amended.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

Walsall District General H

Motion made, and Question proposed, T do now adjourn.—[Mr. Kirkhope.]

2.30 pm

Mr. David Winnick (Walsall, North): I the opportunity to raise a matter which I on 3 July last year when a different Minis subject of the debate is the district general referred to as the Manor, in my borough, with Goscote hospital, is the subject of trust application.

On the last occasion I said that various including the British Medical Associa Consultants Committee and the Royal Col were vigorously opposed to opting out. I a any of those organisations has changed slightest. With a new Prime Minister, how that much of what would be rightly Thatcherite policies will be modified.
proposal is one such test. I know that the that hospitals are not opting out of the Hea formal designation of the proposal relates t to be a self-governing trust, but the pr referred to as opting out.

If the opting out proposals are intended can only reach the conclusion that the s viewpoint will be taken on the Health Se matters as has been taken for the past 1 there being a new person at the top. I unde will be a statement next Tuesday about the we shall wait and see.

The applications from the Manor and out have been approved by the West Mi health authority. It will be up to the Secreta yes or no. On 17 September I responde invitation to comment on the applica hospitals to become self-governing. That described as a consultation process. I w formal objection to the applications an whether what was taking place could be genuine consultation exercise aimed at as on the proposals or whether the matter h upon already and the consultation exerci charade.

I have since asked whether the results of exercise on the two hospitals could be pu
The reply to my parliamentary question w can only assume that the reason for response is that the exercise was meaningles that was practised in eastern Europe until

All along, the Government have refused to be held before opting out occurs. It is in as I have said before, that a ballot is schools can opt out and before council acco be sold to private landlords. Why should held before the self-governing trusts are ap reason—which is not the reason that the M give today—is that Health Ministers kn ballot, whether in my borough or elsewher overwhelming objection to the applicatio

A formal application has been ma hospitals to become trusts. The prospec have chosen the words carefully—that the and preferences of the local population wi pital

this House

glad to have inally raised replied. The ital, usually ch, together lf-governing dical bodies,

, the Joint
of Nursing,
t aware that mind in the r, one hopes escribed as opting-out ister will say
Service. The application
e is usually remain, one doctrinaire

e and other ears, despite nd that there lications, so

scote to opt nds regional f State to say the RHA's
s for those vitation was a letter of questioned med to be a aining views been decided vas merely a consultation

the Library. simple no. I ministerial d of the kind year.
allow ballots
sting to note, ssary before nodation can t a ballot be ved? The real ter is likely to that in any ere would be r opting out.
for the two says—and I ds, opinions
e recognised.

It says that it will be essential that local views are canvassed to ensure that future developments are responsive to local preferences. It all sounds very good——

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): It is.

Mr. Winnick: If it is all very good, what does the Minister think of the reaction of the local health authority, the manager of which drew up the prospectus for the trust? The results of a household postal referendum carried out by the local authority showed an overwhelming rejection of the proposal. Everyone in the borough was given the opportunity to express his or her view by the local authority. As my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) knows, a fair summary of the two options was given.

The Minister may say, "People were of the view that it was a question of opting out of the National Health Service." In fact, the local health authority agreed that the summary was fair in setting out the arguments for and against the Manor and the Goscote becoming a trust. The result of the referendum was that 27,639 peope were opposed to opting out and only 6,004 were in favour. That is a pretty large majority, although the general manager of the local health authority said that it meant that only about 35 per cent. of people participated. In 1989, 35·9 per cent. of voters participated in the Euro-elections and in 1984 the figure was under 32 per cent. The referendum was not by any means a bad response and the manager's argument was weak. There is no doubt that if the vote had gone the other way, and if there had been overwhelming approval for the application for a self-governing trust, we should not have heard any criticism about the allegedly small number who responded.

By a majority vote, the local health authority decided to ignore the referendum. That did not show much recognition of the needs, opinions and preferences of the local population. The only ballot that I know of which was actually allowed by the health authority involved the consultants. At the Manor hospital, 30 consultants were opposed to opting out and 11 were in favour, despite strenuous canvassing by those who were promoting the trust. The unions at the two hospitals organised a ballot. They were not given much encouragement and it was difficult for them to carry out the ballot, but no one has suggested that it was not a fair vote. Of the staff at the hospitals, 401 opposed the trust and 94 were in favour of it. The Royal College of Nursing members held a ballot and, again, there was overwhelming rejection at the Manor and Goscote hospitals.

It would be wrong to force through such a deeply controversial scheme in the face of such hostility from the local community and from the large majority of medical and non-medical staff at the two hospitals. When the matter came before the regional health authority, which wrongly approved the proposal, note was taken of the extent of the objections, including that of the Walsall community health council. Apparently, under this Government and their arrangements for appointing people, the views of those who live in the borough and of the staff at the hospitals are simply ignored if they do not go the Government's way.

There is considerable doubt about the financial viability of a trust. Wrong assumptions in respect of public dividend capital may well result in the postponement of capital development and investment. For example, a new maternity unit is included in the current operational capital programme of the regional health authority. that new maternity unit will come to the borou future. But there is certainly no guarantee that not be postponed indefinitely if the trust do financially viable. Instead of opting out, unnecessary gambling with the health of the lo ity that it entails, we urgently need resources fo Service in the borough.

To maximise income and stay in business, t trust will sell services for the private sector at th National Health Service patients. One of the borough—and it may or may not be justified; Minister will tell us—is that long-stay patients illnesses will be among those to be treated borough. There is certainly a great deal of unc and, in my view, justified, concern about the general.

Time and again, Ministers tell us that opt nothing to do with privatisation and that the se hospitals will remain in the National Healt accept that that is so—certainly in the first ins believe that the proposals are a half-way hous to privatisation. That is probably the best sum Government's intentions. In my view, this righ Government have no real commitment to Service. The Health Service has remained in ex 1979 because it has the overwhelming sup country—Tory and Liberal voters as well, o Labour voters. The Government cannot simp and finish off the National Health Service by Nevertheless, they have strengthened the privat kept the NHS short of funds, as well as intr opting-out proposal, which, as I have said, is house to privatisation. All those measures have at eroding and undermining the National Hea The Minister may say that that is just Labou view, but it would appear that it is also the vie number of people in the country.

There is no doubt that the proposal is deeply in the borough; I do not think that the M question that. Whenever local residents or h have been given the opportunity to vote, decisively rejected the proposal. The Minister the Secretary of State this: if the proposal is so and if it gambles, as it undoubtedly will, with t the people of the area, why go ahead with it? W with a totally doctrinaire policy which is not which is irrelevant to the health of the people? I there is a statement on Tuesday, we shall hear although I doubt it. I can only cross my finge that by next week we shall hear that the applicati rejected.

2.44 pm

Mr. Bruce George (Walsall, South) rose——

Mr. Deputy Speaker (Mr. Harold Walker): hon. Gentleman have the consent of the hon. Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) and the Ministe

Mr. Winnick: Yes.

Mr. Dorrell: Yes.

Mr. George: I am grateful to my hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) for l few minutes.

[Mr. George]

For many years, we campaigned for a new district general hospital in Walsall. The hospital was opened just a few months ago at the end of that long campaign. Within days, we heard that, as a result of the Government's ideologically driven campaign, the hospital was to be removed from local control and handed over to politically motivated administrators.

The essence of the proposal has been driven ideologically from London and it has been supported locally by a handful of people, most of whom are administrators, who will benefit from the transfer of the hospital from local health authority control to the new trust. I am not suggesting that there is anything illegal about the process. However, many years ago Aneurin Bevan accused the consultants of being motivated against the Health Service. It is said that he resolved the problem by stuffing their mouths with silver or gold. It appears today that the administrators are stuffing silver and gold in their own mouths.

There is no support for the proposal locally. As my hon. Friend said, consultants, doctors, trade unions, the community health council, a survey by the Walsall Observer and the local referendum all show that the proposal is supported only by a minority of the local community. The consultation has been bogus. It was a frivolous act to give the impression of wide approval that does not exist. It is important that we see the results of the consultation. Let us know how many people or organisations wrote in. We would then learn why the Government want to go ahead with the proposal: a semi-privatised status which, as my hon. Friend said, is merely a transit camp to a full-blown system of privatisation, is ideologically conducive to the Government.

Ultimately the most important poll will take place in six months, a year or perhaps two years. If the Labour party is elected, I am certain that there will be genuine consultation. If the majority of the population want this nonsense to be perpetuated, I believe that we should acquiesce. However, if they are not in favour of the proposal, it should be thrown on to the rubbish heap where it belongs. It is important that our local campaign continues to expose the self-interest of those concerned. I welcome my hon. Friend's initiative in initiating this debate.

2.46 pm

The Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health (Mr. Stephen Dorrell): The hon. Member for Walsall, North (Mr. Winnick) speculated about the effect of the change of Prime Minister. He wondered whether the new Prime Minister would carry on what he described as the same "doctrinaire" policies as his predecessor. I am pleased to be able to assure the House that I have absolute confidence that my right hon. Friend the new Prime Minister will indeed carry on the doctrinaire commitment to the National Health Service of his predecessor. I am pleased to confirm that we shall continue the programme of reinforcing the National Health Service and providing it with growing resources. We will continue to carry through the programme of reforms of the Health Service's administration to ensure that we can secure better quality health care for the patient and better value for money for the taxpayer from the expenditure, which is growing in real terms.

The hon. Member for Walsall, North insisted on using the phrase "opting out" because he regarded the policy of the establishment of NHS trusts as a halfway house to privatisation. That is explicitly not the purpose of trust status. Any hospital or other unit which becomes an NHS trust will remain an integral part of the National Health Service.

The difference between a trust and a directly managed unit is simply one of the style and system of management of that unit within the National Health Service. The question is whether a unit is more effectively managed as a self-contained trust more responsible for its own future or whether it is better managed within the context of a local health authority that is also the purchaser of health care in that locality.

Perhaps I may begin by going into a little detail on why we have introduced the concept of trust status and what its purpose is. In any discussion of the management of the National Health Service, which is all that we are talking about, it is important to be clear about the central purpose of the National Health Service. I am very clear about that: it is to ensure that health care is available to every citizen on the basis of need, not of ability to pay. The National Health Service should exist to enable any citizen who needs it to gain access to the health care that he needs, and the process of running a hospital should be clearly secondary to the priority for NHS managers, which is to ensure that their resident population can secure the health care that they need.

That is why, after next April, the primary function of district health authorities will be defined as the purchasing of health care on behalf of their resident population rather than the running of hospitals. The traditional model of managing the Health Service can be characterised—perhaps even caricatured, but none the less informatively caricatured—by the health authority having to build a hospital, open the doors and treat the patients who came in through the doors.

The result of that policy is that the articulate and well-organised—perhaps the middle class—are the ones who have been able to get the health care that they need, and too often the needs of the inarticulate and the disorganised sections of the community have not been sufficiently met. By imposing on the purchaser authority the obligation to think about the health care needs of every resident of its area, we are consciously creating a "pressure cooker" device that is designed to ensure that the health care needs of every resident of a district are met and addressed by the health authority.

The purchaser function of the health authority is the important function within the NHS. The function of managing the hospital is, of course, important, but it is secondary to the primary purpose of ensuring that every resident and every citizen of this country has access to the health care that he or she needs. That is why I regard the process of applying for trust status and of giving trust status where we feel that the quality of management and the financial security and so forth justify it are a step forward. It distinguishes the primary purpose of the National Health Service—the enabling function—from the secondary purpose, which is the function of running hospitals.

Mr. Winnick: Why are all the national medical bodies totally opposed? Are we really to believe that the British Medical Association, the Joint Consultants Committee and the Royal College of Nursing are not fully committed to ensuring patient care? They are all opposed. The Minister is reading from a brief on Government policy. He is a well-known wet. Whether those are his views, one does not know, but of course he has ministerial responsibilities. Why not listen to the people? The people had an opportunity in my borough—I have quoted the vote. Why should they be simply ignored and rejected with contempt by the local health authority, the regional health authority, and possibly and unhappily even by the Secretary of State?

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman has asked me two questions. I do not know whether he has ever seen a Government brief. I assure him that Government briefs are not normally written like the papers in front of me. I am making my own speech, and nobody else's.

The hon. Gentleman asked how I account for the attitude of the BMA and professional bodies. I account for it in the same way as Aneurin Bevan no doubt did in 1948. They are conservative bodies that represent the status quo, and they have done so at every stage in the development of health care since the war. We are concerned about managing the Health Service to secure the social objective of providing health care on the basis of need, of ability to pay. Within the context of a health service in which I regard the primary purpose as——

Mr. Winnick: What about the people's voice?

Mr. Dorrell: I shall refer to the people's voice because I wish to talk about consultation later, but, before I do that, I stress that the NHS trust concept is part of the process of decentralising the management of hospitals and provider units in the NHS. The National Health Service is the largest employer in the world, with two exceptions—the Red Army and Indian railways, and I would not hold many bets on the Red Army for too much longer. The NHS is a vast organisation which, to ensure efficient management, must make sure that management authority and power is decentralised away from Whitehall towards the managers with the day-to-day job of running the units that deliver the health care. That is why, in the provider side of the NHS, no change will not be an option from next April.

We are setting up two new models of managing NHS hospitals. The first is a directly managed unit within the local authority with much more decentralised power than is traditional in the existing NHS model. The second is trust status, which simply takes one stage further the same logic as will be applied to the directly managed unit and the delegation of management power.

The process of delegation and decentralising power away from the centre of a vast bureaucracy towards the front line of management has been undertaken, often many times, by every big organisation in the rest of British society. I come from a business background. I do not regard the NHS as a business—it is not—but that does not mean that it cannot learn to deliver its objectives more efficiently from the experience of business. Every large British company has at least once—most of them several times—in the years since the NHS was set up, conducted a process of decentralising management power away from the centre, towards the front line, giving managers more authority over their own units and holding them to account for the way in which that authority is used. That is the logic that informs the NHS reforms and is carried through in the concept of NHS trust status.

The hon. Member for Walsall, North asked about consultation and described the consultation process which started when the trust applications were filed as a "charade". I reject that charge absolutely. The consultation process in which we have been engaged has been a serious exercise of gathering views about each individual application. The hon. Gentleman asked why we did not want to accept a public opinion poll on what should happen to a unit. The straight answer is that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State is accountable to the House for the way in which the National Health Service is managed and no hon. Member should seek to remove from him that responsibility. Therefore, the consultation process is, unashamedly, one of informing my right hon. Friend about the issues on which he has to decide and whether application for trust status holds out the prospects for better quality management as a trust or as a directly managed unit.

Mr. Winnick: I am grateful to the Minister, who has been kind enough to give way to me twice. Although the Secretary of State is answerable to the House, when making his decision, why should he not take into account the overwhelming rejection of the proposals, as shown by the figures that I quoted? The Minister denies that the consultation exercise is, as my hon. Friend the Member for Walsall, South (Mr. George) and I said, a farce and a charade. But why has not the result of the consultation exercise on the Manor and Goscote hospital been placed in the Library? I suspect that the reason is that it would prove what my hon. Friend and I have just said: that there was an overwhelming rejection of the proposal by those involved in the hospital and local residents. If that were not so, why should not the results of that consultation process have been placed in the Library, a few yards away from here?

Mr. Dorrell: When my right hon. Friend makes his decision about this application, along with the other 66 applications for trust status, and announces those decisions to the House, he will take account of all the evidence that he receives during the consultation process. He will also take account of the advice given to him from within the Department, which it has never been the practice of any Government to publish. If we were to publish the result of the consultation exercise without the internal advice available to my right hon. Friend, the House would have only half the available evidence——

Mr. Winnick: That is a weak excuse.

Mr. Dorrell: The hon. Gentleman describes it as a weak excuse, but it seems that if the House wants to know the evidence on which my right hon. Friend makes his decision, the House should see it all, not merely half of it.

The consultation is, quite properly, part of a process whereby Ministers consult, weigh the arguments—not just the numbers—and decide which applications to accept. I am old-fashioned enough to believe that Ministers will be held to account in the House for the way the decision goes. I look forward to being held to account by the hon. Member for Walsall, North for the improvement of health care that will flow to his constituents as a result of the Government's tenure of office.

Question put and agreed to.

Adjourned accordingly at one minute to Three o'clock.

Written Answers to Questions

Monday 19 November 1990

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

George Kenyon

Mr. Pike: To ask the Attorney-General what information he has regarding the decision of the Crown prosecution service not to proceed with the case against David Holt for the alleged manslaughter of George Kenyon on 24 May 1988.

The Attorney-General: The decision not to proceed with the case against David Holt for the alleged manslaughter of George Kenyon followed a review of the case against him after the case was committed for trial. The Crown prosecution service accepted the advice of leading counsel that there was not a realistic prospect of satisfying a jury beyond reasonable doubt that Mr. Holt was guilty of manslaughter. He was, however, prosecuted and convicted for the offence of operating a machine after a prohibition notice had been served.

I have written to the hon. Member with fuller details regarding the decision.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Attorney-General whether he has received any representations regarding the case against David Holt and Norman Holt for the alleged manslaughter of George Kenyon on 24 May 1988; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: Prior to receiving the hon. Member's question, I have received representations in correspondence from two hon. Members regarding the case against David Holt and Norman Holt for the alleged manslaughter of George Kenyon.

Immigration Appeals

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Attorney-General if he will list the immigration appellate authorities in the United Kingdom, together with the numbers of appeals considered by each of them in each of the past five years for which figures are available.

The Attorney-General: The information requested is set out in the table.

1. Cases[1] considered by Immigration Adjudicators

	Thanet House, London	Harmondsworth[2]	Birmingham	Leeds[3]	Manchester
1986[4]	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.	n.a.
1987	3,092	1,392	1,046	905	749
1988	3,335	2,016	1,181	926	778
1989	5,934	2,760	2,368	1,628	1,271
1990[5]	6,112	2,437	1,416	1,049	824

[1] Figures are only available for cases, which can consist of more than one appellant. Figures relate to cases allowed, dismissed and withdrawn.
[2] Includes hearings at Belfast and Cardiff.
[3] Includes hearings at Glasgow and Edinburgh.
[4] Immigration Adjudicators disposed of 8,483 cases in 1986, but a breakdown for the individual centres is not readily available.
[5] January–September

2. Cases[1] considered by the Immigration Appeal Tribunals[2]

	No.
1986	1,004
1987	1,127
1988	1,029
1989	706
1990[3]	614

[1] Figures are only available for cases, which can consist of more than one appellant. Figures relate to cases allowed, dismissed and withdrawn.
[2] The Immigration Appeal Tribunal sits at Thanet House, London.
[3] January–October.

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Attorney-General what provisions exist for bringing forward the dates of appeal hearings when there have been significant delays by foreign embassies in forwarding appeal papers for the immigration appellate authorities.

The Attorney-General: The immigration appellate authorities give full consideration to all applications made to them from either party for the early hearing of any appeal.

Multiple Share Applications

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Attorney-General (1) what representations he has received from (a) the Metropolitan police, (b) the Serious Fraud Office and (c) sponsor Departments for further computer runs to detect illegal multiple share applications in the privatisation of (a) British Gas, (b) British Airports, (c) British Airways, (d) British Steel and (e) the 10 regional water and sewerage companies;

(2) when he expects to see completed all inquiries into illegal multiple share applications in the privatisation of (a) British Gas, (b) British Airports, (c) British Airways, (d) British Steel and (e) the 10 regional water companies.

The Solicitor-General: The fraud investigation group of the Crown prosecution service has worked in liaison with the Metropolitan and City police commercial fraud squad to identify and investigate possible criminal offences arising out of multiple applications submitted in the course of the issue of shares for British Gas plc, British Airways plc, Rolls-Royce plc, British Airports Authorities plc and the 10 regional water companies. In each case they have had the assistance of a report by the auditors appointed for the issue by the sponsor Department. It is accompanied by computerised data. The majority of cases arising from the earlier issues have been concluded; most of those relating to the water privatisation issues remain outstanding.

It is, however, the practice of the CPS and the police when considering suspect cases relating to the water issue to examine all available data relating to earlier issues to ascertain whether any previous dealing by the suspect is revealed which may be relevant to either the evidential or public interest aspect of the decision whether to prosecute. The computerised data are held by the police and are freely accessible by them.

PRIME MINISTER

Community Charge and Electoral Registration

Mr. Madden: To ask the Prime Minister (1) what is her estimate, to the latest available date, of the total numbers of persons in (a) Scotland, (b) England and (c) Wales who have not registered their names in connection with the poll tax; and if she will make a statement;

(2) what action has been taken to warn people in Scotland, England and Wales of the implications of failure to register for poll tax purposes for the appearance of names on the electoral registers.

The Prime Minister: The community charges register and the electoral register are separate entities and are compiled with reference to different criteria and for different purposes. There is no question of anyone being denied the right to vote simply because their name does not appear on the community charges register. I refer the hon. Member to the full answer being given today to him on this subject by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary and to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Derbyshire, North-East (Mr. Barnes) on 15 November 1990 at column 703.

Malaysia

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Prime Minister if she will list all visits of Government Ministers or officials to Malaysia, with dates, since 1979.

The Prime Minister: I have visited Malaysia in April 1985, August 1988 and October 1989. Other ministerial visits, in the period since May 1979 are as follows:

1979
June Mr. Parkinson, Minister of State, Trade and Industry
June Lord Carrington, Secretary of State, FCO

1980
January Mr. Blaker, Minister of State, FCO
March Mr. Blaker, Minister of State, FCO
March Lord Carrington, Secretary of State, FCO

1981
January Lord Trenchard, Minister of State, Ministry of Defence
February Lord Ferrers, Minister of State, Agriculture
April Mr. Baker, Minister of State, Trade and Industry
September Mr. Rees, Minister of State, Trade and Industry
October Mr. Nott, Secretary of State, Defence

1982
February Lord Carrington, Secretary of State, FCO.

1983
Nil

1984
February Mr. Luce, Minister of State, FCO.
May Mr. Baker, Minister of State, Information.
August Lord Bellwin, Minister of State, DOE.

1985
July Mr. Channon, Minister of Trade.
September Mr. Lee, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State MOD.
November Mr. Heseltine, Secretary of State, MOD.

1986
February Mr. Lee, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State MOD.
June Mr. Lee, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State MOD.
June Mr. Renton, Minister of State, FCO.
September Mr. Patten, Minister of State, DOE.
October Mr. Jopling, Minister of Agriculture.

1987
March Mr. Younger, Secretary of State, MOD.
April Lord Hailsham, Lord Chancellor.
September Mrs. Chalker, Minister of State, FCO.

1988
March Mr. Younger, Secretary of State, MOD.
April Sir Geoffrey Howe, Secretary of State FCO.
October Mr. MacGregor, Minister of Agriculture.
October Mr. Sainsbury, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, MOD.
October Mr. Forth, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State DTI.
November Lord Glenarthur, Minister of State, FCO.

1989
February Mr. Atkins, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State, DTI.
March Mr. Atkins, Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State DTI.
April Mr. Younger, Secretary of State, MOD.
October Mr. Howard, Minister of State, DOE.
October Mr. Major, Secretary of State, FCO.

1990
January Lord Brabazon, Minister of State, FCO.
February Mr. Maude, Minister of State, FCO.

A record of visits by officials is available only at disproportionate cost.

Sub-post Offices

Mr. Maxwell-Hyslop: To ask the Prime Minister which Minister is responsible for decisions as to the rule governing liability of sub-post offices to the uniform business rate.

The Prime Minister: Policy on non-domestic rating including the valuation hypothesis used in determining rateable values which is set out in the Local Government Finance Act 1988, is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. The assessment of rateable values is undertaken by the Inland Revenue valuation office, responsibility for which rests with my right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

ENERGY

Electricity Companies

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what arrangements he has agreed for cost recovery by the electricity distribution companies for actions undertaken by them in response to directions from him under section 96 of the Electricity Act 1989 in connection with the outbreak of war in the Gulf;

(2) what discussions he has had with the Director General of Electricity Supply regarding the formal arrangements for cost recovery by the electricity distribution companies for complying with directions from him under section 96 of the Electricity Act or the Energy Act 1976 in the event of the outbreak of war in the Gulf.

Mr. Baldry: My Department has had discussions with the Office of Electricity Regulation on the subject of cost recovery in the event of electricity supply emergencies. I see no connection with the possibility of war in the Gulf.

There are no formal arrangements for cost recovery in the event of directions under the Energy Act 1976 or section 96(1)(b) of the Electricity Act 1989. The director general has said that in the event of such directions being given there would be a strong case for considering favourably a request from any company or companies affected for suspension or modification of particular licence requirements to allow them to recover costs necessarily incurred.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what policy considerations led him to conclude his agreement with the leading underwriters in the privatisation of the electricity distribution industry to insert a force majeure clause relating to the risk of war breaking out in the Gulf.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend decided that the satisfactory underwriting of the sale of shares in the 12 regional electricity companies required specific arrangements to deal with the particular risk of hostilities in the Gulf causing a fall in the market during the offer period. Failure to make such arrangements would, at best, have adversely increased the cost of underwriting and reduced the proceeds from the sale.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will insert a Gulf war risk warning on the advertisements for the flotation of the electricity distribution companies.

Mr. Baldry: The purpose of the advertising campaigns is to publicise the offers for sale of the 12 regional electricity companies. All such advertising contains a warning that shares can go down as well as up and the public should consult an appropriate professional financial adviser if they need advice.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what assessment he has made of the impact of a direction under section 96 of the Electricity Act on the profitability and cash flow of the 12 regional electricity companies.

Mr. Baldry: None.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet the 12 chairmen of the area boards to discuss emergency arrangements arising from a possible outbreak of war in the Gulf and its impact on electricity costs and prices and their companies' cash flow and profitability.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend and I meet the regional electricity company chairmen from time to time to discuss a wide range of issues.

Fuel Security Code

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met or next expects to meet the Director General of Electricity Supply to review the cost recovery and audit mechanisms in the fuel security code.

Mr. Baldry: I have not met, and have no plans to meet, the Director General of Electricity Supply for this purpose.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what discussions he has had in the last three weeks with the National Grid Company regarding the implementation of the fuel security code and of directions under section 96 of the Electricity Act.

Mr. Baldry: None.

Electricity Appliances (Retailing)

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) what discussions he has had with the 12 chairmen of area electricity boards regarding the sale of their appliance retailing chains and Government participation in the receipts thereof;

(2) what policy considerations led him to exempt sales of the appliance retailing chains from the property clawback arrangements in the privatisation of the electricity distribution companies.

Mr. Baldry: The regional electricity company—REC—prospectus includes relevant information on the retailing businesses including the directors' view of the prospects for those businesses. I expect to get appropriate value for the taxpayer for all parts of the RECs' business on flotation and see no reason why the Government should expect to participate in any subsequent disposal of the retailing business as a going concern.

Coal Supply Contracts

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he anticipates receiving a letter of comfort from the competition directorate of the European Commission regarding the exemption of the coal supply contracts between British Coal, National Power and PowerGen from article 85(3) of the treaty of Rome.

Mr. Baldry: The coal purchase contracts between British Coal and National Power and PowerGen were notified to the European Commission by British Coal. British Coal has received a letter from the Commission's directorate-general for competition indicating that it is preparing a draft decision for the Commission to exempt these agreements under article 85(3) of the treaty of Rome.

South Wales Small Mines Association

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy (1) when he next expects to announce the commencement of enhanced prices for coal produced by the members of the South Wales Small Mines Association, pursuant to his conditional letter of offer to the association dated 24 October;

(2) what response he will be making to the comments dated 30 October of the director of the competition directorate of the European Commission on his letter of offer of enhanced coal prices dated 24 October to the South Wales Small Mines Association.

Mr. Baldry: The offer made by National Power and British Coal to the South Wales Small Mines Association was set out in a paper handed to the association on 24

October at a meeting in my Department. The European Commission's view of the terms of this offer was conveyed in a letter dated 30 October addressed to the solicitors representing the association. I understand that members of the association have voted to reject the offer. It will now be for the Commission to reach a decision on the complaint made by the association which gave rise to the recent negotiations. My Department stands ready to provide the Commission with any further information or assistance it may need.

Sizewell B

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he last met and next expects to meet the chairman of Nuclear Electric to discuss the contract with the Non-Fossil Purchasing Agency on behalf of the regional electricity companies for purchasing electricity from the Sizewell B nuclear power station.

Mr. Baldry: This is a commercial matter and I have no plans to discuss it with the chairman of Nuclear Electric.

Renewable Energy

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next expects to meet the Director General of Electricity Supply to discuss the Director General of Electricity Supply's study into the environmental impact of renewables projects, pursuant to page 46 of the pathfinder prospectus for the flotation of the electricity distribution companies.

Mr. Baldry: The Director General of Electricity Supply's study of the environmental impact of renewables projects was made in the context of a review of the draft contracts submitted to him by the 12 regional electricity companies, and preparatory to advising the Secretary of State on the appropriate level of the first renewables order. As I informed the House on 30 October, Official Report, columns 443-44, my right hon. Friend set the level of the renewables order—SI 1990 No. 1859—in accordance with the director general's advice. In these circumstances my right hon. Friend has no plans further to discuss the director general's advice with him.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects to make a further non-fossil fuel obligation order in respect of projects involving renewable energy sources.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend intends to bring forward the first additional renewables tranche of the non-fossil fuel obligation next year.

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he next intends to introduce an order under the Electricity Act in respect of permitted generating capacity from renewable energy sources.

Mr. Baldry: My right hon. Friend intends to bring forward the first additional order for the non-fossil fuel obligation in respect of renewables next year.

Non-Fossil Fuel Obligation

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what action he is taking to review the basis on which the Director General of Electricity Supply determined the inclusion of particular schemes in the non-fossil fuel obligation.

Mr. Baldry: The object of the director general of the schemes submitted to him was to assess whe were likely to be capable of being qualifying arran under the provisions of section 33 of the Electr 1989, for the purpose of the renewables order Secretary of State proposed to make. The Gov have no plans to amend those provisions.

Non-Fossil Purchasing Agency

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State fo when he next expects to meet the 12 chairme regional electricity companies to discuss a strengt the role of Non-Fossil Purchasing Agency, pur page 135 of the pathfinder prospectus for the flo the regional electricity companies.

Mr. Baldry: The NFPA is the agent of the 12 electricity companies, and this is therefore a m them.

Nuclear Power Stations

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of Energy if he will make a statement on the life ex of Calder Hall and Chapelcross nuclear power

Mr. Baldry: This is an operational matter fo Nuclear Fuels plc—BNFL—subject to an requirements stipulated by the Health an Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate—N report on British Nuclear Fuels plc's long-ter review of Calder Hall and Chapelcross, publish Health and Safety Executive on 23 April, the installations inspectorate concluded that the would be safe to operate until each reactor is 40 subject to British Nuclear Fuels plc's com programme of work and to satisfactory results regular test and inspection programme required licensing system enforced by the nuclear ins inspectorate. The oldest reactor will reach 40 yea the youngest in 1999.

I understand that it is British Nuclear Fuels pl to continue to operate Calder Hall and Chap long as the stations remain safe and it is econo company believes continued operation beyon years assumed in the present nuclear ins inspectorate assessment could be economically ju will consider a further major safety review to su view at the appropriate time.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prison Officers

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for Department how many women prison officers w prisons in England and Wales hold the rank of officer; and if he will list the prisons.

Mrs. Rumbold: There are 40 female principa serving in the following prisons:

Askham Grange
Bullwood Hall
Cookham Wood
Drake Hall
Feltham
Full Sutton
Garth

Hatfield
Hindley
Holloway
Leeds
Low Newton
The Mount
Nottingham
Risley
Rochester
Styal
Wetherby

Prisons

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the action that his Department has taken in any prison in England and Wales for which he has received a report from the inspector of prisons; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: Since 1980 Her Majesty's chief inspector of prisons has made more than 130 reports to my right hon. and learned Friend on prison establishments in England and Wales. Information about action to implement the recommendations in these reports on individual establishments is set out in the statement we issue when the report is published, copies of which are placed, with the reports themselves, in the Library. Each one is followed up by prison service operational directors and subsequent developments are reported to the chief inspector.

Police Complaints Authority

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what are the numbers and types of complaint to the Police Complaints Authority in 1989 which relate solely or primarily to Waltham Forest.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The London borough of Waltham Forest lies within the Metropolitan police No. 1 area. Table 5 at appendix C of the Police Complaints Authority's 1989 annual report, a copy of which is in the Library, gives an analysis of the numbers and types of complaints dealt with by the authority in relation to No. 1 area. Figures which relate solely to Waltham Forest are not available.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people are serving on the Police Complaints Authority; how, and on what basis, they are appointed; and whether any are (a) women, (b) from black and ethnic minority communities and (c) people with disabilities.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The Police Complaints Authority currently comprises 15 members, including the chairman and two deputy chairmen. All the members, aside from the chairman, are appointed by my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary following a careful selection procedure. The chairman is appointed by Her Majesty the Queen. The normal term of appointment is for three years in the first instance.

Of the 15 members, two are women, three are from ethnic minority backgrounds and none is disabled.

Sentences

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department which areas have (a) the greatest and (b) the lowest percentage of people sentenced at magistrates courts to receive prison sentences; what are the percentages in each area; and what is the pecentage in Waltham Forest.

Mr. John Patten: The information is given in the table.

This information is published annually in volume 5 of the criminal statistics, England and Wales, supplementary tables, copies of which are in the Library.

Petty sessional divisions with the highest and lowest percentage of persons sentenced to immediate custody 1989

Petty sessional division	Highest percentage
Ardudwy-uwch-Artro[1]	21
Ashton-under-Lyne	21
Waltham Forest	8

Petty sessional division	Lowest percentage
Brigg[1]	0
Buckingham[1]	0
Bulmer West[1]	0
Caistor[1]	0
Carmarthen North[1]	0
Crickhowell[1]	0
Cricklade	0
Cullompton	0
Diss[1]
Eccleshall[1]	0
Everley and Pewsey[1]	0
Gilling East[1]	0
Gogledd Preseli[1]
Hailsham	0
Hallikeld[1]	0
Hang East[1]	0
Holme Beacon[1]	0
Howdenshire[1]	0
Ilminster	0
Isles of Scilly[1]	0
Lambeth[1]	0
Llandrindod Wells[1]	0
Llanidloes[1]	0
Lutterworth[1]	0
Machynlleth[1]	0
Malmesbury[1]	0
Mansion House Justice Room[1]	0
Market Rasen[1]	0
Marlborough[1]	0
Middle Holderness[1]	0
Newtown	0
Plympton	0
Rhayader[1]	0
Rutland	0
Ryedale[1]	0
Saxmundham	0
South Holderness[1]	0
South Molton[1]	0
Stow	0
Swaffham	0
Talgarth[1]	0
Tisbury and Mere[1]	0
Usk[1]	0

Petty sessional division	Lowest percentage
Westbury	0
West London (Walton Street)	0
Whorwellsdown[1]	0
Wincanton[1]	0
Witon Beacon[1]	0

[1] Fewer than 50 people sentenced at the magistrate's court.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the membership of the Animal Procedures Committee, indicating which members have previously held licences to conduct animal experiments, and which have previously been or are currently employed by organisations which undertake such experiments.

Mrs. Rumbold: The membership of the Animal Procedures Committee as at 15 November 1990 is as follows:

Lord Nathan, MA Hon. LLD (Chairman)

Dr. Michael Balls, MA DPhil—Reader in Medical Cell Biology, University of Nottingham; Chairman, Trustees of the Fund for the Replacement of Animals in Medical Experiments (FRAME).

Mr. Edward Bernard, FIAT—Chairman, Serotec Ltd.

Professor Margaret Brazier, LLB—Professor of Law, University of Manchester.

Professor Barry Bridges, BSc MD—Professor of Histology, Queen's University, Belfast.

Dr. Roger Brimblecombe, PhD DSc FRCPath FIBiol—Consultant, Smith Kline and Beecham Laboratories.

Dr. Fiona Broughton Pipkin, MA DPhil—Reader in Reproductive Physiology, Queen's Medical Centre, Nottingham.

Mr. Henry Carter, MRCVS—Senior Vice President, Royal College of Veterinary Surgeons.

Professor Anthony Dayan, MD FRCP FRCPath FIBiol—Professor of Toxicology, St. Bartholomew's Hospital.

Mr. Roger Ewbank, OBE MVSc FIBiol MRCVS—Director, Universities Federation for Animal Welfare (UFAW).

Dr. Judith Hampson, BSc PhD—Consultant in animal welfare.

Mr. Clive Hollands—Secretary, Committee for the Reform of Animal Experimentation (CRAE).

Sir Andrew Huxley, OM FRS—Past President, Royal Society.

Dr. Susan Iversen, MA PHd—Director of Behavioural Pharmacology, Merck, Sharp and Dohme Research Laboratories.

Professor John Ledingham, DM FRCP—Professor of Medicine, University of Oxford.

Dr. Brian Newbould, BPharm FPS PhD MCPP—Director, International Research Affairs, ICI Corporate R and T.

Professor Onora O'Neill, MA PhD—Professor of Philosophy, University of Essex.

Professor Thomas Pilkington, MD FRCP—Emeritus Professor of Medicine, St. George's Hospital Medical School.

Professor Lord Soulsby, MA PhD DVSM AM DSc MRCVS—Professor of Animal Pathology, University of Cambridge.

Professor Michael Spyer, DSc—Professor of Physiology, Royal Free Hospital Medical School.

Professor Peter Venables, BA PhD DSc FBPsS—Emeritus Professor of Psychology, University of York.

For the reasons set out in my reply to a question from the hon. Member on 12 November at columns i our practice not to provide information wh identify those involved in animal procedures.

Affiliation Orders

Mr. Fraser: To ask the Secretary of State for Department how many affiliation orders h granted in each of the last three years.

Mr. John Patten: Affiliation orders ceased to from 31 March 1989 and orders for financial pro now granted under the amended Guardianship Act 1971. Information for the period before su were abolished is given in the table.

Affiliation orders granted

Year	Number
1987	10,580
1988	11,410
1989[1]	3,570

[1] 1 January 1989 to 31 March 1989.

DEFENCE

Service Men

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for he will provide for each year the number of se who leave the armed services and subsequently time lapse and the reasons, where known, for le returning in each case.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Apart from the figures in the table for non-commissioned male perso rejoined in the last 10 years, having previously the armed forces, the information requested is available and could be obtained only at disprop cost.

Year of re-entry	Royal Navy[1]	Royal Marines[2]	Army[3]	Royal Air Force[4]
1980-81	339	74	1,052	167
1981-82	128	29	98	44
1982-83	130	17	48	41
1983-84	104	8	155	146
1984-85	53	15	179	84
1985-86	50	17	186	108
1986-87	82	15	213	103
1987-88	121	14	213	105
1988-89	70	9	254	95
1989-90	81	7	376	138

[1] The Royal Navy count as re-entrants only personne complete 22 years pensionable service.

[2] The Royal Marines count as re-entrants only pe could complete their engagement of 9, 14 or 2 appropriate.

[3] The Army count as re-entrants only personnel w reserve liabilities ie "rejoining reservists".

[4] The Royal Air Force count as re-entrants only pe were in the Service on full duty in the 5 years prior

Nuclear Weapons (Germany)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State fo what agreements exist with the German G covering basing arrangements in Germany for p future nuclear weapons.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The 1954 "Presence of Foreign Forces Convention" (Cmd 9617) provides the legal basis for the presence of all British forces in Germany, apart from Berlin.

Cascaded Equipment

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) if he will give details of the costs to the NATO infrastructure fund of transporting cascaded equipment; and what the United Kingdom proportion of this will be;

(2) if he will give details of the NATO cascade programme of equipment limited under the prospective CFE treaty;

(3) what is the cost to Britain of cascading equipment.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given to the hon. Member for Woolwich (Mr. Cartwright) on 14 March 1990 at column 290. The alliance is still examining the opportunities for transferring surplus equipment to other nations and the extent to which the costs incurred can be met from NATO common funding. No decisions have been taken and we do not yet know what costs, if any, may fall to the United Kingdom. The United Kingdom currently contributes 12 per cent. of the costs of the NATO infrastructure programme.

Air-to-Surface Missiles

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence (1) whether the agreements in START differentiating strategic from tactical air-to-surface missiles have any relevance to United Kingdom policy on TASM; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if the United Kingdom will limit the range of its proposed tactical air-to-surface missile so that it will not be defined as strategic according to current START rules.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The START negotiations are bilateral between the United States and the Soviet Union; British nuclear forces would, therefore, not be included in any agreement. Our choice of a TASM will be guided by the need to retain a credible and effective deterrent capability.

Trident

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether there has been any change in the Government's financial arrangements for the leasing of Trident D5 missiles.

Mr. Alan Clark: The United Kingdom is not leasing Trident D5 missiles; it is purchasing them outright. The financial arrangements for their purchase remain unchanged.

HMS Challenger

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what was the cost of the 85 tonne crane installed in HMS Challenger, including structural alterations to the ship.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: A 30 tonne crane was fitted into HMS Challenger in September 1990. The acquisition and installation costs are commercial-in-confidence.

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence why a new 85 tonne crane was installed in HMS Challenger a few weeks before the ship was to be sold to commercial interests; and whether the cost of this crane and its installation will be fully reflected in the price being sought from prospective purchasers.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The crane had been bought some time before the decision was taken to decommission HMS Challenger. The Ministry of Defence will naturally endeavour to obtain the most competitive price possible for the ship from prospective purchasers.

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what steps he will take to ensure that the decision to dispose of HMS Challenger at the end of the current year will not adversely affect the security of the United Kingdom's strategic nuclear deterrent.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: The disposal of HMS Challenger will not adversely affect the security of the United Kingdom's strategic nuclear deterrent.

HMS Churchill

Mr. Speed: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much has been spent to date on refitting HMS Churchill at Rosyth dockyard and over what period of time; and how much work would have to be done to allow the submarine's return to the active fleet.

Mr. Kenneth Carlisle: I refer my hon. Friend to the answers given by my hon. Friend the Minister of State for the Armed Forces to the hon. Member for Clackmannan (Mr. O'Neill) on 15 November, Official Report, columns 195-98.

Malaysia (Equipment Sales)

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list the dates on which all contracts for sales of military equipment from Britain to Malaysia were signed since 1979 and the date on which the exports were authorised.

Mr. Alan Clark: It has been the consistent policy of successive Administrations not to provide details of defence exports to specific countries.

Forces in Europe Treaty

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the limits imposed by the conventional forces in Europe treaty on the United Kingdom's holdings of treaty-limited equipment.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The CFE treaty imposes ceilings on the holdings of certain types of equipment by each group of states. It obliges the members of each group to agree a division of these collective ceilings among themselves, and to notify the other parties. The allocations thus agreed for each nation can thereafter be increased with the consent of other members of the same group. As a result of consultations with our alliance partners, we have agreed the following allocations for the United Kingdom, to apply once the reductions necessitated by the treaty have been completed:

	Number
Battle Tanks	1,015
Artillery	630
Armoured Combat Vehicles	3,170

	Number
Combat Aircraft	900
Attack Helicopters	384

Mr. Arbuthnot: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will give details of the numbers and types of United Kingdom equipment covered by the conventional forces in Europe treaty and their location.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The information requested is as follows:

Type	United Kingdom	Elsewhere[1]	Total[2]
Battle Tanks
Chieftain	244	508	752
Challenger	44	364	408
Centurion	11	27	38
Total	299	899	1,198
Artillery
M107	4	33	37
M110	1	15	16
M109	8	101	109
FH70	68	—	68
Abbot	18	133	151
105 Lt Gun	167	13	180
5·5" Howitzer	9	—	9
Pack Howitzer	52	—	52
MLRS	6	8	14
Total	333	303	636
Armoured Combat Vehicles
FV432	180	1,060	1,240
FV432 Rarden	1	12	13
Humber	274	39	313
Saracen	121	45	166
Spartan	254	278	532
Saxon	291	11	302
Saladin	1	12	13
Scorpion	173	115	288
Warrior	115	211	326
Total	1,410	1,783	3,193
Combat Aircraft
Buccaneer	62	—	62
Canberra	50	—	50
Harrier	94	30	124
Hunter	34	—	34
Jaguar	136	—	136
Lightning	1	—	1
Phantom	97	28	125
Tornado	214	96	310
Total	688	154	842
Attack Helicopters
Gazelle	128	65	193
Lynx	56	53	109
Scout	66	—	66
Total	250	118	368

[1] Almost entirely Germany, but some small numbers in Belgium, Gibraltar and Cyprus.

[2] Includes equipment deployed to the Gulf area.

A copy of the full United Kingdom CFE data declaration has been placed in the Library of the House.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Polly Peck International

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary
Trade and Industry whether he has now decide a report on the affairs of Polly Peck Internatio he will investigate the role of the Serious Fra this matter; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood [holding answer 12 Novembe right hon. Friend is in touch with the Serious and with the administrators of Polly Peck Inte both of whom are conducting investigations come to light in the course of those inves otherwise which need investigating under the Act rather than by the Serious Fraud Office hesitate to investigage them.

The Serious Fraud Office is accountable director to the Attorney-General and to Parl

Trade Barriers

Mr. Oppenheim: To ask the Secretary of St and Industry to what extent EEC or na barriers of all types relating to products from central Europe have been reduced in the las

Mr. Lilley [holding answer 15 November signing of bilateral trade and economic agreements between the EC and the U Czechoslovakia, Bulgaria and Romania ove months, following earlier agreements with Hungary, completed a framework for co-operation with the countries of central Europe. Agreements include a timetab elimination and suspension of quantita restrictions by the EEC on industrial agricultural imports from these countr arrangements on MFA and ECSC products a separate bilateral arrangements.

The liberalisation measures provided co-operation agreements have been accele initiative of the EEC under its aid programm and eastern Europe—PHARE. As a result measures have been taken by the EEC.

With effect from 1 January 1990, all quant restrictions were liberalised or suspended for Poland and Hungary and limited duty-free acce by conferring general system of preferences st countries for five years:

With effect from 1 October 1990 all quant restrictions which discriminated against produ trading countries were suspended for Czechoslovakia.

The PHARE programme also provides exports to the Community of MFA pr Czechoslovakia, Hungary and Poland. In D a bilateral textile agreement was signed betw and USSR which provided for greater acc textiles to Community markets.

The bilateral arrangements on expor products from central and eastern Europ relaxed as part of the process to phase out these measures by March 1992.

All EEC trade restrictions which appl goods were liberalised as part of the Germ process.

Advanced Technology

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if his Department has been invited to contribute to the symposium on European collaboration in advanced technology, organised by the Institute of European Trade and Technology, to be held in London on 16 November.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 16 November 1990]: Yes. My Department has regular contacts with the Institute of European Trade and Technology and an official from my Department addressed this symposium on European opportunities for United Kingdom industry.

ESPRIT

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what contribution was made by his Department to the conference on the European Communities ESPRIT programme, organised by ECCO at the Brussels congress centre from 12 to 15 November.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 16 November 1990]: The ESPRIT conference in Brussels was organised by the European Commission and provides an opportunity for existing and potential participants in this European Community research and development programme to obtain information on ESPRIT. My officials took part in the conference and will continue to bring opportunities for participation to the attention of United Kingdom industry.

Cosmetic Products

Mr. Win Griffiths: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make it his policy to ensure that all cosmetic products have their ingredients listed in full on the packaging in order to protect people with skin allergies.

Mr. Leigh [holding answer 16 November 1990]: European Commission is about to publish proposals full ingredient labelling of cosmetics throughout European Community. I will consider them when they published.

Cellacast

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade Industry if he will take steps urgently to investigate health implications of the use of Cellacast; and if he make a statement.

Mr. Dorrell: I have been asked to reply.

A research assessment of splinting materials of this was carried out for the Department by a team from Sal university who reported in 1989. Their conclusion was synthetic bandages are unlikely to cause a problem to ei operators or patients unless cast removal is being formed for protracted periods in a particularly confi and unventilated environment. In the latter case, use of extraction equipment must be considered prudent.

WALES

Housing, Dwyfor

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales w has been the total expenditure in Dwyfor district on hou renovation and repair of (a) local authority housing st and (b) private sector accommodation, in each of the five years; and what is the projected expenditure recognised by his Department for 1990-91 and 1991-92

Mr. Grist: The information requested is given in following table. Information for 1991-92 is not available.

£,0

	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88	1988-89	1989-90	1990-91[1]
Gross renovation of local authority dwellings	59	101	54	275	444	500
Gross renovation grants to the private sector	377	665	526	461	713	1,173

[1] Local authority forecast.

Passengers

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his estimate of the numbers of passengers per annum carried by (a) bus, (b) rail, (c) private car and (d) aircraft in Wales in each of the years from 1985 to date; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The information requested is given in the following tables:

Passengers carried, by mode of transport

(a) Bus and coach[1]

	Passenger journeys (million)
1985-86	209
1986-87	196
1987-88	209
1988-89	215

Source: Welsh Transport Statistics.

[1] Data available by financial year only.

(b) Aircraft

	Passengers handled at terminals[1]
1985	388,651
1986	489,385
1987	632,339
1988	621,046
1989	697,800

Source: Welsh Transport Statistics.

[1] Includes all arrivals at and departures from Welsh termi except transit passengers.

Current information is not available for rail or priv car passengers, but a national travel survey conducte 1985-86 by the Department of Transport showed that numbers of journeys made within the Principality person per week were as follows:

	Number
Rail	0·15
Bus and coach	1·21
Car and taxi	9·31
Other	3·16
TOTAL	13·83

Food Industry (Training)

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what measures he is proposing to improve the training of those involved in the food industry in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: A consultation document on hygiene training for food handlers was issued in December 1989 and the comments received are currently being assessed. The Government intend to issue the relevant regulations in due course.

Retail Sales

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what information he has on the percentage change in retail sales in Wales for each of the last four quarters; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Information is not available in the form requested.

Ministerial Advisers

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, further to his reply of 13 November, Official Report, column 106, whether he will review his policy with regard to the appointment of special advisers who have previously been parliamentary candidates; and whether he will make a statement on the operation of his current policy.

Sir Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend has nothing to add to the answer given to the hon. Gentleman on 13 November.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

EC Measures

Dame Elaine Kellett-Bowman: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list to the most recent available date the number of measures agreed by the EEC and not yet passed into legislation by each of the member states, in rank order.

Mr. Garel-Jones: Figures on the records of individual EC member states in implementing all EC directives are unfortunately not centralised. However, the Commission keeps centralised figures on the implementation of the proposals contained in the original White Paper for a single market. The latest Commission report, produced in October shows that of 107 measures due to be implemented by end 1990, the following measures remained unimplemented in the member states:

	number
Denmark	15
United Kingdom	18
Germany	20
Portugal
Spain
France
Ireland
Belgium
Netherlands
Luxembourg
Greece
Italy

Further details are given in the Depa and Industry's document, "The Single M on Commission White Paper", which is Library of the House.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES A

Salmon

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Minister Fisheries and Food if he will estimate (a salmon available for sale in the United 1970, (ii) 1980 and (iii) 1989 and (b) f years, what percentage of salmon were (i) caught in offshore waters and (iii) from

Mr. Curry: The information requested in the level of detail sought. The total a available for sale in the United Kingdom farmed and imported fish of a variety of s Pacific, and so on. It is not possible to how much of the total domestic—Atlanti offered for sale; further, records of impo not subdivided by number or species.

Comprehensive statistics of wild reported as caught by rod, net and tra annually by the Fisheries Departments available in the Libraries of the House. possible to provide an estimate of the in catches of Atlantic salmon. These are:

	Inland (tonnes)
1970	1,191
1980	934
[1]1989	817

[1]provisional figure

Figures for estimated United Kingdom salmon production are:

	(t 1970
1980
1989

Figures for the total United Kingdom chilled and frozen salmon—all species—

	(t 1970
1980
[1]1989

[1]provisional figure

Bananas

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what estimates are available of the number of bananas from the Windward Islands and Jamaica that would be bought in the United Kingdom if no trade preferences for those countries existed.

Mr. Curry: None. Our objective is an effective preferential arrangement after 1992, which will enable a continuing flow of bananas from the Caribbean, in line with the Community's commitments under the Lomé convention.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when a decision is likely to be taken in the European Community on trade arrangements for bananas after 1992; and by whom.

Mr. Curry: We cannot say when a decision will be taken as no proposals have yet come forward from the European Commission. The decision will be taken by the Council of Ministers.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proposals have been put forward by the European Community Commission on preferences for imports of bananas from the Windward Islands and Jamaica after 1992.

Mr. Curry: None.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether the United Kingdom's position on trade preferences for imports of bananas from the Windward Islands and Jamaica after 1992 has changed since Her Majesty's Government's discussion paper was produced.

Mr. Curry: The Government continue to believe that the framework set out in that discussion paper provides the best means yet identified for balancing the different interests that would be affected by common arrangements for bananas. Discussions of the best way forward continue with all interested parties.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Exports

Mr. Livingstone: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer if he will give the annual figure for exports of goods and services, expressed in current price terms, as a percentage of gross domestic product since 1979 and for the first half of 1990; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Information relating to the export of goods and services—current prices—as a proportion of gross domestic product can be found in table 1.2 of the 1990 edition of the CSO's "United Kingdom National Accounts" publication—the Blue Book—and in table B of the CSO's quarterly "Gross Domestic Product" press notice. Copies of both are available in the Library of the House or alternatively the data can be found on the CSO database which can be accessed through the Library.

Debt

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exc whether he has received any representations to assist and finance houses in respect of increased indebt resulting from property prices; and if he will m statement.

Mr. Maples: My right hon. Friend receives repr tions from various sources about a range of subject run-up to the Budget.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exc what information he has on the levels of (a) person and (b) company sector debt in 1988, 1989, 19 estimated for 1991; and what assessment he has m the reasons for the changes in level.

Mr. Maples: Figures for the debt or financial lia of the personal sector and industrial and comm companies are available up until the end of 1989 These data are set out in table 12.2 and 12.3 of "U Kingdom National Accounts"—the CSO Blue Book edition.

Revenue

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Chancellor of the Exche he will list for each year since 1979 (a) the tot revenue and (b) the total of all income to the Exc since 1979; and if he will also list it on the basis of (i and (ii) 1989 prices.

Mr. Norman Lamont: Information as is n available is included on the CSO database in the foll series—identified by their database code:

ATAB:
general government: total taxes (excluding comm charge) and royalties.

ATAF:
general government receipts.

DJDT:
implied GDP (at market prices) deflator.

The database can be accessed on line by the Ho Commons Library.

Taxation

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Chancellor o Exchequer if he will make a statement setting out ( changes in policy which would require to be made b Majesty's Government, (b) the restrictions on the fre of action in tax decision making and (c) the impact tax levels and on the zero rate if the various pro relating to indirect tax harmonisation and Comm statistics were approved by the Council of Ministe

Mr. Ryder: (a) The policy implications o European Commission proposals covering indire harmonisation and intra-Community trade statisti detailed in the explanatory memoranda submitted b Customs and Excise and the Central Statistical respectively. Copies of the memoranda are available Library of the House.

(b) The proposals would require approximati both VAT and excise duties; this would of c constrain our fiscal decisions.

(c) The Commission's revised VAT approxim proposals suggest an unspecified minimum standar and a reduced rate of 4 to 9 per cent; for excises there are various proposals according to product category, for minimum rates or rate bands to be applied from 1 January 1993, and target rates to be achieved thereafter. The proposed rates would have a significant impact on United Kingdom rate levels and revenue; details are again given in the explanatory memoranda.

With regard to zero rates, the Commission's revised thinking of May 1989 accepted that these could be retained under certain circumstances; although the present VAT technical proposals do not include an arrangement to carry forward the legal base for zero rates after 1992. We would not, of course, agree to any proposals which would restrict our ability to retain a zero rate.

The Government have always made it clear that they do not consider centrally determined tax approximation to be necessary for the completion of the single market or desirable for the differing economic circumstances of member states. As adoption of the Commission proposals would require the unanimous agreement of member states, the United Kingdom's position is safeguarded.

Coinage

Mr. Hanley: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer when the old 5p coin will be demonetised following the introduction of the new 5p coin.

Mr. Maples: The old 5p coin will be demonetised and cease to be legal tender after 31 December 1990. Although it will not be possible for the general public to spend old 5p coins after that date, it will still be possible to return them by paying them in through the high street banks for a limited period.

Ministerial Advisers

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer (1) what general guidelines are issued for setting the salaries of personal ministerial advisers;

(2) whether the salary guidelines in connection with the appointment of ministerial personal advisers include annual uprating by reference to the retail prices index;

(3) whether he will review the guidelines for the salaries paid to personal ministerial advisers to ensure earnings as advisers do not exceed earnings in previous employment;

(4) what are the guidelines for setting salaries for Ministers' personal advisers, where those appointed were previously self-employed.

Mr. Ryder [holding answer 16 November 1990]: There is a pay spine for ministerial special advisers. The starting point on that spine for each adviser is assessed primarily by reference to the individual's recent normal earnings: this is taken as evidence of the "market rate". There is flexibility to go above this exceptionally if there is evidence that an individual's recent earnings have been less than his or her normal market expectation or that the individual could have expected to increase his or her remuneration in the near future if they did not accept the appointment. These guidelines apply to all advisers, including those who were previously self-employed and I have no plans to revise them. The pay spine is revalued annually in line with the general increase in civil service pay.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Energy Efficiency

38. Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Lord President of the Council what energy efficiency steps have been taken in the House since 1 January.

Mr. MacGregor: Improving energy efficiency in the House is being achieved in three ways—by specific energy conservation projects, better housekeeping, and by incorporating energy conservation measures in the design of new facilities and major replacement programmes.

Members' Working Conditions

39. Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will pay a visit to the west cloisters in the Palance of Westminster to inspect working conditions for hon. Members.

Mr. MacGregor: I shall visit the west cloisters as soon as possible.

EC Standing Committees

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Lord President of the Council if he will make a statement concerning the establishment and operation of the new Standing Committees appointed to consider documents originating from the European Community.

Mr. MacGregor: Standing Order No. 102, as amended by the House on 24 October, provides for the establishment of three European Standing Committees from the start of this Session. These Committees will each have 10 members who will be appointed by the Committee of Selection for a whole Session. I hope that the nominations will take place shortly and that the European Standing Committees will be able to begin holding debates on EC documents as soon as possible thereafter.

Scottish Select Committee

Mr. Wallace: To ask the Lord President of the Council what representations he has received regarding the nomination of a Select Committee on Scottish Affairs.

Mr. MacGregor: I have received a number of such representations.

Members' Lounge

Mr. Tredinnick: To ask the Lord President of the Council what steps have been taken to replace the former Members' lounge adjacent to the Library corridor now occupied by the Labour party.

Mr. MacGregor: Although relocation of the facility provided by the room in question did not form part of the Accommodation and Administration Sub-Committee's deliberations when approval was given for a change of use, it is understood that it will be considered in the context of accommodation becoming available in the House as a result of moves to phase 1 of the new parliamentary building.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Schools (North Yorkshire)

Mr. Cabom: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science (1) what is the 1990-91 North Yorkshire education authority capital budget for furnishings and equipment in North Yorkshire schools;

(2) what is the 1990-91 North Yorkshire education authority capital budget for building work in North Yorkshire schools.

Mr. Fallon: North Yorkshire local education authority received annual capital guidelines in 1990-91 for education expenditure on schools and further and higher education of £4·1 million. This represents no more than the minimum level of suggested capital spending on education. LEAs are free to spend whatever they think fit from whatever overall resources are available to them for capital spending. I understand that North Yorkshire LEA's capital budget for 1990-91 is in the region of £5 million.

National Curriculum Council

Mr. Cabom: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what was the cost of the carpet in the foyer of the National Curriculum Council's new building in Skeldergate, York.

Mr. Eggar: There is no carpet in the foyer of the National Curriculum Council's new building in Skeldergate, York.

Mr. Cabom: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science how many staff work in the National Curriculum Council's new building in Skeldergate, York.

Mr. Eggar: The number of staff currently working in the National Curriculum Council's new headquarters in York is 83. The building is also used for meetings of NCC's council, curriculum committees, task groups and conferences.

Mr. Cabom: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the cost of the lease of the National Curriculum Council's new building in Skeldergate, York.

Mr. Eggar: The annual rent of the National Curriculum Council's new headquarters is currently under review, but is likely to be in the region of £250,000 plus VAT.

Mr. Cabom: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what is the capital cost of equipment and furnishings for the National Curriculum Council's new building in Skeldergate, York.

Mr. Eggar: The cost of the fixtures, fittings and furnishings of the National Curriculum Council's new headquarters is likely to be £560,000.

Assisted Places

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the schools involved in the assisted places scheme, with the total number of places and the number of assisted places in each school.

Mr. Fallon: The latest information available is in respect of the 1989-90 academic year as follows:

Assisted places scheme
Academic year 1989-90

Name of school	Number of pupils on roll	Number of assisted pupils
Abbey School, Reading	920	66
Abingdon School	732	86
Ackworth School, Pontefract	456	5
Aldenham School, Elstree	370	32
Alice Ottley School, Worcester	670	77
Alleyns School, Dulwich	921	198
Ardingly College, Haywards Heath	482	5
Arnold School, Blackpool	800	75
Ashford School, Kent	700	42
Bancrofts School, Woodford	710	80
Bath High School GPDST	590	109
Batley Grammar School	631	252
Bedales School, Petersfield	408	6
Bedford High School	1,034	98
Bedford Modern School	1,200	161
Bedford School	1,120	100
Dame Alice Harpur School	1,030	153
Belvedere School GPDST, Liverpool	550	170
Berkhamsted School	800	27
Berkhamsted School for Girls	557	28
Birkenhead High School GPDST	948	260
Birkenhead School	990	252
Bishop's Stortford College	360	39
Blackheath High School GPDST	570	91
Bloxham School, Banbury	369	4
Bolton School (Boys)	1,000	246
Bolton School (Girls)	1,095	242
Bootham School, York	315	5
Bradfield College, Reading	530	2
Bradford Girls Grammar	900	57
Bradford Grammar School	1,146	212
Brentwood School	1,080	93
Brighton and Hove High School GPDST	744	141
Brighton College	498	100
Bristol Cathedral School	461	139
Bristol Grammar School	1,203	270
Bromley High School GPDST	693	97
Bromsgrove School, Worcestershire	555	3
Bruton School for Girls	580	116
Burgess Hill School for Girls	578	3
Bury Grammar School (Boys)	750	180
Bury Grammar School (Girls)	1,120	245
Canford School, Wimborne	530	27
Carmel College, Wallingford	290	85
Casterton School, Cumbria	380	40
Caterham School	720	122
Central Newcastle High School GPDST	780	117
Charterhouse, Godalming	700	9
Cheadle Hulme School	1,000	134
Cheltenham Ladies College	840	3
Chigwell School	617	63
Christ's Hospital	825	5
Churchers College, Petersfield	460	110
City of London School	850	138
City of London School for Girls	660	108
City of London Freemens School, Ashtead	649	2
Clifton College, Bristol	700	69
Clifton High School, Bristol	752	44
Colfes School, London SE12	860	178
Colston's School, Bristol	341	83
Colston's Girls' School	660	154
Coventry School	2,748	262
Cranleigh School	570	40
Croham Hurst School, Croydon (9/89)	590	5
Croydon High School GPDST	1,040	94
Culford School, Bury St. Edmunds	710	47
Dame Allans Boys School, Newcastle upon Tyne	440	121
Dame Allans Girls School	424	131
Dauntseys School, Devizes	588	50
Denstone College, Uttoxeter	360	119
Douai School, Reading (9/89)	295	2
Dover College (9/89)	310	3
Downe House School, Newbury (9/89)	460	1

Name of school	Number of pupils on roll	Number of assisted pupils
Dulwich College	1,430	282
Durham School (9/89)	378	5
Edgbaston C of E College for Girls (9/89)	470	4
Edgehill College, Bideford	502	140
Ellerslie School, Worcestershire (9/89)	250	5
Eltham College, London SE9	700	83
Emanuel School, London SW11	760	278
Epsom College	645	24
Exeter School	675	168
Farnborough Hill School	520	167
Feixstowe College (9/89)	320	5
Felsted School, Dunmow	500	51
Forest School, London E17	445	132
Francis Holland School NW1 (9/89)	360	5
Friends School, Saffron Walden	265	75
Giggleswick School, Settle (9/89)	296	0
Godolphin School, Salisbury (9/89)	320	4
Godolphin and Latymer School, London W6	700	172
Greshams School, Norfolk	480	10
Guildford High School for Girls (9/89)	580	3
Haberdashers Askes School, Elstree	1,300	216
Haberdashers Askes Schools for Girls, Elstree	1,096	115
Haileybury and Imperial Service College (9/89)	689	4
Hampton School	200	183
Harrogate College	400	19
Headington School, Oxford (9/89)	680	0
Hereford Cathedral School	603	225
Highate School	298	36
Hulme Grammar, Boys, Oldham	860	212
Hulme Grammar, Girls, Oldham	585	185
Hurstpierpoint College, Hassocks (9/89)	565	3
Hymers College, Hull	865	164
Ipswich High School GPDST	595	123
Ipswich School	626	75
James Allens Girls School, Dulwich	850	158
John Lyon School, Harrow	490	103
Kent College, Canterbury	646	88
Kimbolton Schools, Cambridgeshire (9/89)	685	5
King Edwards School at Bath	685	114
King Edwards School, Birmingham	775	251
King Edward VI High School, Birmingham	560	158
King Edward VII School, Lytham	645	230
King Edward VI School, Norwich	761	109
King Edward VI School, Southampton	944	237
King Edwards School, Witley	523	76
Kings College School, Wimbledon	650	83
Kings High School for Girls, Warwick	985	152
Kings School, Bruton (9/89)	333	3
Kings School, Chester	560	89
Kings School, Macclesfield	1,043	154
Kings School, Rochester	438	51
Kings School, Worcester	856	166
Kingston Grammar School	567	149
Kingswood School, Bath	484	42
Kirkham Grammar School	510	80
Lady Eleanor Holles School, Hampton	810	55
La Sagesse Convent School, Newcastle upon Tyne	340	139
Latymer Upper School, London W6	1,030	308
Lady Lumley's School, Peterborough (9/89)	148	2
Leeds Girls High School	946	102
Leeds Grammar School	1,184	197
Leicester Grammar School (9/89)	550	5
Leighton Park School, Reading (9/89)	360	5
Leys School, Cambridge	375	35
Liverpool College	700	171
Lord Wandsworth College, Basingstoke	440	82
Lorento Convent Grammar School, Altrincham	819	60
Loughborough Grammar	880	125
Loughborough High School	520	88
Magdalen College School, Oxford	500	119
Malvern College Group	600	58
Manchester Grammar School	1,460	262
Manchester High School	965	171
Marist Convent Senior School, Ascot (9/89)	500	1
Maynard School, Exeter	530	155
Merchant Taylors, Liverpool	769	203
Merchant Taylors Girls', Liverpool	811	170
Merchant Taylors, Northwood	700	68
Mill Hill School	540	55
Monkton Combe School, Bath	340	35
Mount Carmel School, Cheshire (9/89)	589	5
Mount St. Mary's College, Sheffield	283	52
Mount School, York (9/89)	288	5
Newcastle Under Lyme School, Staffordshire	1,350	466
Newcastle Upon Tyne Church High School (9/89)	607	5
Northampton High School	765	162
North London Collegiate School, Edgware	850	83
Norwich High School GPDST	835	168
Nottingham Girls High School GPDST	1,054	184
Nottingham High School	830	134
Notting Hill and Ealing High GPDST	768	118
Oakham School, Rutland (9/89)	986	3
Old Palace School, Croydon	760	184
Oxford High School GPDST	650	94
Pangbourne College, Reading (9/89)	330	5
Perse School for Boys, Cambridge	486	62
Perse School for Girls	710	66
Plymouth College	695	187
Pocklington School, York	714	130
Polam Hall School, Darlington (9/89)	465	5
Portsmouth Grammar School	1,020	178
Portsmouth High School GPDST	675	135
Prior Park College, Bath (9/89)	386	3
Putney High School GPDST	825	16
Queen Elizabeth Grammar, Blackburn	1,200	244
Queen Elizabeth Grammar, Wakefield	975	153
Queen Elizabeth Hospital School, Bristol	480	166
Queen Mary School, Lytham	700	242
Queens College, Taunton	610	64
Queens College, London W1	400	60
Queens School, Chester	578	71
Ratcliffe College, Leicestershire	424	61
Redland High School, Bristol	631	73
Red Maids School, Bristol	475	163
Reed's School, Cobham (9/89)	346	5
Reigate Grammar School	870	99
Rendcomb College, Cirencester (9/89)	275	5
Repton School, Derby	559	45
Rossal School, Fleetwood	476	45
Royal Grammar School, Guildford	800	107
Royal Grammar School, Newcastle	1,130	271
Royal Grammar School, Worcester	874	257
St. Albans School	666	121
St. Albans High School for Girls	685	59
St. Ambrose College, Altrincham	640	85
St. Anselms College, Birkenhead	850	184
St. Bede's College, Manchester	866	220
St. Bees School, Cumbria	367	82
St. Benedict's School, Ealing	585	75
St. Catherine's School, Bramley	615	35
St. Dunstan's College, Catford	830	153
St. Edmund's College, Ware	463	59
St. Edward's College, Liverpool	850	402
St. Felix School, Southwold (9/89)	355	4
St. George's College, Weybridge	600	27
St. Helen's School, Northwood	880	27

Name of school	Number of pupils on roll	Number of assisted pupils
St. John's College, Southsea	860	173
St. John's School, Leatherhead	460	14
St. Joseph's College, Ipswich	738	72
St. Joseph's Convent, Reading	534	102
St. Lawrence College, Ramsgate (9/89)	360	5
St. Margaret's School, Bushey (9/89)	460	1
St. Margaret's School, Exeter (9/89)	450	4
St. Mary's College, Crosby (9/89)	804	244
St. Mary's Convent, Cambridge	552	98
St. Mary's Hall, Brighton	386	52
St. Maurs Convent, Weybridge	470	57
St. Paul's School, Barnes	640	82
St. Paul's Girls School, Hammersmith	634	55
St. Peter's School, York	480	125
St. Swithun's School, Winchester	406	0
Salesian College, Farnborough	450	68
Scarborough College (9/89)	389	5
School of St. Helen and St. Katherine, Abingdon	520	80
Sedbergh School, Cumbria	495	36
Sheffield High School GPDST	683	81
Shrewsbury High School GPDST	570	67
Sir William Perkins School, Chertsey	490	93
Solihull School (9/89)	976	5
South Hampstead High School GPDST	670	58
Stamford School	950	71
Stamford High School	1,006	83
Stockport Grammar School	1,270	252
Stonyhurst College, Blackburn	433	30
Stowe School, Buckingham	608	4
Streatham Hill and Clapham High GPDST	500	156
Surbiton High School (9/89)	600	5
Sutton High School GPDST	821	68
Sutton Valence School, Maidstone	413	60
Sydenham High School GPDST	650	109
Talbot Heath School, Bournemouth	597	133
Taunton School	585	51
Tonbridge School	660	3
Tormead School, Guildford (9/89)	545	1
Trent College, Derbyshire	614	129
Trinity School of John Whitgift, Croydon	800	143
Truro School	863	115
Truro High School	500	53
University College School, London NW3	770	68
Upton Hall Convent School	600	171
Ursuline Convent School, Kent (9/89)	330	5
Ursuline High School, Ilford	410	120
Wakefield High School	760	139
Walthamstow Hall, Sevenoaks	532	72
Warwick School	985	136
Wellingborough School	830	59
Wellington College, Berkshire	829	32
Wellington School, Somerset	798	196
Wells Cathedral School	587	75
West Buckland School, Barnstable	534	71
Westholme School, Blackburn	951	5
Westminster School	600	37
Whitgift School, Croydon	900	109
William Hulme Grammar School, Manchester	790	220
Wimbledon High School GPDST	700	68
Winchester College	659	21
Wisbech Grammar School	566	281
Withington Girls School, Manchester	560	68
Wolverhampton Grammar School	635	260
Woodbridge School, Suffolk	542	112
Woodhouse Grove School, Bradford	410	5
Wycliffe College, Stonehouse	329	39
Yarm School, Cleveland (9/89)	417	5

Ms. Armstrong: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will list the fees charged in those schools involved in the assisted places scheme.

Mr. Fallon: Schools participating in the assisted places scheme charge assisted pupils the same fees as other pupils. Fee structures are related to pupils' age groups and differ considerably from school to school. Full details of schools' fees can be found in the directories published by the independent schools' associations, copies of which are held in the Library.

Research Councils

Sir Ian Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what are his reasons for not publishing the 1990 report of the Advisory Board for the Research Councils.

Mr. Alan Howarth: My right hon. and learned Friend considers that the advice that the board offers as part of the public expenditure survey should be confidential, as is normal for similar advice from other bodies such as the Universities Funding Council and the Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council. He recognises that the board may wish to make its views on some matters, including priorities for United Kingdom science, more widely available and will be discussing this with the chairman of the board.

Universities Funding Council

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what policy the Universities Funding Council is required to adopt to ensure that grant aid which has been allocated by it for specific developmental projects is not diverted to other purposes, such as the reduction of general college deficits.

Mr. Alan Howarth: Under the Education Reform Act 1988, the Universities Funding Council is empowered to attach conditions to its grant to universities, including repayment of grant if the conditions are not met.

CHURCH COMMISSIONERS

Redundant Buildings

27. Mr. Corbyn: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, as representing the Church Commissioners, what steps are being taken by the Church Commissioners to make redundant buildings available to alleviate the problems of the homeless.

Mr. Alison: Some 13 redundant churches have been appropriated to use as night shelters or day centres or sold or leased to local authorities or housing associations, while more than 100 of the sites of demolished redundant churches have been disposed of to local authorities or housing associations.

Ordinations

29. Mr. Speller: To ask the right hon. Member for Selby, as representing the Church Commissioners, what representations he has received on the subject of the ordination of women ministers.

Mr. Alison: I have received no representations on this subject.

SCOTLAND

Civic Government

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland when he expects to complete the current review of the Civic Government (Scotland) Act 1982.

Mr. Lang: The current review of the 1982 Act has been delayed by pressure of other work but it should be completed shortly. Thereafter we intend to publish in the course of next year a consultation paper setting out our proposals for changes to the Act.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Mozambique

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs how many representations he has received calling for the United Kingdom to help fund the shortfall in the United Nations Mozambique emergency appeal, to help relief and resettlement of refugees and displaced persons; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Chalker: In addition to early-day motion 1417 of 17 October and questions from the hon. Members for Bradford, West (Mr. Madden) and for Cynon Valley (Mrs. Clwyd) some 40 letters of representation have been received on this issue. The position remains as stated in my replies to the hon. Members for Bradford, West and for Cynon Valley on 19 October, at column 938, and 13 November, at column 99, respectively.

Rain Forests

Mr. Dalyell: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the results of the Minister for Overseas Development's visit to Brazilian and Amazon rain forest projects for Brazilian-British co-operation in conserving rain forests.

Mrs. Chalker: My visit was valuable in giving me a closer understanding of the issues involved. I am convinced that our environmental co-operation programme with Brazil is on the right lines and that we should press on with developing our programme in both the urban and the rain forest sectors. I am pleased to have been able to sign agreements on projects in both areas.

I also look forward to new project proposals emerging as a result of the Anglo-Brazilian environmental conference, which I opened in Brasilia.

Human Rights Abuses

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs for which countries, other than the Sudan, Her Majesty's Government have stopped British development aid, on the ground of human rights abuses.

Mrs. Chalker: We have stopped British development aid to Burma and project aid to Somalia. We are at present running down our project aid to Sudan in response to the human rights situation there. We have also delayed implementation of a pledge of programme aid to Sri Lanka pending improvement of the human rights situation there.

West Indies

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreig and Commonwealth Affairs what assistance the Overse Development Administration is giving the Windwa Islands and Jamaica to diversify into exports other th bananas over the next decade.

Mrs. Chalker: Assistance for economic diversificati to reduce dependence on bananas has been a significa part of our aid programme to the Windward Islands f many years. Current commitments to agricultur diversification total £3·5 million, and this will be important area for future aid allocations.

Our Jamaica programme focuses on other secto though we are providing a grant of £500,000 for t rehabilitation of smallholder coffee following hurrica damage.

The aid programme also helps with diversification in tourism, through improvements to supporting infrastru ture such as roads and water and electricity supplies, a with training.

Investment by the Commonwealth Developme Corporation—CDC—supports the growth of the coff industry in Jamaica and tourism and processing of loc production for export in the region as a whole. The CD is also assisting the banana industry in Jamaica to increa its productivity and thus to improve its competiti position in the European market.

Malaysia

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreig and Commonwealth Affairs if he will list all offers of a to Malaysia, with the date the offer was made and the da the aid agreement was signed, since 1979.

Mrs. Chalker: The information requested cannot provided in the form requested by the hon. Lady, but I c confirm that offers of aid have been made to t Government of Malaysia since 1979 in respect of t following aid and trade provision—ATP—projects an where aid agreements have been signed, a date, if know has been added:

Offers made for ATP projects and date of aid agreement (only six offers have so far resulted in an aid agreement)

Sungei Ahning Dam—28 December 1984
Cross Braced Rail Bogies—31 July 1986
Rural Water Schemes—28 August 1986
Sandakan Power Station—4 March 1989
Nucleus Hospitals—13 July 1990
View data—date not readily available
Pergau Hydro Electric Station
Connaught Bridge Power Station
Sibu Airport
Utora University
Digital Multiplex Equipment
Labuan/Sabah Submarine Cable Load Despatch Centres
Locomotives
Railway Braking System
Air Navigation Equipment
Peninsular Gas
Optical Fibre Telecommunications
Sarawak Transmission
Sungai Piah Hydro Electric Station
Transmission Switchgear

East-West Malay Submarine Cable
Indoor Substations
Offshore Gas Development
Gas Turbine Generators
NEB Consultancy Port Klang Power Station
Bersia/Kenering Hydro Electric Station
Submarine Telecommuncations
Switchgear for NEB
Bataing AI
Paka Power Station
Circulating Water Plant
3KV Transmission Switchgear
Communications Equipment
132KV Transmission Switchgear
Submarine Telephone Cable
Peninsular Gas Phase II

Offers made for ATP/Technical Co-operation Projects and Date of Agreement (only six offers have so far resulted in an aid agreement).

Airport Study—19 August 1980.
Privatisation Programme—23 June 1988.
Ulu Jelai Feasibility Study—March 1985 (exact date not readily available).
Liwagu Hydro Electric Study—16 September 1987.
Rural Water Supply Supervision—11 September 1987.
Medamit 2 Study—15 October 1990.
Railways Double Tracking.
Meteorological Study.
Hill Resort Road.
Islamic University Master Plan Study.
Islamic University Socio-Economic Study.
Peninsular Gas Phase II.
Selangor Pipeline Rehabilitation Study.
Air Traffic Control Consultancy.
Aluminium Smelter Study.
Copper Complex Feasibility Study.
Engineering Complex Feasibility Study.
Nenggiri Hydro Electric Consultancy.
Power Generation Feasibility Study.
Rail Training.
Transformers for NEB.
Urea Plant Consultancy.

In addition to ATP activities we have provided various technical co-operation inputs under our regular aid programme for Malaysia. The major elements in the regular aid programme are provision of experts and volunteers and training for students and other trainees. Information on the total number of man years for each of these categories is given in the table.

Year	Experts and Volunteers (man years)	Student and Trainees (man years)
1979	97	164
1980	56	171
1981	46	100
1982	43	76
1983	33	89
1984	29	114
1985	34	86
1986	42	100
1987	35	103
1988	33	105
1989	33	110

Sahara

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what relief aid has been given to the Saharans who are currently living in camps in Algeria having fled from western Sahara following its invasion by Morocco.

Mrs. Chalker: We are not providing any relief aid to the camps in Algeria.

Aid Focus

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out the evidence on which the Minister for Overseas Development based her statement of 8 November that British aid is focused on the poorest sectors and people within poor countries.

Mrs. Chalker [holding answer 16 November 1990]: In my speech to the Refugee Council annual conference on 8 November, I said that the Government were focusing their growing assistance on the poorest countries, on the poorest groups within those countries, and the most vulnerable. In 1989 over 70 per cent. of our gross bilateral aid went to the poorest 50 countries compared with 63 per cent. in 1986. The report of the Public Accounts Committee published on 18 June 1990 recognised that the ODA's efforts to engage in direct poverty alleviation projects were yielding results. In India alone, our commitments to poverty alleviation activities now amount to £130 million with a further £60 million under consideration.

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will set out the evidence on which the Minister for Overseas Development based her statement of 8 November that British aid is becoming more and more project orientated.

Mrs. Chalker: I have no recollection of using the words quoted by the hon. Member.

Brazil

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what discussions were held on human rights abuse, particularly of Yanomani people, with Brazilian officials during the visit to Brazil of the Minister for Overseas Development.

Mrs. Chalker [holding answer 16 November 1990]: We have consistently made clear to the Brazilian authorities our views on human rights abuse. During my visit I took the opportunity to discuss with Foreign Minister Rezek the concerns of both Governments about securing a viable future for indigenous peoples including the Yanomani. We understand that the Brazilian authorities are instituting measures which should be helpful in safeguarding indigenous rights.

Aid Expenditure

Mrs. Clwyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the decision was made that poverty, population and environment are the top priorities for British aid; what proportion of aid was spent on each of these in 1989 and the current year; and how the decision will be reflected in aid expenditure in 1991 and in future years.

Mrs. Chalker [holding answer 16 November 1990]: The alleviation of poverty has been a major aim of the aid programme under successive Governments. Recently we have been giving increasing priority to growth and addressing environmental issues. I see these as interrelated issues requiring increasing attention.

In 1989 a total of £17·3 million was spent on activities directly related to population concerns, a 72 per cent. increase in real terms compared to 1981. In addition most mother and child health and women's education programmes contribute to reducing population growth.

On poverty, I refer the hon. Lady to the answer I gave her on 26 June, at column 125. On environment, ODA procedures now rightly require that the evaluation of all projects takes account of environmental considerations. The increasing priority given to the issue is reflected in the fact that whereas in 1988 the Government were financing around 80 forestry projects at a cost to the aid programme of £45 million, we currently have in place or in preparation over 200 projects at a cost of some £165 million. Figures for 1990 and future years are not available.

TRANSPORT

Fuel-Burning Trains

Mr. Wray: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what powers his Department has to control and issue guidelines to British Rail regarding the use of fuel-burning trains in urban areas.

Mr. McLoughlin: Operational aspects of motive power are a matter for British Rail. Enforcement of controls under the Clean Air Act 1956 on emissions of dark smoke is by local authorities. Under the Environmental Protection Act 1990, railway engines other than steam locomotives could become subject to statutory nuisance action by local authorities or individuals.

British Rail

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport when he will approve British Rail's proposals for new class 159 vehicles for the Waterloo to Exeter route.

Mr. Freeman: The passengers who use the Waterloo-Exeter route are currently getting a service which is below the standard they are entitled to expect, in spite of the best efforts of Network SouthEast managers and staff.

The replacement of the old and unreliable trains on the line has been a priority for both British Rail and the Government.

British Rail put to me a sound case for 69 class 159 vehicles to be introduced on the Waterloo-Exeter route, most of which will be converted class 158s, and I approved its proposal today.

It means that passengers can look forward to a modern, reliable and comfortable service at least a year sooner than would otherwise have been possible.

Disabled People (Vehicle Excise Duty)

Sir David Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many disabled people in 1989 applied successfully to claim a refund of vehicle excise duty or exemption from the payment of vehicle excise duty.

Mr. Chope: During the period April 1989 to March 1990 there were approximately 22,000 successful first-time claims by disabled people for refunds of vehicle excise duty. There are currently over 350,000 disabled persons claiming exemption from vehicle excise duty.

Rolling Stock, Kent

Mr. Dunn: To ask the Secretary of State for Tr if he will make a statement on his policy with regar supply of the new Networker rolling stock for commuter lines serving north-west Kent; and if make a statement.

Mr. Freeman: I fully support Network Sou programme of investment in the Kent Link lines. of 400 Networker trains were approved in August a cost of over £290 million with approval for a furt in principle. My right hon. Friend the Secretary has endorsed the 12-car Networker strategy for Ke routes. Infrastructure improvements at a cost of ov million are going ahead and more rolling stock is be ordered. I understand that the first class 465 Ne is due for delivery to Kent Link in September 19

Tachograph Charts

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of S Transport when he expects to reach a decision ab serialisation of tachograph charts.

Mr. Chope: I hope to be able to announce a soon.

Warwick Gardens, Peckham

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of St Transport when the Minister of State will visit W Gardens in Peckham.

Mr. Freeman: It is, of course, for British propose a route for a new rail link between the tunnel and London.

However, I intend to visit Warwick Gardens, wh in the Dulwich constituency, at a time of conveni my hon. Friend the Member for Dulwich (Mr. Be

NORTHERN IRELAND

Enterprise Ulster

Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of St Northern Ireland how many staff of Enterprise Ul to be declared redundant in 1990 and 1991; and ho of these are remunerated within the range £7 £12,000 per annum.

Mr. Needham: Fifty, of whom 49 are likely to b £7,000 to £12,000 per annum wages or salary ran precise position will not be known until after the offer of voluntary redundancy to all staff closes November 1990.

Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of St Northern Ireland what kinds of material u Enterprise Ulster have been conveyed to the privat of staff members for the purpose of material testi long the testing lasted; and when reports on the tes were submitted and to whom.

Mr. Needham: The only known material conve member of staff's private home, for the pur material testing, was Colfix bitumen emulsion. Thi December 1980, with the results of the exp published in January 1981 and circulated management.

The Colfix bitumen and the small quantity of stones used were paid for by the member of staff.

Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many staff of Enterprise Ulster whose remuneration is in excess of £12,000 per annum are to be transferred to other work in the Government service; how many are to be retained in Enterprise Ulster; and how many are to be declared redundant.

Mr. Needham: Enterprise Ulster is a statutory body established in 1973. As such, there are no arrangements in place which allow its staff to be transferred to other work in the Government service. Of the up to 50 staff being made redundant in 1990 and 1991, it is likely that there may be one whose remuneration is in excess of £12,000 per annum.

Mr. Kilfedder: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what projects were undertaken by Enterprise Ulster in 1988 and 1989; and what was the total cost of each, showing separately the amount contributed by the client or sponsor and the value placed on unused materials returned to Enterprise Ulster depots.

Mr. Needham: In the 1988-89 financial year, Enterprise Ulster undertook 385 projects at a total gross cost of £2,083,124 to which clients contributed £419,663. In 1989-90, a total of 312 projects were undertaken at a total gross cost of £913,446 to which clients contributed £219,881. No record is kept of unused materials which were either returned to the client or on agreement, transferred to another project of the client or if purchased by Enterprise Ulster, returned to its depots.

Details of the projects undertaken in the two years, along with Enterprise Ulster's expenditure and income from clients have been placed in the Library of the House.

Energy Connections

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what progress has been made in establishing whether provision of (a) a natural gas pipeline and (b) an electricity connector between Northern Ireland and Great Britain is likely to be feasible; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Needham: The technical and economic feasibility of using gas for power generation is currently being assessed. Several possible routes for a pipeline from Great Britain are being examined and sea bed surveys have been completed. Initial discussions have been held with a number of natural gas suppliers.

On an electricity interconnector, discussions are continuing between Northern Ireland Electricity and Scottish Power.

Saltwater Bridge, Kircubbin

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland how many traffic accidents there have been in each of the past five years and in the first 10 months of 1990 in the vicinity of Saltwater bridge, Rowreagh road, Kircubbin, County Down; how many persons were injured; how many persons were killed; and what proposals he has to improve road safety at this location.

Mr. Needham: Recorded accidents at Saltwater bridge, Rowreagh road, Kircubbin, are as follows:

Year	Number of accidents	Number of persons killed/injured
1985	0
1986	0
1987	1	[1]1
1988	0
1989	1	[1]1
[3]1990	1	[2]1

[1] Injured.
[2] Killed.
[3] To date.

A minor road realignment scheme which will enhance road safety at this location is due to commence towards the end of the next financial year.

Poverty and Deprivation

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what measures the Government will introduce to reduce the level of poverty and deprivation in Northern Ireland, following the report of the Child Poverty Action Group.

Mr. Needham: The Government aim to provide an effective system of financial help; extra resources being targeted on those most in need. Following the reform of social security in April 1988, which gave increased levels of support to families with children, there have been other improvements, including increased help from October 1989 for disabled and older pensioners on income support or housing benefit and higher limits on savings from April 1990. There will be a general benefits uprating next April, including a real increase in the basic pensioner premium for people aged 60 to 74 on income support or housing benefit and substantial extra income support for many people being cared for in independent homes. The Government have also announced plans to improve the framework of benefits for disabled people. Additionally, the decision to set up a Social Security Agency in Northern Ireland is intended further to improve the quality and responsiveness of service to those in need of help.

District Heating

Mr. Barron: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what action the Northern Ireland Housing Executive is taking as a result of the offer British Coal has made to assume responsibility for the improvement and operation of certain district heating schemes in Northern Ireland.

Dr. Mawhinney: The chairman of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive has informed me that the executive has rejected the British Coal proposals in view of the high level of subsidy which the proposals required.

ENVIRONMENT

Land Registration

Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what circular or communication he has made to local authorities concerning future registration of public sector land; what categories of existing use such proposals cover; and for what purpose.

Mr. Atkins: My Department issued on 12 September a consultation paper which invited the comments of the local authority associations and others interested on our proposals for encouraging the use of vacant public sector land. One of the proposals was for a statutory duty on local authorities and other public sector bodies to keep, and make accessible to the public, registers of their unused and underused land on a broadly similar basis to those requested under the code of practice issued in August 1989. Copies of the consultation paper have been placed in the Library. The responses are now being considered.

Part VIII of the Environmental Protection Act 1990 places a duty on local authorities to keep a register of potentially contaminated land in their areas whether publicly or privately owned. Copies of a report on the methodology for identifying such land, "Pilot Survey of Potentially Contaminated Land in Cheshire", were sent to all local authorities in July.

Satellite Dishes

Mr. Vaz: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many representations he has received in the current year concerning planning applications for the siting of satellite dishes.

Mr. Atkins: This information is not readily available. Virtually all of the substantial number of letters received on this subject are concerned with the environmental impact of satellite dishes erected under permitted development rights (for which a specific planning application is unnecessary). The consultation, earlier this year, over proposed changes to the permitted development rights for satellite dishes produced nearly 600 responses.

National Stadium

Mr. Butcher: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment in the light of the recommendation of the Taylor report and the separate need for a national stadium in the 21st century, what form of public financial support would be available to supplement private sector investment in such a facility in the west midlands.

Mr. Atkins: The Government's priority is the introduction of all seating accommodation in line with Lord Justice Taylor's recommendations. Substantial funds are being made available to the Football Trust from the reduction in pool betting duty. It is for other public authorities in the area to decide their own investment priorities.

Limehouse Link Road

Ms. Gordon: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will break down the estimated £142 million cost of the Limehouse link road into its principal components, including rehousing costs and relocation of businesses; what contracts have now been concluded for construction and associated work, with the names of the respective companies and amounts of the relevant tenders; and what further contracts remain to be concluded.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The figure of £142 million was the estimated cost of the Limehouse link road, prepared by LDDC in 1988, prior to tendering in 1989. It relates to construction costs only. The main construction contract was awarded in September 1989 at a value of £220 million to a joint venture of Balfour Beatty Construction Ltd. and Fairclough Civil Engineering Ltd. Subcontra matter for the main contractors, and the d confidential to them.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of Stat Environment what response he has received to th standard spending assessment announcements f authorities.

Mr. Key: Consultations on the local go finance settlement for 1991-92 will continue November. The representations received to date authorities have shown that the large proposed in standard spending assessments are welcomed, also included a number of detailed comments c points.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of the Environment (1) what proposals he has for e clothing, bedding, furniture and basic equipm seizure by private bailiffs enforcing the communi

(2) what proposals he has to amend the Co Charges (Administration and Enforcement) Re 1989 to bring controls on bailiffs enforcing the co charge into line with those applying for distress

Mr. Key: My Department does not propose any changes to the Community Charges (Admi and Enforcement) Regulations 1989 as regard employed by local authorities. We have issued the employment of bailiffs by local authoriti included the suggestion that authorities sho guidelines to bailiffs on their mode of ope understand that the Institute of Revenues Ra Valuation will shortly be issuing a practice note include details of property which it is unl imprudent to distrain.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of the Environment what proposals he has for private bailiffs enforcing the community charge written authorisation from the local authority.

Mr. Key: The Community Charges (Admi and Enforcement) Regulations 1989 already bailiff to show the debtor the written authorisati received from the local authority if requested to

Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of the Environment if he will publish figures sho 1990-91 the average amount in £ sterling per wee percentage of earnings accounted for by the co charge for (i) a single person, (ii) a single-earne couple without children, (iii) a single-earner couple with two children and (iv) a two-earne couple on (a) 50 per cent., (b) 75 per cent., (c) cent., (d) 150 per cent., (e) 200 per cent., (f) 300 (g) 400 per cent., (h) 500 per cent., (i) 700 per (j) 1,000 per cent. of average earnings.

Mr. Key: I regret that it is not possible to satisfactory estimates of the amount paid in co charge by households of differing incomes. The paid will vary according to the area in w households live; their entitlement to transitional r their entitlement to community charge rebate.

Sir Geoffrey Finsberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many people have been exempted from paying the community charge in each category of exemption in the London borough of Camden.

Mr. Portillo: Information returned by the authority on the number of exempt persons over 18 in the London borough of Camden at 1 June 1990 is as follows:

	Number
Severely mentally impaired	57
Aged 18 or 19[1]	66
Members of religious communities	47
In hospital or home[2]	1,550
Persons without fixed abode	200
Other[3]	28

[1] Aged 18 who attract child benefit because they are still at school or aged 18 or 19 and on full-time courses of further, but not higher, education.

[2] People whose sole or main residence is in an NHS hospital, in a residential care home, a nursing home, a mental nursing home, a private hospital or a hostel providing a substantial level of care, and who are also being treated or cared for in such an institution.

[3] People in detention, members of visiting forces, international headquarters and defence organisations, and their dependants (including diplomats), residential care workers employed at a very low salary, and full-time students whose term time address is in Scotland or Northern Ireland. These categories have been combined because of the small numbers involved.

Ince B Power Station

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received from local authorities in Gwynedd and Clwyd concerning the environmental effects of the proposed burning of Orimulsion fuel at Ince B power station; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I have received one letter about Ince power station from Gwynedd county council which was forwarded to my Department by the hon. Member for Caernarfon.

Leybucht Bay

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) how many of his (a) legal and (b) other staff will be sent as observers to the European Court of Justice in Luxembourg on 5 December in respect of the Leybucht bay case;

(2) what policy considerations led him to decide to associate the United Kingdom Government with the German Government as defendants in the Leybucht bay case brought by the European Commission for infringement of the European Community wild birds directive;

(3) how many of his (a) legal and (b) other staff were sent as observers to the European Court of Justice in Luxembourg on 16 October on the occasion of the preliminary hearing of the Leybucht bay case.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: The United Kingdom intervened in case C57/89 brought by the European Commission against the German Government on two grounds. First, we believe that the Commission is not entitled to rely upon any presumption of fact and should be required to place before the court the evidence needed to support its case that a member state has not fulfilled an obligation under Community law. Secondly, the Commission interprets article 4 of the wild birds directive EEC 79/409 as imposing an absolute prohibition on any activity or development within a special protection area (SPA) which might cause significant pollution or deterioration of habitat or disturbance to the birds, with the sole exception of works which are strictly necessary to protect human health or safety. We consider this interpretation to be contrary to the wording and intention of the directive, and unacceptable in principle.

Two members of my Department's staff attended the hearing of this case on 16 October in support of counsel together with an officer of the Treasury Solicitor's Department. The Welsh Office and South Glamorgan county council also each sent an observer. There are no plans for anyone to attend the European Court of Justice in Luxembourg on 5 December.

Information requested relating to the total cost to public funds of the United Kingdom intervention in this case is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment, pursuant to his answers of 12 and 13 November, when he will be in a position to estimate the total cost to public funds of the Government's decision to associate themselves legally with the German Government as a co-defendant against the European Commission in the Leybucht bay case.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory [holding answer 16 November 1990]: I refer the hon. Member to the reply that I gave him earlier today.

Local Authority Employees

Mr. Holt: To ask the Secretary of State, for the Environment how many town or county hall employees, except teachers, are recorded as having been made redundant in each of the past 10 years.

Mr. Key: My Department does not collect this information.

Interim Development Order Sites

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary State for the Environment whether he proposes to introduce any controls on interim development order sites in respect of (a) opencast mining, (b) quarrying and (c) any other purpose; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: The Minerals Act 1981 provides an opportunity for mineral planning authorities to review interim development orders and other early planning permissions for mineral working and to make orders updating them where appropriate. There are no proposals to introduce further controls, but we are reviewing the operation of the Minerals Act 1981, as announced in "This Common Inheritance".

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what representations he has received regarding interim development order sites; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: The Department is aware of the recent concern about interim development order permissions and has received a number of representations from those affected by them.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he has visited any interim development order sites in the last 12 months; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Atkins: My right hon. Friend has not visited any interim development order sites in the last 12 months, but I shall be visiting a number of mineral sites during the course of next year to see operating conditions at first hand.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many interim development order sites exist in England; and if he will list full details in the Official Report.

Mr. Atkins: All permissions granted under interim development orders before 21 July 1943 have lapsed, but permissions applied for, and granted on or after that date and before 1 July 1948 were preserved by section 77 of the 1947 Act and by subsequent legislation.

No records of applications made under interim development orders were required and no information about the total number of permissions granted is currently available. Such records as there are of such permissions will be held by the successor planning authority and we are discussing the information currently available with the local authority associations.

Workplace Accidents

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will list the reported accidents involving lifting while working received by his Department with regard to local government employees for 1986, 1987, 1988 and 1989 showing distribution by age and sex, occupation, incidence rates based on population of England and place of accident.

Mr. Key: My Department receives no such reports.

Mortgages

Sir Ian Gilmour: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is his latest estimate of the number of families with dependent children who have mortgages; and what was the comparable figure in 1979.

Mr. Michael Spicer: The estimated numbers of households in England with dependent children (aged under 16, or under 19 if in full-time education) buying with a mortgage, were 3·1 million in 1979 and 3·6 million in 1988. These figures are derived from the general household survey.

Disabled Facilities Grants

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what evidence his Department has of the impact of the system of contribution repayments towards disabled facilities grants, set out in circular 10/90 (paragraphs 17, 18 and 67), on the financial situation of disabled persons and their families and on the expenditure of local authorities that waive loan repayments.

Mr. Key: I have no evidence to suggest that the system is not working as intended, which is to ensure that the resources available for grants are used as effectively as possible. All aspects of the new renovation grant system will however be kept under review.

Apple Orchards

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary o Environment what steps he is taking t protection of orchards containing rare varie and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: Currently we are wide-ranging review of tree preservation legislation. A consultation exercise will shortly, providing an opportunity for com and other issues to be considered in that bro In addition, I understand that my right ho Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food fund the national fruit collection at Br contains some 2,300 varieties of apple.

North Sea (Dumping)

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary o Environment if he will take steps to preve dumping by oil companies of radioactive w rigs into the North sea; and if he will make

Mr. Trippier: Disposals of small amounts waste from oil installations in the North sea a under the Radioactive Substances Act Majesty's inspectorate of pollution (HMIP) the Secretary of State for the Environment Majesty's industrial pollution inspectorate behalf of the Secretary of State for Scotland. are considered on a case-by-case basis a authorisation is issued HMIP or HMIPI satisfied that disposals will not present a radiological hazard.

World Climate Conference

Mr. Devlin: To ask the Secretary of Environment what results were achieved a world climate conference; and if he will make

Mr. Chris Patten: The second world clima was a major forward in the internationa climate change. Following a week's meeting issues, Ministers from some 137 countri declaration which called for an early start on on a framework convention on climate c completed by 1992. We fully support this ag will play an active part in the negotiations w February 1991.

The conference endorsed the need for a gl to respond to climate change, involving the of all nations. To enable developing countries full part in this, the declaration recognises financial and technological assistance from t lised countries.

The declaration also welcomed the comm European Community and its member states developed countries to take action aimed emissions of greenhouse gases, and particu dioxide. It urged all developed countries national strategies to limit emissions of gree

This conference involved 137 nations, mor comparable gathering, and the agreements give added impetus to the work of developin and realistic global response to climate cha the 1992 United Nations conference on envi development.

EMPLOYMENT

Unit Labour Costs

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give, for each year from 1974, an index of the rise in unit labour costs in the United Kingdom, the United States of America, France, the Federal Republic of Germany and Japan (a) in local currency and (b) adjusted for changes in relative exchange rates.

Mr. Jackson: Statistics on unit labour costs in the whole economy are not available. International comparisons of unit labour costs in manufacturing industries are made periodically by the international monetary fund. The latest available data from this source are set out in the tables:

TABLE 1: Manufacturing Unit Labour Costs in Local Currency

	United Kingdom	United States of America	France	Federal Republic of Germany	Japan
					Index 1985 = 100
1974	30·7	59·3	35·3	68·5	89·0
1975	41·7	63·5	42·9	73·1	102·1
1976	46·2	65·6	46·5	73·8	102·3
1977	51·9	69·4	49·1	78·0	106·4
1978	59·6	74·5	53·0	81·5	105·0
1979	70·3	82·0	57·4	83·7	105·2
1980	85·9	91·6	65·6	90·2	104·7
1981	93·5	98·2	73·8	94·5	108·6
1982	96·6	104·3	82·7	97·7	107·7
1983	95·3	101·1	87·9	97·0	105·3
1984	96·5	99·7	94·2	98·1	101·2
1985	100·0	100·0	100·0	100·0	100·0
1986	103·8	100·8	101·9	105·0	103·3
1987	103·8	99·5	101·8	111·5	98·0
1988	106·1	100·8	100·0	111·0	94·5
1989	110·7	101·6	101·3	112·2	95·3

TABLE 2: Manufacturing Unit Labour Costs Adjusted for Changes in Relative Exchange Rates.

	United Kingdom	United States of America	France	Federal Republic of Germany	Japan
					Index 1985 = 100
1974	78·7	82·8	91·8	107·3	110·6
1975	84·4	74·4	104·8	101·0	106·9
1976	76·8	78·2	104·7	102·1	107·4
1977	76·5	76·0	97·3	108·3	114·7
1978	83·0	68·9	97·2	111·9	128·0
1979	98·6	68·4	99·2	112·2	109·2
1980	122·0	69·2	103·9	110·2	93·0
1981	124·2	79·3	99·2	100·0	102·9
1982	114·9	89·3	96·7	101·7	91·0
1983	103·7	92·5	94·4	103·1	98·9
1984	99·6	98·9	96·0	101·6	101·3
1985	100·0	100·0	100·0	100·0	100·0
1986	92·9	77·2	102·5	112·5	125·1
1987	90·4	65·8	101·4	126·8	125·5
1988	98·4	63·2	97·2	125·8	133·1
1989	97·9	65·8	94·9	123·0	127·0

Source: International Monetary Fund

Earnings

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State Employment whether he will publish a table showing each year since 1970 and for the latest month the num of full-time adult males and females in employm together with the number of part-time wor distinguishing between manual and other workers between manufacturing, other production industries non-production industries; and if he will add figures non-adult workers and for the self-employed.

Mr. Jackson: I shall write to the hon. Gentleman place a copy of my reply in the Library.

Sir Ian Gilmour: To ask the Secretary of State Employment how many and what percentages of full-t employed (a) men and (b) women, and of part-t employed (i) men and (ii) women, earned less than £3 hour in April 1990.

Mr. Jackson: The available information on th earning less than £3 per hour in the new earnings sur (NES) sample is published in table 20 of part A of the 1 NES report.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State Employment whether he will publish a table showing numbers employed in (a) banking and bill discounti (b) house and estate agents and (c) legal services.

Mr. Jackson: The information is given in the table. Estimates for the legal services industry can be deriv only from censuses of employment. The latest availa census figures are for September 1987.

Employees in Employment Industries (SIC 1980)	Great Britain Thousands
June 1990
Banking and Bill Discounting (Group 814)	503·9
House and Estate Agents (Group 834)	109·3
September 1987
Legal Services (Group 835)	165·3

Industrial Tribunals

Mr. Blair: To ask the Secretary of State f Employment if part-time chairmen of industrial tribuna have been stopped from hearing cases; what is the curre waiting time for a hearing date; and to what extent t waiting time has changed in recent months.

Mr. Forth: Restrictions on the use of part-tin chairmen were lifted on 9 November. Information recent waiting times is not yet available.

Mr. Blair: To ask the Secretary of State f Employment how much further funding has been receive by the industrial tribunals; and what plans he has to revie the amount further in the rest of the financial year.

Mr. Forth: The budget of the industrial tribunals (England and Wales) has been increased by £750,000. This will enable the tribunals to operate normally for the rest of the financial year.

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

Mr. McLeish: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will give for the enterprise allowance scheme (a) the number of entrants and (b) the total expenditure for each of the years 19 1989-90 and 1990-91 and for each of the st Scotland and Wales.

Mr. Forth [holding answer 12 Novem regional breakdown of entrants for each the table. Because of changes in scheme separate data for London are not availa 1989. Expenditure information was pr national summary level up to that point. of the programme budget went on allo and estimates are included based on entr

Region	1987-88		1988-89		1989-90		1
	Entrants	Expenditure (£ million)	Entrants	Expenditure (£ million)	Entrants	Expenditure (£ million)	12 Ent
London	—	—	—	—	8,999	19·74
South East	—	—	—	—	8,264	17·59
Western Division			6,473	13·32	—	—
Eastern Division	24,514	45·04	8,224	16·19	—	—
Southern Division			7,450	15·98	—	—
South West	11,262	20·84	10,344	20·9	7,335	17·24
West Midlands	10,537	19·45	9,677	19·15	7,691	17·24
East Midlands and Eastern	11,562	20·32	9,656	19·05	7,879	17·54
Yorkshire and Humberside	10,198	18·89	9,935	19·26	8,169	17·44
North West	15,955	30·34	15,311	29·82	12,263	26·96
Northern	5,729	11·07	5,938	12·08	4,881	10·67
Wales	6,654	12·04	6,942	12·92	5,433	12·41
Scotland	9,894	17·91	8,572	17·62	6,972	14·97
Totals	106,305	195·9	98,522	196·3	77,886	171·8

HEALTH

NHS Trusts

Mr. Battle: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what rules govern membership of trusts and health authorities to ensure that there is no conflict of interest.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The NHS Trusts (Membership and Procedure) Regulations SI No. 1990/2024, as amended, govern the appointment of trust chairmen and directors. The Regional and District Health Authorities (Membership and Procedure) Regulations SI No. 1990/1331 govern the appointment of health authority chairmen and members. The provisions of these regulations together with general guidance issued by the Department are intended to ensure that conflicts of interest do not arise for members of health authorities or directors of NHS trusts.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health whether additional funds were made available to community health councils for consultation on self-governing trusts.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Responding to consultation on the provision of health services is part of the normal function of community health councils. Additional funds have not been made available for consultation on self-governing trusts.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of S what representations have been received (b) regional health authorities about the allowed for consultation on self-governin

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: A number of received. We are satisfied that three appropriate length of time for consultatio

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of S if he will place in the Library the report o Thames regional health authority on lo about the application for self-governing t Guy's hospital, Lewisham hospital and services and (b) St. Thomas's hospital.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Responses to available from regional health authoritie those commenting have made it clear tha so privately.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of S (1) which regional health authorities held as part of the consultation about self-gov

(2) which regional health autho exhibitions as part of their consultations o trust status.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: It is for regio trust applicants to determine the ran consulted formally and the way in consulted. The methods used in consu region are publicly available from authorities.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he will announce his decision about which applications for self-governing status will be granted.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: My right hon. Friend will announce his decision soon.

General Practitioners, Trent

Mr. Allen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many general practitioner fund-holding practices will be given the go ahead in the Trent region; on what criteria; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Practices which applied by 1 November this year to join the scheme will need to satisfy the conditions laid down in the National Health Service (Fund-Holding Practices) (Applications and Recognition) Regulations 1990. I understand that 28 practices in the Trent region are currently undertaking the preparatory work necessary to become fund holders. It will be for the region to decide which practices meet the criteria for recognition.

Hospital Beds

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of national health service beds in use, in (a) the acute sector and (b) totally in each year from 1979 to 1989; and what is the current figure.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is given in the table. The latest available figures show that in 1989-90 almost 7·5 million in-patient cases were treated. On a comparable basis, just over 6 million in-patient cases were treated in 1979—a rise of nearly 25 per cent.

Average daily available beds in England

	Acute sector (Thousands)	Total (Thousands)
1979	149	362
1980	146	356
1981	145	352
1982	144	348
1983	142	343
1984	139	335
1985	136	325
1986	133	316
1987-88	128	297
1988-89	123	281
1989-90	121	270

Source:
SH3 return 1979-1986
KHO3 return 1987-88—1989-90

Abortion

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has concerning the rate of sterility caused by infections among women who have had abortions.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information requested is not collected centrally.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what information he has concerning the number of licensed abortion agencies which currently routinely screen potential clients for chlamydia infection.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The information requested is not routinely collected. We are aware, however, that some pregnancy advice agencies test their clients for chla infection prior to the insertion of intrauterine device in connection with infertility treatment.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of Sta Health if he will make a statement outlining the which have been taken by his Department to redu incidence of pelvic inflammatory disease and blockage following chlamydia infection during abo

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The form of treatment individual case is a matter for the clinical judgment doctor concerned.

Mrs. Ann Winterton: To ask the Secretary of Sta Health what guidance he has given to the Brook adv service and other abortion agencies in the last 20 about the need routinely to screen in advance chlamydia their potential abortion clients and to pres where appropriate, a course of antibiotics; and what he has taken to ensure that these guidelines are follo

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Brook advisory serv not registered as a pregnancy advice bureau. No guidance has been issued to Brook or any regis bureaux. The appropriateness of any particular test individual case is a matter for the clinical judgment o doctor concerned.

Residential Care

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for He what advice has been given by his Department to age concerned with the provision of drug and alcohol ser with regard to the funding of residential care after 1 A 1993.

Mr. Dorrell: None. We are currently consulting a the specific grant to local authorities. Under the ph introduction of community care local authorities expected to produce their plans, after consultation April 1992. Detailed arrangements for funding reside care for alcohol and drug misusers after 1 April 1993 yet to be decided.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for He what action his Department is able to take in the ever a local authority being unable to meet its duty to pro or arrange residential accommodation for elderly peop need of care and attention not otherwise available.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The provision of reside care is a local authority responsibility. They are expe to give priority to the discharge of their statutory du My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has def powers which can be used if a local authority fails to f its statutory duty under the National Assistance Act 1 to provide residential care to people in need of care attention which is not otherwise available to them.

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for He what plans he has to introduce legislation to ext registration procedures to small residential homes.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: We remain committed seeking an early opportunity for legislation to bring th small homes under regulatory control.

Service Providers (Voluntary Sector)

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Hea what assessment has been made by his Department of resource implications for service providers in the volunt sector of the implementation of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990; and what financial assistance is being made available to them by the Government.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Although grants are available from central and local government to voluntary sector provider agencies, our community care proposals urge local authorities to contract for services with voluntary sector providers. Guidance will stress the important role of local authorities in encouraging and facilitating the work of the voluntary sector. Authorities will still be able to offer grant support for non-service aspects of voluntary sector work.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if it is his intention to issue guidelines on the implementation of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990, for use of providers of services in the voluntary sector.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department will shortly issue policy guidance on community care which will be supplemented by practice advice from the social services inspectorate. Both guidance and practice advice will be addressed to health and local authorities and the Department intends that they will be of interest to all community care agencies, including voluntary and private sector providers.

Drug and Alcohol Services

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what assessment he has made of the implications of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990 for the assessment of care management of clients with drug and alcohol problems where there is a need for access to a national network of services to be maintained and a requirement for the provision of funding across existing local authority and health authority boundaries.

Mr. Dorrell: The policy guidance which is to be issued soon will emphasise the need for local authorities and health authorities to work together. The assessment of clients with alcohol and drug problems will need to take account of the range of services provided within the area or available elsewhere.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what response has been made by his Department following representations from agencies regarding the omission from the National Health Service and Community Care Act of provisions to take account of the special needs of drug and alcohol services.

Mr. Dorrell: Section 7E of the Local Authorities Social Services Act 1970 (inserted by section 50 of the NHS and Community Care Act 1990) empowers my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State to make specific grants to local authorities. One of these grants will be for voluntary organisations providing services for alcohol and drug misusers. The grant in 1991-92 will support expenditure of £2 million.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if it is the Government's intention to issue guidelines concerning the resolution of disputes between agencies over the responsibility for funding services for people with drug or alcohol problems, under the provisions of the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990.

Mr. Dorrell: Guidance which is to be issued soon will emphasise the need for joint working between all agencies concerned with funding community care services. There was wide-ranging consultation including voluntary and statutory authorities. Where there is dispute between health authorities and local authorities, advice may be sought from regional health authorities and the social services inspectorate.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what provision is being made by his Department under the National Health Service and Community Care Act 1990 to ensure that a uniform system for the assessment of persons with drug or alcohol problems is developed across the United Kingdom in order to avoid clients facing several assessments from various agencies before being offered appropriate services.

Mr. Dorrell: It is not the Government's intention to prescribe the detailed assessment procedures; these will be for local authorities to develop in partnership with other agencies. In assessing the social and health care needs of their residents, local and health authorities will need to ensure that people with alcohol or drug problems have access to a range of services which may be provided within the area or elsewhere. Where a specialist service is provided by a voluntary body under contract with a local authority, it will be possible for the contractual arrangements to include delegation of the assessment function.

King's College Hospital

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if the King's College hospital day surgery block will be used for national health service patients.

Mr. Dorrell: Yes.

Eye Tests

Mr. Robin Cook: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what was the number of national health service eye tests carried out between 1 April 1989 and 31 March 1990.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The number of NHS sight tests paid for by family health services authorities (formally family practitioner committees) in England and Wales between 1 April 1989 and 31 March 1990 was 5·572 million.

This figure includes approximately 1·7 million sight tests which were carried out before 1 April 1989 but paid for after that date.

Listeria Monocytogenes

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what research has been carried out to investigate the proposition that listeria monocytogenes, damaged by heating and growing in chilled conditions, are more infectious and dangerous than normal listeria monocytogenes.

Mr. Dorrell [holding answer 12 November 1990]: Research at the university of Würzburg, Germany has indicated that levels of haemolysin (a haemolysin is a chemical produced by bacteria which damages or destroys red blood cells (and other mammalian cells)) in some listeria monocytogenes (Lm) have been increased following recovery after heat shock. The production of haemolysin by some strains of Lm has been shown to be a marker for virulence in animals and tissue culture, and is believed to be relevant to the ability of the micro-organisms to cause disease in humans. However, the observed higher incidence of haemolysin following heat shock was followed by further work with certain strains of Lm. This showed no increase in virulence for animals or tissue cultures, suggesting that an increased level of haemolysin produced by the micro-organism may not be important in producing disease.

Research by other groups has shown that Lm cultured at low temperatures appears to be more virulent in an animal model following intravenous inoculation but not more virulent following introduction into the alimentary tract, that is, oral route.

Research continues into the virulence of this micro-organism at Würzburg and at the Pasteur institute in Paris. In the United Kingdom the public health laboratory service is embarking on work to establish virulence markers and work in this field is also taking place at the Moredun research institute in Edinburgh.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Disablement Benefit Gratuities

3. Dr. Godman: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the number of disablement benefit gratuities paid to claimants in the parliamentary constituency of Greenock and Port Glasgow, under regulation 13 of the Social Security (Industrial Injuries and Diseases) Miscellaneous Provisions Regulations 1986; and what has been the average amount of such payments.

Mr. Scott: This information is not available.

Child Benefit

4. Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the level of child benefit for the first-born child in each of the 12 Community countries.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The table shows that the United Kingdom rate of £7·25 a week is second only to the £7·77 shown for Belgium. From next April the United Kingdom rate will be £8·25.

Rates of child benefit in the 12 European Community states on the birth of a first-born child

Country	Maximum normal rates[1] £
Belgium	7·77[2,3]
Denmark	6·36[4]
France	Nil[4]
Germany	3·22
Greece	0·98[2,3,4]
Ireland	2·99
Italy	2·01[2,3,4]
Luxembourg	6·93
Netherlands	5·20
Portugal	2·15[2,4]
Spain	0·34[2,4]
United Kingdom	7·25[4]

[1] Rates quoted are weekly sterling equivalents (most EC countries pay benefits monthly) and have been converted from national currency using purchasing power parity rates. Rates quoted were correct at 1 January 1990.

[2] Benefits based on a contributory principle.
[3] Benefits have an element of means-testing.
[4] Extra amounts payable to certain families, eg, single parents.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) what plans he has to ensure that families eligible for income support and the £1 per week increase in child benefit for the first born do not lose all the child benefit increase;

(2) what is his most up-to-date estimate of the numbers of families with children on income support who will lose (a) all of the £1 per week in child benefit for the first born announced in the annual uprating, (b) 50p to £1 and (c) 0 to 50p.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: As a result of the recently announced uprating of social security benefits, more than 99 per cent. of families on income support will see an overall increase in their total benefits from April 1991. In the course of the uprating, increases in all benefits are generally taken fully into account, including the increase in child benefit paid to about 1·2 million families on income support. Insufficient information is available to estimate the number of families whose income support will be affected by less than £1 per week but this number is thought to be very low. There are no plans for changing the way child benefit is treated in income support.

Family Credit

7. Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average family credit payment and what was the average family income supplement payment in 1978-79 in current prices.

19. Sir Hal Miller: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the average family credit payment: and what was the average family income supplement payment in 1978-79 in today's prices.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The average amount of family credit in payment is around £30 a week. The average payment of family income supplement in March 1979 was £5·22 or £11·30 at current prices.

18. Mr. Burns: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many families benefit from family credit; and how many benefited from the predecessor scheme in 1978-79.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The latest available information is for the end of August when the family credit case load was 323,000. This compares with 78,000 families receiving family income supplement at the end of 1978-79.

24. Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is the latest figure he has for the number of families in receipt of family credit; and what was the comparable figure for family income supplement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The latest information is for the end of August when the family credit case load was 323,000. Family income supplement was in payment to 213,000 families immediately before that scheme came to an end in April 1988.

Invalidity Benefit

14. Mr. Ashley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he plans to change the gap between invalidity benefit and the take-home pay of the average worker.

Mr. Scott: We have no plans to change the formula for uprating invalidity benefit, which is uprated in line with the retail prices index.

Students (Income Support)

15. Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what plans he has to amend the present regulations to enable 19-year-olds in full-time relevant education to claim income support.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: We have no plans to change the income support regulations in this way.

Disabled People

16. Sir Geoffrey Johnson Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many disabled people and their carers have benefited from the Government's reforms made in the current year.

Mr. Scott: More than half a million disabled people and carers have benefited this year from the Government's reforms to disability benefits. Our proposals for improving disability benefits will add some £300 million to spending on disabled people by 1993-94 and will give extra help to an estimated 850,000 people. Spending on disabled people has increased in real terms by more than £4 billion since 1978-79 to a total of £8·3 billion in 1989-90.

22. Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many disabled people are paying back social fund loans; how many are paying back with deductions from other benefits; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Scott: As at 31 October 1990, 26,800 people with an income support disability premium were repaying social fund loans. Most of these will have been repaying by deduction from their benefit. A small number may have been repaying by other methods but a precise figure is not available. Since April 1990, 35,000 community care grants have been awarded to people with a disability premium. In 6,600 of these cases a grant was awarded where the application was for a budgeting loan.

Welfare Rights Agencies

20. Mr. Nicholas Brown: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received from welfare rights agencies regarding the availability of his Department's claims forms.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: There have been no such representations since August. New contracts for the national supply and distribution of all forms have been in operation since September.

Pensions

21. Mr. Donald Thompson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the cost of uprating the basic pension by £13 for a single person and £20 for a couple.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: My hon. Friend will be interested to know that the cost to the national insurance fund of uprating the retirement pension in this way would be approximately £6 billion. Such an increase would also mean a rise in the national insurance contributions paid by an employee on average earnings of approximately £2·93 per week and £5·34 for his employer.

Pensioners (Mortgages)

23. Mr. Tracey: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of pensioners make mortgage repayments; and how much of next April's rise in the basic state pension is attributable to rising interest and mortgage rates in the 12 months to September of this year.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to my hon. Friend the Member for Cambridgeshire, North-East (Mr. Moss) earlier today.

Mr. Bill Walker: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what proportion of pensioners make mortgage repayments; and how much of next April's rise in the basic state pension is attributable to rising interest and mortgage rates in the 12 months to September of this year.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: As my hon. Friend will be aware, the retirement pension will be increased by 10·9 per cent. from April 1991, honouring the Government's commitment to protect fully the value of the state pension against changing prices. The corresponding September figure for the retail prices index less mortgage interest payments was 9·5 per cent. The latest information shows that, in 1987 49 per cent. of pensioners owned their own homes and 4 per cent. were making mortgage repayments.

Residential Care Allowances

25. Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what consultations he has initiated consequently on receipt of the Price Waterhouse report on residential care allowances to charitable or other homes for the elderly.

Mr. Scott: The Price Waterhouse report was commissioned to provide background information for consideration as part of this year's uprating. Other interested parties provided comments or information that they wished to be considered.

Amputees

26. Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many amputees had their mobility allowance withdrawn or suspended in the last three years for which figures are available.

Mr. Scott: I regret that this information is not available. The Department's records do, however, show that of the 611,000 people currently receiving mobility allowance, 8,000 are shown as having amputation of a limb as the main cause of their inability to walk.

Benefits

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the cost in a full year of abolishing the capital rule and deemed income and basing benefit on actual income only for (a) housing benefit, (b) community charge benefit, (c) family credit and (d) age premium for retirement pensioners.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The cost in a full year of abolishing capital limits and tariff income for the income-related benefits and basing benefit on actual income from capital is estimated to be:

	1990-91 prices £ million
a. Housing benefit	60
b. Community charge benefit	70
c. Family credit	2
d. Income support	60

It is estimated that there would be no cost if the change was made only to income support for those receiving a pensioner premium.

Source: Modelled using data drawn from the 1985, 1986 and 1987 family expenditure surveys. Estimates of capital holdings are uncertain because they are imputed from reported income from investment and savings. The estimated costs quoted assume particular interest rate levels and patterns of capital asset holdings.

Mr. Brazier: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what would be the cost in a full year of abolishing the capital rule and deemed income and basing benefit on 10 per cent. of annual income only for (a) housing benefit, (b) community charge benefit, (c) family credit and (d) age premium for retirement pensioners.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The expenditure effect in a full year of abolishing capital limits and tariff income for the income-related benefits and basing benefit assessment on an assumed interest on savings of 10 per cent. is estimated to be:

1990-91 prices

	£ million
(a) Housing benefit	[1]10
(b) Community charge benefit	[2]20
(c) Family credit	[1]2
(d) Income support	[1]5

[1] Million saving.
[2] Million cost.

It is estimated that if the change were applied only to income support for those receiving pensioner premium there would be a saving of £30 million. Savings arise because 10 per cent. income would be assumed on the first £3,000 of savings, whereas at present there is no tariff income at this level, and because a 10 per cent. assumed income is higher than the present tariff income in the lower saving brackets above £3,000.

Source: Modelled using data drawn from the 1985, 1986 and 1987 family expenditure surveys. Estimates of capital holdings are uncertain because they are imputed from reported income from investment and savings.

Housing Benefit

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received on the proposed changes in housing benefit subsidies for 1991-92; what were the views of the local authority associations; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: I assume that the hon. Member is referring to the reduction from 97 per cent. to 95 per cent. in the rate of direct subsidy for community charge benefit and certain housing benefit cases from April 1991. We have received 24 written inquiries from Members of Parliament, 48 letters from individual local authorities, and a number of representations from the local authority associations which my right hon. Friend the Minister of State met to discuss the proposal on 24 September. The associations were opposed to the proposal and felt that benefit expenditure should be subsidised at 100 per cent. The Government's view is that the change is a modest adjustment in the balance between direct and indirect subsidy, the consequences of which were fully taken into account in the proposed local authority finance settlements for 1991-92.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security (1) how many residents of registered care or nursing homes would have their entitlement to housing benefit ended as a result of the Housing Benefit (General) Amendment (No. 3) Regulations 1990;

(2) what assessment has been made by his Department of the implications of the Housing Benefit (General) Amendment (No. 3) Regulations 1990 for the residential security of those residents in registered residential care and nursing homes who were previously entitled to housing benefit.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Under the proposals in the draft Housing Benefit (General) Amendment (No. 3) Regulations 1990, all those in a registered residential care or nursing home who were entitled to housing benefit on 29 October will retain entitlement under the current rules, as will all those who had submitted a claim for housing benefit on or before that date which is subsequently determined in their favour. In addition, residents of registered homes who are not entitled to the special rates of income support because they are in full-time work, or living in a home run by a close relative, will retain access to housing benefit for help with accommodation costs.

Information is not available about the numbers likely to be affected by the proposed changes. The special rates of income support will continue to be available to help meet the homes' fees for those in registered residential care or nursing homes with insufficient resources of their own.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations have been received by his Department with regard to the proposal to abolish housing benefit for residents of registered care homes.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: We are currently consulting with the Social Security Advisory Committee and the local authority associations on the proposals contained in the draft Housing Benefit (General) Amendment No. 3 Regulations 1990. That consultation process is not yet completed. We have also received a number of letters on the proposed changes from hon. Members and others.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he last met representatives of local authorities to discuss the adequacy of social security benefits to residents of registered residential care and nursing homes.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State met representatives from the Association of County Councils in April, when income support for people in residential care homes and nursing homes was discussed.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many residents of registered residential care or nursing homes in full-time employment are currently claiming housing benefit.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: This information is not available.

Community Charge Benefit

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people in Wales are currently receiving, under the poll tax benefit scheme (a) family premium, (b) pensioner premium and (c) disability premium.

Sir Ian Gilmour: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many and what proportion of (a) pensioners, (b) two-parent families with children and (c) lone-parent families with children, living in the inner London boroughs, he expects to claim community charge benefit; and how many have already done so.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information requested is not available.

Grants and Loans

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the cash totals spent in the current financial year to date, and the balances remaining for the rest of the financial year, for each of the DSS offices in Glasgow in respect of (a) community care grants, (b) budgeting loans and (c) crisis loans.

Mr. Scott: The information can be obtained from the Library.

Mobility Allowance

Sir David Price: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will publish in the Official Report the number of people receiving mobility allowance for each year since 1979.

Mr. Scott: The average number of mobility allowa beneficiaries for the years requested is in the table:

Year	Thousands
1979-80	140
1980-81	185
1981-82	210
1982-83	265
1983-84	315
1984-85	390
1985-86	420
1986-87	460
1987-88	515
1988-89	560
1989-90	615

Maintenance

Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State Social Security what proportion of fathers who are li to pay maintenance to their wives or former partners their children actually do so.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Information about fathers is available in the precise form requested. However, at M 1989, the latest date for which this information available, 23 per cent. of lone mothers receiving inc support were receiving maintenance payments.

Benefit Deductions

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for So Security how many claimants are currently having poll deductions made from their benefit; and if he will mal statement.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Just over 9,000 deductions community charge arrears were being made at 31 Au 1990.

Written Answers to Questions

Tuesday 20 November 1990

ENVIRONMENT

National Rivers Authority

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment when he expects to announce his Department's contribution to the National Rivers Authority budget for next year; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: I refer the hon. Member to the answer given by my hon. Friend the Minister for the Environment and Countryside on 14 November to my hon. Friend the Member for Boothferry (Mr. Davis), Official Report, Vol. 180, column 156.

Toxic Waste

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if he will estimate the number and location of toxic waste sites that are known to contain benzine.

Mr. Heathcoat-Amory: This information is not held centrally and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Housing Action Trusts

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many housing action trusts have been accepted and how many are in being.

Mr. Key: No housing action trusts have so far been established. Discussions are proceeding with the council and tenants in the London borough of Waltham Forest and Hull city council is consulting tenants about the council's proposal for a housing action trust for the North Hull estate.

Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment what is the cost of the consultants' fees for the Government's housing action trust programme to the end of October.

Mr. Key: At 31 October 1990 the following amounts had been spent on consultancies related to housing action trust proposals: Tower Hamlets, £182,000; Lambeth, £182,000; Southwark, £1,411,000; Sandwell, £191,000; Leeds, £161,000; Sunderland, £667,000; and Waltham Forest, £129,000.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment if, pursuant to his answer to the honourable Member for Taunton (Mr. Nicholson), Official Report, 14 November, column 562, he will list for each authority in the west midlands the numbers of adults on the poll tax register and the percentage, at the latest available date, who (a) have begun paying the poll tax and (b) are now seriously in arrears.

Mr. Key: The available information obtained from returns to the Department is given in the table. No information is available on the numbers seriously in arrears.

Authority	Number of people who have made a payment in respect of a personal community charge by 30 September 1990	Number of people liable who have not made a payment in respect of a personal community charge by 30 September 1990	Percentage making some payment
Coventry	189,403	41,693	82·0
Dudley	208,161	26,281	88·8
Sandwell	189,119	33,374	85·0
Solihull	158,100	16,315	90·6
Walsall	168,842	28,851	85·4

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment how many local authorities levy the standard charge for the poll tax at (a) zero, (b) one half, (c) one, (d) one and a half and (e) two times the personal charge for the area.

Mr. Key: Local authorities have the discretion to levy different multiples of the personal charge on different classes of unoccupied property. Information on the highest multiplier set on any class of property in an authority's area has been derived from returns by local authorities and is as follows:

Highest multiplier set	Number of charging authorities
0	16
0·5	0
1	33
1·5	5
2	300
[1]—	12

[1]Not known.

Mr. Blunkett: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment (1) if he will publish tables for each charging authority in England in receipt of safety net grant, classified by political control and the amount to be withdrawn, in (a) 1991-92 and (b) 1992-93, expressed both in £ million and £ per head;

(2) if he will publish tables for each charging authority in England presently contributing to the safety net, classified by political control and the amount they will gain in grants in 1991-92, expressed both in £ million and £ per head.

Mr. Portillo [holding answer 19 November 1990]: The revenue support grant transition report (England) sets out the adjustments made to the revenue support grant in 1990-91 as a result of the safety net. As announced in October 1989, there will be no contributions in 1991-92 when the safety net is replaced by area protection grant financed by the Exchequer.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State has proposed that, in each charging authority, area protection grant in 1991-92 should be no more than £25 per adult less than the combined 1990-91 benefit of the safety net and low rateable value areas grant.

I have today placed in the Library a table showing, in £ million and £ per adult, 1990-91 safety net adjustments plus low rateable value areas grant and 1991-92 proposed levels of area protection grant. The table also indicates the political control of the charging authority as at May 1990. Most areas are served by more than one local authority and the political control of other authorities may not be the same as that of the charging authority.

The table shows among other things that charge payers in Conservative authorities are contributing £354 million to the safety net this year; and that charge payers in Labour authorities will receive £409 million in 1991-92.

Under current proposals a further £25 per adult of 1991-92 area protection grant will be withdrawn in 1992-93—or the whole of the grant where this is less than £25. The amount withdrawn in £ millions will depend on the 1992-93 adult population.

United Nations Environment Fund

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for the Environment whether the United Kingdom plans to increase its contribution to the United Nations Environment Programme's environment fund in 1991.

Mr. Chris Patten: The Department's spending plans for 1991-92 include provision for a contribution of £4 million to the environment fund of the United Nations Environment Programme, £1 million more than our contribution in 1990. This will be the second successive annual increase in the United Kingdom's contribution to the fund. These increased contributions reflect our commitment to the important work which UNEP is undertaking on global environmental issues, pa in relation to the 1992 United Nations confe environment and development.

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Educational Psychologists

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of S Education and Science if he will publish the a specific funds that have not been allocated education authorities for the training of edu psychologists out of the sum which was made

Mr. Alan Howarth: The local education training grants scheme—LEATGS—for 1990-91 support for up to £2·8 million of expenditure on t training of educational psychologists. Local au have requested and been allocated support for spe some £2·5 million on such training.

LEA Administration Costs

Mrs. Gorman: To ask the Secretary of S Education and Science what is the average administration per pupil in (a) the Essex local e authority, (b) all local education authorities and local education authorities which comprise the authorities which contains Essex.

Mr. Fallon: The average budgeted cost o administration per pupil, as reported in management of schools annual budget state 1990-91, is £69 in Essex. This is calculated by div figure on the statement by the number of pupils maintained schools in Essex on 18 January 199 same basis, the average cost of central administr pupil in the 36 shire counties for which a sta available is £66. The coverage of the central admi figure in the statements differs between authori not possible to give a comparable national figur authorities without schemes for the local manag schools are not obliged to publish this informati

Nursery Education

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of Education and Science if he will list the scope, e cost of nursery education in each of the bor Greater Manchester.

Mr. Eggar: Information on the cost of this pr not available centrally. The boroughs' provi nursery education in January 1989 was as follo

	Nursery Schools			Nursery Classes
	Number	[1]Pupils	[2]Participation rate per cent.	[3]Number	[1]Pupils	[2]Pa ra
Bolton	5	485	6·4	44	2,300
Bury	2	166	3·6	25	1,079
Manchester	7	536	4·1	138	6,618
Oldham	—	—	—	46	2,174
Rochdale	8	922	14·6	17	928
Salford	18	851	14·2	71	2,289
Stockport	9	796	10·6	10	404
Tameside	4	332	5·5	41	2,077
Trafford	—	—	—	20	1,078
Wigan	2	176	2·1	30	1,962

[1] Pupils under 5 at January 1989.
[2] Number of pupils under 5 expressed as a percentage of the estimated 3 and 4 year old population.
[3] Number of primary schools with designated nursery classes.

Information on the extent of participation in nursery education in each local education authority is published annually in a statistical bulletin; the latest of which, No. 7/90, is available in the Library.

Course Fees

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what his policy is towards institutions of further and higher education imposing fees for courses of study previously covered by grants.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The Government have no plans to change the present arrangements whereby standard tuition fees are met from public funds for students qualifying for a mandatory award. However, actual tuition fee levels are properly for individual institutions to set.

National Curriculum

Mr. Pendry: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will accept the recommendations of the National Curriculum Council that art, music and physical recreation should be retained as compulsory subjects in the national curriculum for pupils up to the age of 16 years; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. Friend is considering the curriculum framework for 14 to 16-year-olds in the light of the National Curriculum Council's advice. He will make his views known as soon as possible.

Agricultural and Food Research Council

Mr. Hanley: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has received the annual report of the Agricultural and Food Research Council for 1989-90; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Alan Howarth: The annual report of the Agricultural and Food Research Council has been submitted to my right hon. and learned Friend under the requirements of the Science and Technology Act 1965, and a copy is being placed before the House today.

I was especially interested to read in the report about the success of Dr. Michael Berridge in winning the Albert Lasker medical research award for AFRC-sponsored work on molecular signalling; about the establishment of the AFRC centre for genome research at the university of Edinburgh; and about the work on anti-sense genes in fruit being funded at Nottingham university. I was pleased to read that the council has developed a £1·8 million research grants scheme to support younger research workers at an early stage of their career, and to learn of the council's success in attracting a total of £1·4 million from European Community funds for its work.

My right hon. and learned Friend and I congratulate the council on these and other achievements. We look forward to reading about further progress, under the council's new chairman, in next year's report.

Polytechnics

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on student numbers in polytechnics in 1990-91.

Mr. Kenneth Clarke: Provisional figures for the 1990-91 academic year published today by the Polytechnics and Colleges Funding Council and the Committee of Directors of Polytechnics show a 10·6 per cent. increase in the numbers of full-time and sandwich students in polytechnics compared with last year, and a 3·6 per cent. increase in the number of part-time students.

I very much welcome this dramatic increase in the numbers of young people in higher education in polytechnics. I look forward to this success being repeated in the next few years. The Government's policy is aimed at ensuring that an even higher proportion of our young people should receive good-quality higher and further education.

Polytechnics and colleges have clearly been encouraged in their recruitment decisions by the first stage of shift in the balance of public funding of higher education to tuition fees introduced by the Government for 1990-91. For every additional student enrolled beyond the plans announced last year, institutions will receive £1,675 compared with only £607 in 1989-90. In 1991-92, when differentiated fees are introduced, the average tuition fee in the sector will be nearly £2,200.

TRANSPORT

Roads (Stockport)

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what is the current cost of the road programme for which he is responsible within the Metropolitan borough of Stockport.

Mr. Chope: The figure is £112 million. This excludes that part of the proposed Manchester airport eastern link road within the borough for which costs are not yet available.

Bus Undertakings

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the bus transport undertakings taken over by Stagecoach Ltd. under the deregulation provisions; if he will list all bus services they have subsequently terminated; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: There is no requirement on the bus industry to notify the Department of Transport of takeovers. The latest published information on undertakings held by Stagecoach Ltd. is contained in the Monopolies and Mergers Commission report into the acquisition of Portsmouth Citybus Ltd. The termination or commencement of bus services is primarily a matter for the industry and the information requested could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what studies have been undertaken on mergers and transfers of bus undertakings since the deregulation provisions took effect; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. McLoughlin: The Transport and Road Research Laboratory is currently undertaking a study into the structure of the bus industry. This will include a general review of mergers and transfers of bus undertakings. The Monopolies and Mergers Commission has reported to the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry on a number of specific mergers.

Dock Labour Scheme

Mr. McCartney: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will list the companies formerly operating within the national dock labour scheme that declared themselves insolvent after the abolition of the scheme; how many companies are now trading under the same names as any of these companies; and how many companies now trading have the same directors.

Mr. McLoughlin: The regulations made under the Dock Work Act 1989 ensure that no formerly registered dock worker loses out because his employer is unable to meet his 50 per cent. share of the compensation payment. The Department has paid the full amount to the employees, through the companies' liquidators, in 14 cases which are listed in the table. I am unable to answer the remainder of this question. However, the Department relied on the liquidator to confirm that the companies were no longer trading; and in certain cases it asked the liquidator to undertake inquiries to establish that no transfer of undertaking had taken place.

Aberdeen Stevedores Ltd.
Anglosped Ltd. (Chatham)
Dundee Stevedores Ltd.
Fish Landing Temporary Employers (Aberdeen) Ltd.
Great Yarmouth Port Labour Co. Ltd.
Grimsby Port Services Ltd.
John Sutcliffe Consolidated Stevedores Ltd. (Grimsby)
Lindsey Dock Services Ltd. (Grimsby)
Liverpool Grain Storage and Transit Co.
Manisty Wharf Ltd. (Ellesmere Port)
Mersey Container Terminals Ltd.
Seahorn Marine Enterprises Ltd. (Liverpool)
West Langton Stevedores Ltd. (Liverpool)
Wisbech Stevedores Ltd.

Severn Bridge

Mr. Roy Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what representations he has received from solicitors acting for the bereaved concerning the design, installation and proper use of the gantry which plunged into the River Severn on 5 September involving two fatalities; what reply he has sent; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope [holding answer Monday 19 November 1990]: I am not willing to disclose the contents of correspondence between the solicitors acting for the bereaved families and the Department's solicitors.

ABS Brakes

Mr. David Marshall: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he has any plans to make it mandatory for motor manufacturers to fit ABS brakes as standard equipment on all new vehicles.

Mr. Chope [holding answer Monday 19 November 1990]: Under regulations made in September anti-lock brakes will be mandatory on all vehicles in the following categories manufactured on or after 1 October 1990:

Motor Vehicles over 16 tonnes authorised to tow trailers over 10 tonnes;
Trailers over 10 tonnes; and Inter-urban coaches.

Compulsory fitment of anti-lock brakes t categories of vehicle depends on Community agr But we are encouraging the wider use of anti-lock particularly on motorcycles.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Fire Service College

Mrs. Dunwoody: To ask the Secretary of State Home Department what level of funding will be p for the Fire Service college in the next year; and wh are being taken where local councils fail to su funds necessary for their firefighters to attend Service college.

Mr. John Patten: The planned level of fundin Fire Service college in respect of fire officers in and Wales for 1991-92 is £9·2 million, made up fr £6 million by a block contribution from the support grant and the balance from direct charge brigades. The exercise of the fire authorities' duty t that their fire brigade staff are effectively trai continue to be monitored closely by Her M inspectorate of fire services.

Wandsworth Prison

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of Stat Home Department if he will state the reason removal of Dr. Adam Lawrence from his post as consultant to Her Majesty's prison, Wandsworth

Mrs. Rumbold: Dr. Lawrence, a consultant p specialising in genito-urinary medicine, was in April this year to visit Wandsworth prison once a advise on patient care within his specialty. This wa arrangment instituted by the then senior medica Dr. Lawrence recently took part in a television pro in which he disclosed clinical details relating to Wandsworth prisoner with whose treatment he had been concerned, and criticised clinical decisi medical colleage. The senior medical officer co that these actions were not conducive to har working relations within the health care te informed Dr. Lawrence that he had decided to ma arrangements for the provision of specialist adv director of prison medical services fully supp action taken.

Security Services Tribunal

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for t Department if he has any plans to seek to an Security Service Act 1989 to allow the Security Tribunal to reveal to the individuals concer information that was held on them prior to 18 D 1989.

Mr. Waddington: No.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for t Department how many applications for a information the Security Services Tribunal has since December 1989; in how many cases it has the information requested; in how many case refused to provide the information; and what reasons given.

Mr. Waddington: The Security Service Tribunal is an independent body established by the Security Service Act 1989; I am not privy to its deliberations or to the number and nature of applications made to it. The tribunal is required to investigate complaints from any person who is aggrieved by anything which he believes that the Security Service has done in relation to him or to any property of his, if and so far as the complaint relates to anything done after the commencement of the Act, and to make a determination in accordance with schedule 1 to the Act. While paragraph 4(1) of schedule 2 to the Act enables the tribunal to gain access to such documents or information as it may require for the purpose of enabling it to carry out its functions under the Act, it is not empowered to seek on behalf of a complainant or any other person access to such documents or information. Indeed, paragraph 4(2) of schedule 2 to the Act requires the tribunal not to give any reasons for a determination notified by it, except in reports under paragraph 5(1)(b) of schedule 1.

Animal Experiments

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will ban those animal procedures involving LD50 and Draize tests.

Mrs. Rumbold: My right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary is not one of the Ministers reponsible for the national and international regulations under which specific safety testing protocols are required; nor is he a sponsoring Minister for biomedical research. His responsibility is for controlling the conduct of scientific procedures on living animals. We have no plans to refuse licences where my right hon. and learned Friend is satisfied that the work is justified under section 5 of the Animal (Scientific Procedures) Act 1986. The Government continue to play an active role in developing acceptable alternative methods of testing.

Mr. Julius Alexander/Mr. Shamusideen Oladehinde

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether Her Majesty's Government are continuing with their appeal in the cases of Mr. Julius Alexander of Hackney and Mr. Shamusideen Oladehinde; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: In a judgment on 18 October, the House of Lords dismissed the appeals of Mr. Alexander and Mr. Oladehinde. My right hon. and learned Friend will be reviewing their cases in order to decide whether to enforce deportation.

Psychiatric Bail Hostels

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to the likely cost of setting up a system of psychiatric bail hostels; and what estimate has been made of the present cost of keeping people who would benefit from such provision in prison.

Mr. John Patten: On the basis of discussions with probation areas and voluntary organisations, we calculate that the unit cost of any approved bail hostel places for mentally disordered defendants would approach twice that of conventional places at approved bail hostels which in 1989-90 stood at £10,000 per annum. It is not possible to separate out the cost of keeping a mentally disordered defendant in a local prison or remand centre without disproportionate cost, but the average cost per inmate in 1989-90 was about £16,000 per annum.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether any decisions have been made with regard to setting up a system of psychiatric bail hostels; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: We are considering what part bail hostels can play in a strategy for dealing with people who are mentally disordered, and shall announce our conclusion as soon as possible.

Although no final decisions have yet been taken, the Government are firmly of the view that mentally disordered offenders should be diverted from the criminal justice system wherever possible or receive appropriate placements and prompt psychiatric treatment where prosecution is necessary in the public interest. A Home Office circular providing details of the wide range of measures available for achieving this was issued to the courts and others on 3 September 1990. I have sent a copy to the hon. Gentleman.

Sentences

Mr. Chris Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department how many people serving life sentences, discretionary or mandatory, have tariffs of more than 20 years.

Mrs. Rumbold: There are some 150 life sentence prisoners whose cases will be, or have been, reviewed by the Parole Board for the first time after 17 years in custody, because the period considered necessary to mark the seriousness of their offences is more than 20 years.

Overseas Electors

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what information he has as to the number of overseas electors whose names were added to local electoral roles in each constituency; how much was spent promoting overseas the new rules and regulations; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: Information on the number of overseas electors who will be included in the 1991-92 electoral register will not become available until the publication of the draft register on 28 November. Approximately £425,000 has been or will be spent by the Home Office and the Foreign and Commonwealth Office in publicising overseas the new provisions on voting by British citizens living abroad.

Magistrates Courts

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will publish tables showing the cost of expenditure in magistrates courts for each of the last 10 years; and if he will set down in tabular form the percentage of these costs for each year met from local authority funds.

Mr. John Patten: Local authority expenditure on magistrates' courts in England and Wales and the amount of central Government grant paid in support of this expenditure since 1980-81 is set out in the table. Grant is paid at a rate of 80 per cent. of net current expenditure.

Before the present financial year, capital expenditure was supported by grant at 80 per cent. payable only in respect of revenue contributions and loan charges. Since April 1990 capital grant is paid at 80 per cent. on approved capital expenditure and on loans incurred before that date. Grant is not necessarily paid in the same year as that in which the expenditure is incurred.

Expenditure on magistrates' courts

	(1) Total expenditure (current and capital)[1] (£ million)	(2) Central government grants in support of (1) (£ million)	Local government expenditure as a proportion of total (1) minus (2) as a percentage of (1)
1980-81	102	85	17
1981-82	114	101	11
1982-83	124	105	15
1983-84	139	114	18
1984-85	152	121	20
1985-86	161	128	20
1986-87	178	134	25
1987-88	213	153	28
1988-89	235	170	28
1989-90	[2]273	187	32
1990-91	307	[3]280	9

[1] Excluding loan charges.
[2] Provisional figure.
[3] Estimate.

Probation Service

Mr. Andrew Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he expects the efficiency scrutiny of in-service training for the probation service to begin.

Mr. John Patten: The efficiency scrutiny of in-service probation training will begin on 26 November. It will have the following terms of reference:

"To examine the current arrangements for providing in-service probation training, and to advise and make recommendations on:

(a) what in-service training, including management training, should be offered to probation officers up to and including SPO grade;

(b) who should provide it and how;

(c) what it will cost and how it should be financed;

(d) how it should link with pre-qualifying training and management training for chief officers grades;

(e) what steps should be taken to monitor quality, relevance, effectiveness and consistency throughout the service, to measure performance and to ensure value for money; and

(f) what the line of accountability should be, and what structured systems and procedures are needed."

The scrutiny will be conducted by a small team of officials led by Dr. Savas Hadjipavlou of the Home Office. He will be closely assisted by Mr. Steven Murphy on secondment from the inner London probation service. We expect to receive the report during April 1991.

The scrutiny team will be consulting widely. Interested parties may wish to send their observations in writing to the In-Service Probation Training Scrutiny Team, Room 116/117, Home Office, Whittington house, 19-30 Alfred place, London WC1E 7LG.

Murderers (Release)

Mr. Tebbit: To ask the Secretary of State fo Department if he will update his reply to the ho for Beverley (Mr. Cran) of 13 July 1989, Offi column 638 concerning the numbers of peopl died at the hands of previously convicted kill

Mr. Waddington [holding answer 19 Noven Information on the number of suspects c homicide who had previous homicide con published annually in "Criminal Statistics, E Wales"—tables 4.9 and 4.10 of the latest issu Cm. 1322—copies of which are in the Library

During the period 1963 to 1989, a total of 5 England and Wales are killed by persons convicted of homicide.

Electoral Registration

Mr. Madden: To ask the Secretary of S Home Department (1) what rights of appeal p whose names are removed from an electo whether such persons are notified by electoral officers of an intention to remove a name and explanation; and what information electoral officers are required to supply in writing;

(2) if he will withdraw Home Office circul issued to electoral registration officers, registration of those persons whose names d on poll tax registers; and if he will make a st

(3) what is Government policy with res removal of names from electoral registers o have failed to register for poll tax purposes; a make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold [holding answer 19 Nover Circular RPA 347, issued by the Home C August 1990 as part of its guidance to electoral officers—EROs—in England and Wales, mad dations about the use of information in the charges register in the compilation of the elect This included a recommendation that a pe should not be carried forward from one elec to the next if that person does not respond to canvass and his or her name does not ap community charges register. It also recom where such a name does appear in the commu register it should not be carried forward for m year without further inquiries to establish eli

Under section 29 of the Local Government 1988, EROs in England and Wales may, for th exercising their functions, inspect the comm register of any charging authority. The pu Home Office guidance issued on 10 August w and encourage EROs to make the fullest and m use of this right of access, to assist in the prep accurate electoral register.

There is no procedure whereby names can from the published register. A person whose carried forward from one register to the nex or she has failed to respond to the canvass a appears to be eligible, has ample opportuni claim for inclusion in the register.

Asylum Seekers

Mr. Darling: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the number of people seeking asylum in the United Kingdom in each quarter of 1988, 1989 and 1990, showing the numbers by country of embarkation.

Mr. Peter Lloyd [holding answer 14 November 199
Information by nationality of applicant is given in table.

Applications received for asylum in the United Kingdom, by nationality, 1988-90

	1988				1989[1]				1990[1]
	Q1	Q2	Q3	Q4	Q1	Q2	Q3	Q4	Q1	Q2
Europe
Czechoslovakia	2	8	10	6	5	15	35	5	•	—
Hungary	15	5	7	9	10	•	5	5	•	•
Poland	25	19	26	18	10	10	15	15	5	5
Romania	4	2	13	3	5	5	•	5	5	20
Turkey	217	155	126	203	570	3,645	140	125	135	210
Yugoslavia	3	1	2	2	•	•	15	•	•	5
Others	—	9	8	5	10	15	25	20	30	35
Total	266	199	192	246	610	3,695	230	175	180	280
Americas
Chile	7	6	2	3	5	5	5	5	•	—
Colombia	21	15	15	9	20	15	30	25	20	55
Others	1	3	4	4	5	5	5	5	15	10
Total	29	24	21	16	30	30	40	30	35	60
Africa
Angola	11	11	15	23	40	35	95	90	135	200
Ethiopia	53	62	86	69	65	70	230	240	190	380
Ghana	51	43	45	48	45	75	90	135	220	170
Libya	25	18	12	4	5	•	5	5	•	5
Seychelles	32	14	15	16	15	5	10	15	10	5
Somalia[2]	70	73	125	154	420	345	1,005	930	475	510
South Africa	13	3	11	12	15	20	5	5	10	5
Sudan	3	11	18	16	25	25	45	60	60	40
Uganda	92	163	152	141	235	385	500	545	460	55
Zaire	37	33	38	75	100	105	200	315	450	440
Others	21	27	27	42	55	35	35	30	50	60
Total	409	458	544	600	1,010	1,100	2,220	2,365	2,070	2,360
Middle East
Iran	181	177	119	110	130	115	125	125	110	85
Iraq	66	48	113	75	105	60	120	105	160	195
Lebanon	57	43	32	48	25	20	50	95	100	55
Syria	—	2	8	—	5	5	5	•	•	5
Others	5	9	8	15	10	5	5	20	15	10
Total	309	279	280	248	270	205	310	345	380	350
Remainder of Asia
Afghanistan[3]	9	4	14	14	40	25	25	25	25	55
Bangladesh	—	7	6	2	5	5	•	•	5	15
India	20	61	87	179	140	150	180	255	340	320
Pakistan	125	85	129	57	40	55	65	135	190	155
Sri Lanka	167	101	105	134	190	260	550	1,055	785	705
Others	3	2	9	15	10	30	50	40	40	20
Total	304	260	350	401	430	520	875	1,510	1,385	1,270
Other and unknown nationalities	20	21	48	25	30	35	65	85	75	80
Grand Total	1,357	1,241	1,435	1,536	2,385	5,585	3,740	4,515	4,130	4,410

[1] Provisional figures: those for 1990 may understate because of delays in recording.
Figures rounded to the nearest 5, with "•" = less than 3.

[2] In addition, since mid 1990 certain applications by nationals of Somalia to the British High Commission in Dhaka are being processe locally: information on these cases is not yet available centrally.

[3] In addition, about 1,700 applications in 1988, 35 in 1989 and 30 during January to April 1990, by nationals of Afghanistan, made to t British High Commission in New Delhi, are being processed locally. Corresponding information since May 1990 is not yet available centrall

Small Shops

Mr. David Nicholson: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he last met representatives of OPEN to discuss the effects of the Shops Act 1950 on the trading position of small shops.

Mrs. Rumbold: The last meeting between Ministers and representatives of OPEN was held on 7 June 1989. Representatives of OPEN have met Home Office officials on several occasions since then to talk about ways of reforming the present law.

OVERSEAS DEVELOPMENT

Bangladesh

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the impact of the Gulf crisis upon Bangladesh's economy and development plans; and what assistance, in addition to existing overseas aid programmes, he proposes.

Mrs. Chalker: Iraq's invasion of Kuwait has affected the economies of many countries. The adverse balance of payments impact on the Bangladesh economy has been estimated at nearly $500 million in 1990-91 by the International Monetary Fund. This includes the loss of workers' remittances, a higher oil import bill and weaker export demand. Prompt domestic action by the Bangladesh Government has reduced to an estimated $260 million the additional external finance needed to maintain imports and real growth at their originally planned levels.

In addition to a substantial bilateral aid programme of over £50 million a year to Bangladesh, Her Majesty's Government have responded quickly with a contribution to the costs of repatriating refugees from the Gulf of whom many are from Bangladesh. This contribution, including Britain's share of European Community assistance, now amounts to £11 million.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has of the number of Bangladeshis still stranded as a consequence of the Gulf crisis, the cost of it in total to the Bangladesh Government; and whether he will now take further steps, including allocating Hercules aircraft and directly chartering United Kingdom civil aircraft, to help the stranded Bangladeshis return.

Mrs. Chalker: I understand that about 6,000 Bangladeshis remain in Kuwait and Iraq. These either cannot or do not wish to leave. The United Nations reports that by the end of September some 50,300 Bangladeshis had left; more than 14,000 were repatriated by the Government of Bangladesh itself, and the remainder by the international operation to which Britain contributed.

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what representations Her Majesty's Government will be making to the World bank meeting this month reviewing, mid-term, aid to Bangladesh.

Mrs. Chalker: The World bank meeting in Dhaka on 6 and 7 November examined the progress made by the Government of Bangladesh on the economic management action plan agreed at the annual aid group meeting last April.

The British delegation joined other World bank in commending the Bangladesh on their firm short-term efforts and their response to the proble Gulf crisis, but urging further action on structural issues. As well as general econ the United Kingdom referred to the im government, including responsiveness to the population, and accountability.

A further review of progress on the place at the next aid group meeting in

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of and Commonwealth Affairs what propo Government will present to the B Kingdom bilateral meeting scheduled f

Mrs. Chalker: The next meeting in ou of bilateral aid talks is now scheduled to in January 1991. These talks enable bo economic and aid management in the pr year; and to consider the likely shape future British assistance, taking due Bangladesh Government's own priorit resources available to Her Majesty's development activities in Bangladesh.

ATTORNEY-GENER

Appeals

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Attorn information he has on the number of in date as is convenient, in which an conviction has not been heard after a l three years.

The Attorney-General: On 12 Nov were six cases in the Criminal Appeal Of appeal against conviction was sought or conviction was pending which had bee foot for over three years.

Fraud Investigation

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Attorney-G been the results of the investigations o squad and the Metropolitan police department into allegations of fraud pri and subsequent to the merger of International Signal and Control Grou make a statement.

The Attorney-General: Inquiries int being carried on by the Serious Fra Metropolitan police in conjunction authorities in the United States of inquiries have not yet been completed.

Shops Act 1950

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Attor consideration has been given in respect of the Shops Act 1950 to the judgm Hoffmann in the High Court on 18 Ju

The Attorney-General: Enforcement 1950 is the duty of local authorities, a what consideration they have given to Mr. Justice Hoffmann's decision. Mr. Justice Hoffmann confirmed that it continues to be an offence for shops in England and Wales to be open for the serving of customers on Sunday other than in accordance with the provisions of the Act. It follows that local authorities continue to be subject to the duty of enforcement conferred on them by section 71 of the Act.

Local Authorities

Mr. Pawsey: To ask the Attorney-General when was the last time he issued guidance on any subject to local authorities.

The Attorney-General: Guidance to local authorities is a matter for my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment.

WALES

Welsh Medium Schools

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will take steps to review the policies being pursued by local education authorities in Wales to ensure that children who wish to have their primary or secondary education in Wales at a Welsh medium school are able to do so in conditions and circumstances that are in no way inferior to those available for English medium schools in Wales.

Sir Wyn Roberts: We expect local education authorities to pursue policies which enable them to discharge their statutory responsibilities for the education of all children at maintained schools irrespective of the medium of education.

In the exercise of my responsibilities I am concerned to ensure parity between English medium and Welsh medium provision so far as practicable. For example, the national curriculum provides for the assessment of pupils at all key stages through the medium of either English or Welsh. Welsh medium assessment materials will be of comparable standard to those in English. Moreover central Government continue to give substantial financial support for the development of Welsh medium teaching materials generally.

It is for local education authorities to determine their own priorities for allocating capital resources for the provision of educational buildings and their capital maintenance, bearing in mind the needs of both the English and Welsh medium sectors.

Local education authorities are also responsible for ensuring that schools have adequate funds to meet the cost of essential equipment. The introduction of local management of schools will ensure a fair distribution of resources and will provide schools with the flexibility to decide their own education priorities.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what is his latest estimate of the number of persons in Wales liable to poll tax who have not yet made any payment.

Mr. Grist: The information requested is not available centrally.

Cardiganshire

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of St Wales how many people reside in Cardiganshire; were the corresponding figures for 1960 and 1970; he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Estimates of the population area of Ceredigion, known prior to 1974 as Cardiga are given in the following table. As the definition population was changed following the 1981 censu estimates for the years 1971 to 1981 were recalculate 1971 data are given on both bases for comparison.

Mid year	Home population	Usuall residen population[1]
1960	53,300	n/a
1970	53,200	n/a
1971	54,000	55,70
1989	n/a	69,00

[1] This 1981 Census based estimate differs from the population definition in that all usual residents, including st armed forces, are included whatever their nationality.
Source: OPCS.

Live Horses (Export)

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of Sta Wales if he will make a statement on the progr negotiations with the European Community on w standards for live horses for export from Wales after Sir Wyn Roberts: Only one Community meetin been held to discuss the Commission's proposa protection of animals during transport. We wi pressing to retain controls on the export of horse ponies.

Labour Statistics

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of Stat Wales if he will publish a table showing the unemploy rate by age for each Welsh district, travel-to-work are parliamentary constituency.

Sir Wyn Roberts: Unemployment rates are calculated for individual districts or parliame constituencies. The unemployment rates for travel-to-work areas are available from the NO database, which can be accessed on-line by Hou Commons Library staff. Separate rates for particula groups are not available.

Mr. Rod Richards

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for W further to his reply of 13 November, Official Re column 106, if he will make a further statement o range of subjects on which Mr. Rod Richards wi expected to advise him.

Sir Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend has nothi add to the answer he gave the hon. Gentleman o November.

DEFENCE

Trident

Mrs. Fyfe: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what are the earliest possible contractual dates for completion for the Trident-related contracts with GEC, Plessey, Rolls-Royce, Tarmac and Vickers Shipbuilding and Engineering Ltd.

Mr. Alan Clark: I refer the hon. Member to the answer I gave her on 26 July 1990 at column 541, and to my reply dated 21 September 1990 to her letter of 30 August 1990.

Nuclear Weapons Testing

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make a statement on the nuclear weapons testing programme.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The United Kingdom carried out an underground nuclear test at the United States Department of Energy's Nevada test site on Wednesday 14 November. Such tests are carried out under the 1958 United States-United Kingdom agreement for mutual co-operation for defence purposes and are necessary to maintain the effectiveness of the nuclear deterrent.

Damage to Property

Mr. Hunter: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what is his policy on compensating, or making ex gratia payments to, his Department's employees whose personal property is damaged on his Department's premises by people unlawfully present on his Department's premises.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: While my Department pays compensation where it is legally liable to do so, it cannot generally be held responsible for the acts of persons unlawfully present on the Department's property. However, the Department, exceptionally, considers small value claims from its employees for damage to personal property sustained on the Department's premises on an ex-gratia basis.

Officers' Married Quarters

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence how much is currently being spent on the renting of residential accommodation for RAF officers in the Greater London area as a consequence of the shortfall in the availability of officers' married quarters in the area.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The RAF no longer rents residential accommodation in lieu of married quarters. An excess rent allowance is paid to compensate married service personnel for higher costs incurred in renting private accommodation, but the information on that paid for RAF officers in the Greater London area is not readily available and could be provided only at disproportionate cost.

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will indicate the present position with regard to the availability of RAF officers' married quarters in the Greater London area; and what effect the planned disposal of officers' married quarters at RAF Biggin Hill is expected to have on the supply of such accommodation.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: The number of RAF officers' married quarters in the Greater London area is adequate for our needs. In view of the anticipated reduction in the requirement for officers' married quarters in the Greater London area in the medium to long term, the planned disposal of the RAF officers' married quarters at RAF Biggin Hill is not expected to affect the situation adversely.

RAF Biggin Hill

Sir John Hunt: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence what recent reductions have taken place in the establishment at RAF Biggin Hill; and what effect such reduction in posts there will have on the anticipated savings from the pending closure of RAF Biggin Hill.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Following a review of RAF catering manpower scales, on which establishments are based, a small number of posts has recently been disestablished at RAF Biggin Hill. The disestablishment of these posts ahead of relocation of the RAF officer and aircrew selection centre does not significantly affect the anticipated savings attributable to the closure of RAF Biggin Hill.

Welsh Army Headquarters

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will make it his policy to continue to maintain a separate Welsh headquarters base for the Army at Brecon, commanded by a General as at present, and not to merge Welsh headquarters with those in other areas.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: I have already announced that the district structure of the United Kingdom land forces has been the subject of a review by the commander in chief. Consideration of the recommendations of that review is now at an advanced stage and I expect to be able to make an announcement on the way ahead in the near future.

Military Installations

Mr. Livsey: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence whether it remains the policy of his Department to comply with planning procedures for new military installations.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: Although developments by the Crown do not require planning permission, it remains the policy of the Ministry of Defence to follow the provisions laid down in the appropriate DOE, Welsh Office and Scottish Office circulars.

Technology Exports

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he will list all proposed orders and contracts known to Her Majesty's Government which have been thwarted due to the NATO ban on exporting high technology to communist countries; what was the purpose and value in each case; and whether it is proposed to lift the ban.

Mr. Sainsbury: I have been asked to reply.

No. It has been the practice of successive Governments not to comment on individual licensing matters. While there has been a significant relaxation of export controls maintained for strategic reasons in the light of recent developments, and work is continuing with our COCOM partners, certain controls on exports of sensitive technology and equipment continue to be necessary.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Western Sahara

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when he last met representatives of Polisario to discuss the problems of Western Sahara; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has not met any Polisario representative, but there have been occasional informal meetings between Foreign and Commonwealth Office officials and representatives of Polisario.

Kuwait

Mr. Winnick: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if he will make a statement on the latest position of Her Majesty's Government's policy over the continuing occupation of Kuwait.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We want to see the United Nations Security Council resolutions fully implemented. We seek complete and unconditional Iraqi withdrawal from Kuwait, the restoration of its legitimate Government and the release of all foreign nationals held in Iraq and Kuwait. As my right hon. Friend the Prime Minister told the House on 7 November, either Saddam Hussein should voluntarily leave Kuwait or he will be forced to withdraw.

Iraq

Mr. Wareing: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what information he has on the effect that economic sanctions against Iraq are having on that country's economy; what measures need to be taken to make them more effective; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: As my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs told the House on 8 November, the international embargo continues to be broadly effective. Iraq's access to foreign exchange has been drastically reduced. Iraq's manufacturing and industrial capabilities have been particularly affected. Food rationing has been introduced. However, on the evidence available, sanctions alone are unlikely to be decisive in reversing Iraqi policy in the near future.

Mr. Ashton: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs when the hon. Member for Bassetlaw may expect a reply to his letter of 15 October concerning the situation of Mr. Mel Hewson of The Orchard, Station road, Walkeringham, Nottinghamshire, and Mr. Roland Hornsby of High street, North Leverton, Nottinghamshire, who are detained in Al Qaim in Iraq.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: I have replied today to the hon. Member's letter of 18 October. We have great sympathy for the plight of Mr. Hewson and Mr. Hornsby.

Cayman Islands

Mr. Conway: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has for reviewing the constitution of the Cayman Islands; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs has agreed to a request from the legislative assembly in the Cayman Islands for a constitutional review. He has appointed Sir Frederick Smith KA QC, chief justice in the Turks and Caicos Islands, and Mr. Walter Wallace CVO CBE DSC, constitutional adviser on the dependent territories to the Foreign and Commonwealth Office, as commissioners. The commission will sit for eight weeks, beginning in January 1991.

ENERGY

Energy Conservation

Sir Thomas Arnold: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what steps he is taking to accelerate energy conservation programmes for domestic housing.

Mr. Baldry: My Energy Efficiency Office is taking a number of initiatives further to promote energy efficiency in housing. These include the introduction from 1 January 1991 of the home energy efficiency scheme, which provides a new system of grants for insulation and advice on energy for low-income households; a winter advertising campaign promoting a new set of informational material targeted on home movers and those improving their homes; and an information campaign which aims to draw landlords' attention to the opportunities and benefits of improving the energy efficiency of their residential property. In addition, the EEO will be working with commercial labelling systems, such as MVM Starpoint and the national home energy rating scheme, in seeking to promote the benefits of home energy labels.

The EEO is also supporting work to improve the energy efficiency of housing under its best practice programme. Independently monitored case studies and guidance literature are available to building professionals and those responsible for the management of our housing stock. This information is backed up by a comprehensive programme of seminars and workshops, some involving other organisations active in the housing sector. In addition, funds are available to contribute towards relevant research work.

Nuclear Safety

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy when he expects the prototype computerised safety system for Sizewell B to receive clearance from the nuclear installations inspectorate; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Baldry: A prototype of the computer-based element of the proposed protection system for Sizewell B is currently being tested, but no part of the prototype hardware will be used on the reactor. The Health and Safety Executive's nuclear installations inspectorate—NII—will continue to assess the protection system throughout the construction of the plant. The NII will not permit fuel loading, currently programmed for December 1993, until it has approved Nuclear Electric's safety case for the complete protection system.

Civil Defence

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy how many civil servants are currently employed (a) full time and (b) part time by his Department on civil defence; what the total costs of employing staff on civil defence duties were in 1989-90; what the total costs of employing staff on civil defence duties are expected to be in 1990-91; and whether he has any plans for these staff to be transferred to work on other duties.

Mr. Wakeham: The information requested is as follows:

Number of staff currently employed full-time on civil defence	Number of staff currently employed part-time on civil defence	Total costs 1989-90	Estimated-total cost 1990-91
		£'000	£'000
4	10	270	260

Future levels of staffing and expenditure on civil defence will depend on the outcome of the review announced by my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department on 16 October, Official Report, column 773.

Gas Prices

Mr. McWilliam: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what was the percentage increase in price in each of the last 10 years from November 1980 for gas consumers using 25,500 therms per annum.

Mr. Wakeham: The increase over the year to November 1990 was 8·8 per cent. Prices at this specific level of consumption are not available to the Department prior to 1989. Should the hon. Member write to British Gas the company might be able to provide earlier data.

Coal Prices

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will place in the Library (a) a copy of the favourable position notice issued in July by the competition directorate of the European Commission in relation to the exemption of the three-year contracts between British Coal, National Power and PowerGen, (b) a copy of the correction notice issued to that notice in August in relation to the outstanding complaints as regards discriminatory coal pricing and (c) any further correspondence between the Commission and the Department of Energy on this issue.

Mr. Baldry: The notices referred to are contained in the Official Journal of the European Communities dated 31 July 1990—No. C 191—and 13 September 1990—No. C 228—copies of which are already held in the Library of the House.

It has been the policy of successive Governments to treat correspondence with the Commission as confidential.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy if he will make it his policy to place in the Library a copy of the letter of comfort from the competition directorate of the European Commission, relating to contracts between British Coal, National Power and PowerGen.

Mr. Baldry: My reply of 19 November referred to the letter from the Commission's directorate-general for competition to British Coal. Any release of that letter is a matter for them.

Electricity Privatisation

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what supporting evidence, in the form of artisitic works, was adduced by MCA Merchandising of Universal Studios to substantiate its claim for (a) licence fees and (b) redress for alleged breach of copyright re the Frank N. Stein advertising campaign for the flotation of the electricity distribution companies and his similarity to Herman Munster of the Munsters.

Mr. Baldry: Visual evidence and supporting explanations were supplied by MCA Merchandising, in support of its claim for licence fees. The claim for alleged breach of copyright is a matter between the advertising agency, WCRS, and MCA Merchandising.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Energy what policy considerations in relation to intellectual property rights affected the decision to authorise payments (a) in purchase of a licence and (b) as settlement for alleged breach of copyright to the MCA Merchandising subsidiary of Universal Studios in respect of Herman Munster's similarity to Frank N. Stein.

Mr. Baldry: The payment of a licence fee was a commercial decision based on legal advice. No policy considerations in relation to intellectual property rights applied in this respect. The settlement for alleged breach of copyright was a matter for WCRS and MCA Merchandising.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Food Products, Devon

Mr. Speller: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food, pursuant to his answer of 12 November, Official Report, column 68, if he will list the sales of speciality food or drink products from Devon that Food From Britain has supported during 1989 and 1990.

Mr. Curry: Since March 1987 Food From Britain has provided Devon Fare, a speciality food group in Devon, with financial assistance under the speciality food groups scheme amounting to more than £21,000 and with professional and technical advice. The group has supported its members in a variety of ways, and thus sales of many of their products have benefited from Food From Britain's help. However, neither Food From Britain nor this Department holds lists of these sales.

Live Animals (Export)

Sir Charles Irving: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether lorry drivers have sole responsibility for the implementation of safeguards and directives in the transport of live animals to foreign countries; and who receives and acts upon the safeguards and directives once they are handed over.

Mr. Maclean: Community directives on the protection of animals during international transport are implemented by each member state under its national law. United Kingdom welfare legislation places a duty of care on all persons involved in the carriage of animals. Companies as well as individuals have been successfully prosecuted for causing or permitting injury or unnecessary suffering to animals during transport.

Wine and Beef Exports

Mr. Teddy Taylor: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what is the total amount of wine and beef which was exported from the European Community in the most recent annual period for which figures are available; what subsidy was available for such sales expressed in pence per litre or pence per pound, respectively; and what was the range of sale prices after export subsidies and other grants.

Mr. Curry: The total amount of wine and beef exported from the European Community for the most recent annual period for which figures are avaailble were as follows:

Beef (July 1989-June 1990) 763,105 tonnes (product weight)

Wine (May 1989-April 1990) 11,095,709 hectolitres

Official statistics on the range of sale prices after the payment of export refunds are not available.

Rates of export refund for beef vary according to the category of animal, type of meat and destination; those applicable at the end of the period for the export figures provided were published in the Official Journal of the European Communities—Reference L129/0 of 19 May 1990 page 21. The export refunds are set in ecu per unit weight or unit volume. One ecu/tonne converted at the United Kingdom agricultural conversion rate is equal to 0·03614 pence/pound.

Rates of export refund for wine during the period for the export figures provided were published in the Official Journal of the European Communities—Reference No. L73 of 17 March 1989 page 20. The rate of conversion applicable was:

up to 31 August 1989 one ecu/hectolitre = £0·675071/litre up to 10 January 1990 one ecu/hectolitre = £0·701383/litre from 11 January 1990 one ecu/hectolitre = £0·704335/litre

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Steel Industry

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what is his Department's policy on the retention of Glasgow as a British Steel price-basing point.

Mr. Leigh: Price-basing points are a matter for the European Commission under article 60 of the treaty of Paris. So far as I am aware, neither the Commission nor British Steel has suggested that the Glasgow point should be removed.

Mr. Sillars: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will set out in detail the powers within British Steel which he may exercise as the holder of the golden share.

Mr. Leigh: The rights attaching to the special rights redeemable preference share in British Steel plc are set out in article 5 of the company's articles of association. The special share is held by my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State and allows him, or his duly authorised representative, to attend and to speak, but not to vote, at any general meeting or at any meeting of any class of shareholders of the company. The special share also provides that written consent of my right hon. Friend is required: for changes to article 46 of the company's articles of association which currently prohibits any person, other than as specifically permitted, from retaining an interest, either alone or as part of a voting concert party, in 15 per cent. or more of the company's share capital; for the creation or issue in certain circumstances of shares with voting rights attached; for changes to article 5 of the articles of association, or to the definition of "special share" and "special shareholder" in article 2; and for the voluntary winding up of the company.

Consumer Goods

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the reasons why the output of consumer goods has remained static since mid-1988.

Mr. Leigh: The performance of the consumer goods sector as a whole is clearly influenced by developments in the economy generally. But the performance of individual companies in the sector depends on the extent to which they meet the needs of their customers.

Rainham Marshes

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement on assistance given or offered to MCA and Universal Studios in respect of the proposed theme park development at Rainham Marshes.

Mr. Leigh: The Government have made no offer of financial assistance to MCA for the development of its proposed theme park at Rainham Marshes. However, the Government have offered MCA limited financial assistance for further site survey work at Rainham Marshes to establish the degree of contamination of the site and the likely remedial costs.

Morocco

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry whether any arms are being sold by British companies to Morocco.

Mr. Sainsbury: Defence and defence-related equipment for sale to Morocco or elsewhere which is subject to export control under the Export of Goods (Control) Order 1989 requires an export licence. In the past 12 months nine licences have been issued to British companies for the export of such equipment to Morocco.

Multi-fibre Arrangement

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if he will make a statement outlining the principles which are currently being adopted by United Kingdom negotiators on the future of the multi-fibre arrangement.

Mr. Sainsbury: The United Kingdom supports the EC's policy that the multi-fibre arrangement should be phased out over a transitional period after the expiry of its latest extension next year. This would be part of a general settlement of the GATT Uruguay round bringing about stronger GATT rules and disciplines and improvements in market access which will assist British textile exporters.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what assessment he has made of the effect on the numbers of jobs lost in each of the next 10 years if the multi-fibre arrangement is phased out prior to agreements being reached to tighten general agreement on tariffs and trade rules on dumping, subsidies, protection of intellectual property and increased access to markets.

Mr. Sainsbury: The study of Professor Silberston for my Department concluded that the termination of the MFA would lead to job losses of between 16,000 and 33,000 in the textile and clothing industry. It was based on the assumption of an immediate end to the MFA, but did not specify over what period the jobs would be lost. Furthermore, the estimate took no account of the effect of changes in the GATT rules mentioned by my hon. Friend. Such changes, and the phasing out being over a period of years, will mitigate considerably the effect of the ending of the MFA. It is not practical to make assessments in the form he suggests. In any event, it remains the European Community's policy, which the Government support, that the phasing out of the MFA should be part of a final Uruguay round package covering agreements on market access and strengthened rules and disciplines.

Rolls-Royce Engines

Mr. Mullin: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what action he has taken regarding the proposed export of attack/trainer aircraft powered by Rolls-Royce engines by Yugoslavia to Burma in contravention of the United Kingdom's export licensing agreement for the engines.

Mr. Sainsbury: It has been the practice of this and previous Administrations not to comment on individual export licensing cases.

Aid and Trade Provision

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry (1) if his Department has considered criticisms made by the National Audit Office of the administration and control of aid and trade provision; and if he will make a statement;

(2) if his Department has considered comments made by the Public Accounts Committee on the administration and control of aid and trade provision; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 14 November 1990]: The aid and trade provision—ATP—forms part of Britain's overseas aid programme. It is jointly administered by my Department and by the Overseas Development Administration. Both Departments consider all reports which comment on the administration and control of ATP. In particular they have considered the recent National Audit Office report on "Bilateral Aid to India" and the subsequent Public Accounts Committee report.

The ODA reply to the Public Accounts Committee report on bilateral aid to India was published in a Treasury minute on the 19-25 report from the Committee of Public Accounts in October 1990 (Cm 1247). A copy is available in the Library of the House.

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry if his Department has considered comments made by the Foreign Affairs Committee on the administration and control of aid and trade provision; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Sainsbury [holding answer 14 November 199
The aid and trade provision—ATP—forms part Britain's overseas aid programme. It is jointly admi tered by my Department and by the Overs Development Administration. Both Departments consi all reports which comment on the administration control of ATP. In particular they have considered report of the Foreign Affairs Committee "Bilateral A Country Programmes" published in 1987.

The Government's reply to the report was publishe observations by the Government to the report publishe October 1987. A copy is available in the Library of House.

NATIONAL FINANCE

Millionaires

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Chancellor of the Exchequ what information he has as to the number of millionai in Britain in 1974, 1979, 1984 and 1989, or the la convenient date.

Mr. Maude: Estimates of the number of individual the United Kingdom owning wealth of £1 million or m in each of the years 1979 to 1988 are available in table of an article entitled "Estimates of the distribution personal wealth" in the October 1990 edition of *Econo
Trends*. The estimates for 1987 and 1988 are provisio
Estimates for 1974 are not readily available.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Tom Clarke: To ask the Chancellor of Exchequer if he will publish in the Official Re up-to-date figures, on the same basis as those provide the hon. Member for Newcastle upon Tyne, East ( Brown) in the Official Report, 5 July, columns 699-7 giving figures for Scotland only and including the effect the introduction of the community charge.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 19 November 1990]: I not possible to produce separate estimates for Scotla

EC Taxation

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Chancellor of Exchequer what is his present policy in respect of introduction of European Community-wide taxat measures.

Mr. Maude [holding answer 19 November 1990]:
shall continue to support progress towards removing fi barriers where this is necessary to achieve the effici working of the single market, but centrally determined harmonisation is neither necessary nor desirable for purpose.

Monetary Aggregates

Mr. Nicholas Bennett: To ask the Chancellor of Exchequer if he will give his latest estimates for the gro in monetary aggregates; and if he will make a statem

Mr. Maples [holding answer 16 November 1990]:
provisional money figures for October are contained in Bank of England's press release of 20 November, a cop which is held in the Library of the House. The growth of narrow money, M0, was inside its target range of 5 per cent. for the third successive month.

HEALTH

Expenditure

14. Mr. Moate: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what are the latest figures for capital expenditure and revenue expenditure on the national health service hospital services; and what were the comparable figures in 1979.

Mr. Waldegrave: This year expenditure on the hospital and community health services in England is expected to be some £17·2 billion, a real terms increase of 40 per cent. over the 1978-79 figure of £4·9 billion.

South East Thames RHA

15. Mr. Bellotti: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he has any plans to increase the funding for the South East Thames regional health authority.

Mr. Dorrell: Between 1978-79 and 1989-90 spending in the South East Thames region has increased from £419 million to £1,220 million, or nearly 25 per cent. in real terms. I am confident that South East Thames will continue to benefit from the development of the NHS made possible by this Government's stewardship.

Specialist Services

16. Mr. Campbell-Savours: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what arrangements he has in place for the monitoring of specialist services provided to health authorities in the Northern region.

Mr. Dorrell: The provision of health services in any region is a matter for district and regional health authorities.

Waiting Lists

17. Mrs. Currie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the initiatives by the John Yates Consultancy on hospital waiting lists.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: This initiative has been very successful. The number of patients wating over one year in the 43 lists studied by John Yates's team last year has virtually been halved. Early results from this year's study of 100 long lists are very encouraging—numbers waiting over one year have already reduced by a quarter, and further reductions are expected by the end of March 1991.

Breast Cancer

19. Mr. Viggers: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on recent developments in the diagnosis of breast cancer.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The United Kingdom is the first country in the European Community to launch a nationwide programme of breast cancer screening based on computerised call and recall. By detecting cancers at an early stage the programme will help to reduce mortality from this disease. It will make a significant contribution to the health of the women of this country.

Dentists

20. Mr. Harry Greenway: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how the level of dentists' remuneration will be affected by the new dental contract.

Mr. Dorrell: The amount dentists are paid is a matter for the independent doctors and dentists review body.

North East Thames RHA

21. Mr. Spearing: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what proportion of the capital expenditure of the North East Thames health authority he expects it to obtain from sales of land.

Mr. Dorrell: I understand from North East Thames regional health authority that it currently expects that £23·7 million of total capital expenditure by authorities within the region will be funded from land sales. This is equivalent to 23 per cent. of total capital spending.

Financial Deficits

22. Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what action health authorities are taking to clear financial deficits.

Mr. Dorrell: Measures to be taken by individual health authorities are for agreement between the region and the district concerned.

Health Services, Wakefield

23. Mr. O'Brien: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he last met the chairman of the Yorkshire health authority to discuss health services in Wakefield.

Mr. Dorrell: My right hon. and learned Friend the then Secretary of State for Health met Sir Bryan Askew on 26 September 1990 to discuss health service issues.

Minor Surgery

24. Mr. David Shaw: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what changes there have been in the number of minor surgery sessions being carried out by general practitioners since April.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Following the introduction on 1 April 1990 of a specific payment for GPs providing minor surgery, over 40,000 minor surgery sessions have been held. This means that some 200,000 patients have been saved the inconvenience of attending out-patient departments. Earlier information is not available.

Residential Care

25. Mr. McAvoy: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the implications for his policy on residential care of the findings of the General Medical Association's recent survey.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I understand that the hon. Member's question concerns a survey carried out among its members by the Association of Metropolitan Authorities which inquired about the funding of independent care homes. Our policy remains that residential care should continue to be available for those who need it. The Government's community care proposals, which become fully effective from April 1993, should ensure that this is the case.

27. Mrs. Golding: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what steps he is taking to ensure that persons in residential care are enabled to have individual rooms if they so desire.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I refer the hon. Member to the reply I gave the hon. Member for Tottenham (Mr. Grant) earlier today.

NHS Trusts

26. Mr. Stern: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a statement on the first round of applications for self-governing trust status.

29. Mr. Bradley: To ask the Secretary of State for Health when he expects to announce his decisions on national health service trust applications.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Public consultation has finished on applications for self-governing status. My right hon. Friend will consider the results of the consultation together with the applications and will announce his decision shortly.

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list all the letters of interest submitted to the trust unit for consideration for possible trust status applications.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: All units which expressed an interest following the issue of EL(89)MB 64, a copy of which is available in the Library, are shown in the table. Not all of these subsequently made a formal application to become a trust in April 1991. Expressions of interest are now being received from units which may wish to become NHS trusts from April 1992. My right hon. Friend hopes to make an announcement soon.

National Health Service Trusts—List of expressions of interest

Northern
Aycliffe Hospital and Mental Health Services
Blood Transfusion Service (Northern RHA)
Darlington Hospital and Community Services
Freeman Hospital, Newcastle
Hartlepool District
Mental Illness Services in Gateshead
Newcastle General Hospital
Newcastle Mental Health Services
Northumbrian Ambulance Service
Northgate Hospital
North Tyneside District
North Tees Hospital and Community Services
North West Durham hospital and community services
Royal Victoria Infirmary and Dental Hospital
South West Durham Community Services
South West Durham Mental Health Services
—16

Yorkshire
Bradford Acute Services
Bradford—Psychiatric Unit Hospital Trust
Calderdale Hospitals, Calderdale Health Authority
Leeds General Infirmary and associated Hospitals
Grimsby DGH and associated services
High Royds Hospital Mental Health Services, Leeds Western
St. James's University Hospital, Leeds
Seacroft and Killingbeck Hospitals, Leeds Eastern Wakefield District—Mental Health Unit Wharfedale General Hospital, Leeds Western
—10

Trent
Bassetlaw
Doncaster Royal Infirmary and Montagu Hospital
Lincolnshire Ambulance Service
Nether Edge Hospital, Sheffield
Northern General Hospital, Sheffield
University Hospital, Nottingham
Royal Hallamshire Hospital, Sheffield
Children's Hospital, Sheffield
South Lincolnshire Mental Handicap Services
—9

East Anglian
East Suffolk Community Services
East Suffolk Psychiatric Services
Great Yarmouth and Waveney Priority Services Newmarket General Hospital
Norfolk Ambulances
Peterborough DGH, Edith Cavell DGH, Stamfo
Rutland Hospital
West Norfolk and Wisbech Acute Services
West Norfolk and Wisbech Community Services
—8

North West Thames
Central Middlesex Hospital
East Hertfordshire Acute Services Unit
East Hertfordshire Priority and Community Servic
Harefield Hospital
Hillingdon Hospital
Mount Vernon Hospital
North Hertfordshire Acute and Community Service
North West Hertfordshire Priority Services Unit
Northwick Park Hospital
Westminster and Westminster Children's Hospitals
—10

North East Thames
Basildon and Thurrock HA
Brentwood Community Hospital
Central North London Mental Health Unit
The London Hospital Group
Mid Essex Acute Unit
The Royal Free Hospital
North Middlesex Hospital
Royal London Homeopathic Hospital
Royal National Orthopaedic Hospital
The Royal National Throat Nose and Ear Hospital
City and Hackney (St. Bart's, Homerton and St Hospital Trust)
St. Barholomew's Hospital
St. Margaret's Hospital, Epping
St. Peter's Group of Hospitals
Southend District Services
Tavistock and Portman Clinics
Harwich Hospital
North East Essex Acute Unit
North East Essex Mental Handicap Unit
North East Essec Mental Health Unit
Waltham Forest Mental Health Unit
Waltham Forest HA
West Essex Priority Care Services
—23

SE Thames
Bexley HA—Mental Health Community Services
Brighton Acute Services
Bromley Acute Services
Bromley Mental Health Services
King's/Camberwell and associated Community Serv
Conquest Hospital, Hastings HA
Dartford & Gravesham HA—Proposed DGH
Eastbourne Acute Services
Guy's (and Lewisham Hospitals and associated MI Lewisham and North Southwark HA—Mental Services
Lewisham Hospital Unit
Maidstone DGH
Queen Mary's Hospital, Sidcup (Erith and District H Community
Queen Victoria Hospital, East Grinstead
St. Thomas' Hospital (and associated Community
Sevenoaks Hospital
SE Kent HA—Community Services
SE Thames RHA Commercial Services Directorate
Tunbridge Wells Mental Handicap Unit
West Lambeth HA—Priority Care Unit
William Harvey and Buckland Hospitals—SE Kent
—21

SW Thames
Croydon Community Unit
Croydon Mental Handicap Unit
Croydon HA—Mental Illness Unit
East Surrey HA—Acute and Community Services Unit
East Surrey HA—Combined MI/Mental Handicap Unit
Kingston Hospital
Mid Downs East Unit
Mid Downs West Unit
Mid Surrey General Unit
Mid Surrey HA—Mental Illness Unit
North West Surrey HA—Acute Unit
North West Surrey HA—Mental Handicap and Mental Health Units
St. George's Group Trust, Wandsworth HA
St. Helier and Sutton Hospitals
South West Surrey Acute Unit
Worthing and Southlands Hospitals, Worthing HA
Weybridge Hospital
—17

Wessex
Bournemouth Acute Unit, East Dorset HA
Christchurch Hospital, East Dorset HA
Lymington Hospitals
Mental Health Services, East Dorset HA
North West Wiltshire Community Service, Bath HA
Psychiatric Division, Basingstoke HA
Royal National Hospital for Rheumatic Diseases
Swindon HA—All District Services
Treloar Chase Unit, Basingstoke HA
West Dorset Community Services
West Dorset General Hospital (Acute) Services
West Dorset Mental Health Services
—12

Oxford
Aylesbury Vale Primary Care Services Unit
East Berkshire Mental Handicap Unit
Nuffield Orthopaedic Centre
West Berkshire Mental Health Unit
Wrexham Park Hospital (Acute Unit)
Wycombe District
—6

South Western
Avon College of Health
Bristol
Bristol Paediatric Services
Bristol Homoeopathic Hospital
East Gloucestershire NHS Trust [Cheltenham and District]
Cornwall Mental Handicap Services
Cornwall Community Services
Royal Cornwall Hospitals [East Cornwall Acute Services]
East Somerset [(Yeovil): Acute/Primary Care Services]
Exeter Community Services
North Devon
Plymouth Acute Services
Supplies Function—Regionwide (South Western RHA)
South Devon Health Care Trust [Torbay DHA]
West Cornwall [Acute Services]
Weston (Unit, Bristol and Weston HA)
West Somerset [Musgrove: Acute Services]
Wonford Acute Services
—18

West Midlands
Alexandra Hospital
Bridgnorth Cottage Hospital (incl. community) (Shropshire)
Bromsgrove Community Unit (Bromsgrove and Redditch)
Mid Staffordshire Community Unit
Coventry and Warwick Hospitals (incl. Paybody) (Coventry)
Ellesmere Cottage Hospital (Shropshire)
Good Hope DGH/Northcroft/Jaffray/Community (N. Birmingham)
Highcroft, Mental Illness Hospital (N. Birmingham)
Lady Forrester Cottage Hospital (Much Wenlock, Shropshire)
Walsall Acute Services [Manor DGH]
Oswestry and District Hospital (inc. Community) (Shropshire)
Robert Jones and Agnes Hunt Orthopaedic Hospital (Shropshire)
Royal Orthopaedic Hospital (South Birmingham)
Royal Shrewsbury Hospital (Shropshire)
Rugby District Services
Mid Staffordshire Mental Health Unit [St. George's Hospital]
St. Margaret's, Mental Handicap Hospital, (Walsall)
Walsgrave DGH, Coventry
—18

Mersey
Arrowe Park and Clatterbridge Hospitals
Broadgreen Hospital, exc. Mersey Regional Cardio-Thoracic Unit
Cranage Hall, Crewe
Crewe, Psychiatric and Community Services
Halton, combined Hospital and Community Services
Halton Community Services
Leighton Hospital, Crewe (Acute Services)
Liverpool Community Health Services
Liverpool Dental Hospital
Liverpool Mental Health Services
Liverpool Obstetrics and Gynaecology Services
Regional Adult Cardio-Thoracic Unit (RACTU), Liverpool
Macclesfield Community and Mental Handicap Services
Macclesfield DGH (Acute Services)
Macclesfield Mental Health Services
Royal Liverpool Children's Hospital (Alder Hey)
Royal Liverpool Hospital
St. Helens and Knowsley Community Health Services
Southport DGH (Acute Services)
Southport and Formby Psychiatric/Community Services
Walton and Fazakerley Hospitals, South Sefton
Warrington DGH
Whiston and St. Helen's Hospital
Wirral Community and Support Hospitals
—24

North Western
Christie Hospital [South Manchester HA]
Central Manchester Hospital and Community Services
Royal Preston Hospital, Preston HA
South Manchester HA Community Unit
Stepping Hill Hospital plus Stockport Infirmary, Stockport HA Wrightington Hospital, West Lancashire HA
—6

SHA
Eastman Dental Hospital
—1

Total 199

Mr. Terry Fields: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many hospitals in the north-west have applied to opt out; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: Ten applications from units in the Mersey and North Western regions which wish to become operational as NHS trusts on 1 April 1991 have been received.

My right hon. Friend hopes to be able to announce his decision shortly on all applications from those units which have applied to become operational from April 1991.

Cornwall Air Ambulance

28. Mr. Matthew Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will make a decision on funding of the Cornwall air ambulance.

Mr. Dorrell: We are funding an independent evaluation of air ambulance services, costing £250,000, and will take a decision on the funding of the services themselves in the light of that evaluation.

I have written to the hon. Member and to other hon. Members from Cornwall to explain why there will be no central contribution to the funding of the Cornwall air ambulance service until we have that evaluation.

Radiation

Mrs. Wise: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) whether he has completed his consideration of proposals for further studies of the children of individuals who have received radiation doses from occupational exposure;

(2) whether the data held on the national registry of radiation workers at the National Radiological Protection Board have yet been linked with that on the national registry of childhood tumours.

Mr. Dorrell: The proposals for detailed epidemiological studies have now been refereed by independent experts and the successful applicants have been notified. Work is expected to start shortly on finalisation of contractual arrangements. The proposal to link data held on the national registry of radiation workers with that on the national registry of childhood tumours is currently being piloted by the Office of Population, Censuses and S Final decisions will depend on the outcome of t study.

Pregnancies

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of St Health whether he will list (a) the total number a of pregnancies to women aged 17, 18, 19 and 20 y each year from 1970 to 1989, respectively, with the broken down into live births, stillbirths and aborti (b) the above breakdown for all girls aged under for 1987.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested for t 1970-1988 is given in the tables. Figures for conc occurring in 1989 will not be available until autum Conceptions to women usually resident in Engla Wales which led to a maternity or were termin abortion under the Abortion Act 1967 are include which led to an illegal or spontaneous abort excluded.

(a) Numbers and rates of conception by outcome to women aged 17 to 20, 1970-88
England and Wales

	Number of conceptions (thousands)				Conceptions terminated by abortion	Conception rates per 1,000 women in age-group
	Total conceptions	Conceptions leading to maternities				Total conceptions	Conceptions leading to maternities
		All maternities	Live births	Still births			All maternities	Live births	Still births
Age of woman at conception and year of conception
17
1970	27,385	23,673	23,384	289	3,712	84·0	72·6	71·7	0·9
1971	27,587	22,577	22,319	258	5,010	83·6	68·5	67·7	0·8
1972	26,574	20,597	20,356	241	5,977	82·8	64·2	63·4	0·8
1973	25,896	19,759	19,508	251	6,137	78·4	59·8	59·0	0·8
1974	24,994	18,435	18,236	199	6,559	73·8	54·4	53·8	0·6
1975	23,349	16,747	16,569	178	6,602	66·9	48·0	47·4	0·5
1976	21,681	15,165	14,999	166	6,516	60·5	42·3	41·9	0·5
1977	21,757	15,154	14,987	167	6,603	59·1	41·2	40·7	0·5
1978	23,518	16,256	16,090	166	7,262	61·2	42·3	41·9	0·4
1979	24,868	16,694	16,550	144	8,174	63·3	42·5	42·1	0·4
1980	23,894	15,791	15,664	127	8,103	60·0	39·6	39·3	0·3
1981	23,179	14,990	14,882	108	8,189	56·8	36·7	36·5	0·3
1982	22,964	15,049	14,940	109	7,915	55·8	36·6	36·3	0·3
1983	22,575	14,452	14,342	110	8,123	56·0	35·9	35·6	0·3
1984	24,209	15,642	15,541	101	8,567	61·4	39·6	39·4	0·3
1985	24,619	15,922	15,820	102	8,697	64·2	41·5	41·3	0·3
1986	24,776	16,101	15,999	102	8,675	64·8	42·1	41·8	0·3
1987	24,809	15,915	15,810	105	8,894	67·1	43·0	42·8	0·3
1988	25,423	15,872	15,793	79	9,551	67·6	42·2	42·0	0·2
18
1970	37,624	33,309	32,904	405	4,315	116·9	103·5	102·2	1·3
1971	36,656	31,165	30,811	354	5,491	111·7	95·0	93·9	1·1
1972	35,399	28,943	28,615	328	6,456	106·9	87·4	86·4	1·0
1973	32,885	26,444	26,165	279	6,441	102·0	82·0	81·2	0·9
1974	31,439	24,938	24,661	277	6,501	94·8	75·2	74·3	0·8
1975	29,952	23,555	23,338	217	6,397	88·0	69·2	68·5	0·6
1976	27,563	21,114	20,871	243	6,449	78·5	60·1	59·4	0·7
1977	28,270	21,522	21,310	212	6,748	78·6	59·8	59·2	0·6
1978	30,344	22,842	22,627	215	7,502	81·9	61·7	61·1	0·6
1979	32,752	24,206	24,014	192	8,546	84·8	62·7	62·2	0·5
1980	32,093	23,378	23,189	189	8,715	81·2	59·2	58·7	0·5
1981	30,564	21,894	21,764	130	8,670	76·2	54·6	54·3	0·3
1982	30,325	21,769	21,626	143	8,556	74·0	53·1	52·8	0·3
1983	29,860	21,196	21,070	126	8,664	72·2	51·2	50·9	0·3
1984	31,382	22,302	22,178	124	9,080	77·9	55·3	55·0	0·3

	Number of conceptions (thousands)				Conceptions terminated by abortion	Conception rates per 1,000 women in age-group				Conceptions terminated by abortion
	Total conceptions	Conceptions leading to maternities				Total conceptions	Conceptions leading to maternities
		All maternities	Live births	Still births			All maternities	Live births	Still births
1985	31,939	22,235	22,109	126	9,704	80·7	56·2	55·8	0·3	24·5
1986	32,177	22,456	22,357	99	9,721	83·6	58·4	58·1	0·3	25·3
1987	33,648	23,114	22,983	131	10,534	87·7	60·3	59·9	0·3	27·5
1988	32,208	21,672	21,550	122	10,536	86·9	58·5	58·2	0·3	28·4
19
1970	45,853	41,489	41,048	441	4,364	136·6	123·6	122·3	1·3	13·0
1971	42,770	37,408	37,018	390	5,362	130·9	114·5	113·3	1·2	16·4
1972	41,406	35,042	34,677	365	6,364	125·7	106·4	105·3	1·1	19·3
1973	39,080	32,766	32,403	363	6,314	117·4	98·4	97·3	1·1	19·0
1974	35,834	29,635	29,357	278	6,199	110·7	91·6	90·7	0·9	19·2
1975	34,216	28,177	27,908	269	6,039	102·5	84·4	83·6	0·8	18·1
1976	32,652	26,617	26,367	250	6,035	95·3	77·7	77·0	0·7	17·6
1977	33,424	27,303	27,061	242	6,121	94·7	77·4	76·7	0·7	17·3
1978	35,872	28,953	28,705	248	6,919	99·1	80·0	79·3	0·7	19·1
1979	38,110	30,015	29,766	249	8,095	102·4	80·6	80·0	0·7	21·7
1980	37,475	29,187	28,975	212	8,288	96·4	75·1	74·6	0·5	21·3
1981	37,458	29,087	28,886	201	8,371	94·0	73·0	72·5	0·5	21·0
1982	36,614	27,961	27,784	177	8,653	90·1	68·8	68·3	0·4	21·3
1983	35,318	26,872	26,719	153	8,446	84·8	64·5	64·2	0·4	20·3
1984	36,993	27,691	27,517	174	9,302	89·3	66·9	66·4	0·4	22·5
1985	37,157	27,489	27,351	138	9,668	91·7	67·9	67·5	0·3	23·9
1986	37,205	27,419	27,271	148	9,786	93·5	68·9	68·6	0·4	24·6
1987	39,048	27,911	27,771	140	11,137	101·1	72·2	71·9	0·4	28·8
1988	38,475	26,878	26,731	147	11,597	100·0	69·8	69·5	0·4	30·1
20
1970	54,244	49,573	48,992	581	4,671	155·4	142·0	140·4	1·7	13·4
1971	49,030	43,637	43,158	479	5,393	145·6	129·6	128·2	1·4	16·0
1972	45,760	39,838	39,451	387	5,922	139·3	121·3	120·1	1·2	18·0
1973	43,844	37,743	37,318	425	6,101	132·3	113·9	112·6	1·3	18·4
1974	41,290	35,365	35,009	356	5,925	123·7	105·9	104·9	1·1	17·8
1975	38,396	32,730	32,441	289	5,666	117·9	100·5	99·6	0·9	17·4
1976	36,336	30,916	30,647	269	5,420	108·3	92·1	91·3	0·8	16·2
1977	38,059	32,437	32,159	278	5,622	110·5	94·2	93·4	0·8	16·3
1978	40,902	34,302	34,064	238	6,600	115·1	96·5	95·9	0·7	18·6
1979	43,025	35,601	35,350	251	7,424	118·3	97·9	97·2	0·7	20·4
1980	43,026	35,296	35,055	241	7,730	114·8	94·2	93·5	0·6	20·6
1981	41,931	33,852	33,633	219	8,079	107·2	86·5	86·0	0·6	20·7
1982	42,104	33,836	33,653	183	8,268	104·9	84·3	83·8	0·5	20·6
1983	40,384	32,257	32,051	206	8,127	98·3	78·5	78·0	0·5	19·8
1984	42,227	33,399	33,205	194	8,828	101·2	80·0	79·6	0·5	21·1
1985	42,140	32,744	32,554	190	9,396	101·1	78·6	78·1	0·5	22·5
1986	42,376	32,348	32,178	170	10,028	104·0	79·4	78·9	0·4	24·6
1987	43,712	32,808	32,650	158	10,904	109·3	82·0	81·6	0·4	27·3
1988	43,087	31,515	31,362	153	11,572	111·1	81·2	80·9	0·4	29·8

(b) Numbers and rates of conceptions by outcome to women aged under 16, 1987
England and Wales

Number of conceptions				Conceptions terminated by abortion	Conception rates per 1,000 women aged 13 to 15				Conceptions terminated by abortion
Total conceptions	Conceptions leading to maternities				Total conceptions	Conceptions leading to maternities
	All maternities	Live births	Still births			All maternities	Live births	Still births
9,135	4,185	4,159	26	4,950	9·3	4·2	4·2	0·0	5·0

Overseas Adoptions

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list (a) the voluntary organisation agencies which may arrange overseas adoptions and (b) the charges made by each local authority for providing home study reports.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The Department has written to all approved adoption societies explaining that we would be willing to discuss with them proposals for the development of arrangements for inter-country adoption.

Social services departments and approved adoption societies are also encouraged to co-operate in the provision of inter-country adoption services.

Copies of the letter are available in the Library, together with a list of approved adoption societies.

The level of charges to meet the cost of assessment of adopters and of reports in connection with inter-country adoption are a matter for local authorities and for approved societies which provide reports.

Miss Lestor: To ask the Secretary of State for Health what post-adoption monitoring procedures are recommended by his Department to local authorities with regard to the adoption of children from abroad by British citizens.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: There is no provision in adoption law or practice for monitoring of any adoptive family after a court has made an adoption order, although post-adoption support can be provided, where needed, in accordance with section 1 of the Adoption Act 1976. The adoption of children from overseas is among the topics on which the Department expects to commission research.

Braille

Sir Russell Johnston: To ask the Secretary of State for Health (1) if he will review the decision to cut the Royal National Institute for the Blind's braille grant;

(2) what representations his Department has received concerning the Royal National Institute for the Blind's braille grant.

Mr. Dorrell: I refer the hon. Member to the reply my noble Friend the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Health gave to Lord Carter on 23 October at columns 1237-40 in another place. We have no plans to review our decision to reduce the Royal National Institute for the Blind's braille grant this year. We have received some 300 letters on the subject from hon. Members and members of the public. My noble Friend met a delegation from the Royal National Institute for the Blind on 19 November.

Kidney Machines

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the number of kidney dialysis machines in operation at the present time by the national health service; and if he will give an estimate of the number of patients currently diagnosed as in need of dialysis.

Mr. Dorrell: This information is not collected centrally.

Private Residential Homes

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the number of owners of private residential homes who have had their certificates withdrawn since 1984 and the reasons for the withdrawal.

Mr. Dorrell: The number of persons notified to the Department whose registrations have been cancelled under the Registered Homes Act 1984 since it came into operation on 1 January 1985 is as follows:

	Residential Care Homes	Nursing Homes	Dually Registered Homes
1985	2	3	—
1986	16	5	—
1987	28	4	—
1988	54	15
1989	44	1

The reasons given for cancellations report concerned:

the fitness of persons involved in running th cases the fitness of premises, or their staffing: 5 c

the conduct of the home or services c provided: 24 cases conviction of an offence under the Registe Act 1984: 1 case urgent closure an application to a Justice of 6 cases

In a number of cases, more than one reason w

Social Service Review Cases

Mr. Thurnham: To ask the Secretary of Health, further to his answer of 12 Novemb Report, column 59, if he will list for all loca social service departments the number of case under review by his Department and the leng each case has been outstanding.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: The informati available in the form requested.

Operations (Cancellations)

Mrs. Mahon: To ask the Secretary of State how many health authorities have canc emergency operations in order to clear financ

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of Health how many health authorities have non-emergency operations in order to clea deficits.

Mr. Dorrell: Information on cancelled opera held centrally. Proper financial planning to deficits should not result in operations being c

Medical Negligence

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secreta for Health what information he has, by health of the amounts which have been paid out in co for medical negligence suits or related actions the last five years for which figures are available in each case the field of medicine in which that Mr. Dorrell: Until 1 January 1990 the medi organisations paid compensation for medical actions in relation to the medical or dental sta authorities. The information was therefore n centrally.

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secreta for Health what guidance his Department has g formal or informal, to health authorities a which they should hold in contingency funds a suits for medical negligence; whether that guid to any particular field of medicine; and if he statement.

Mr. Dorrell: It is for health authorities to de their cash allocations, whether to set aside mo purpose.

From 1 January 1990 health authorities took over, from the medical defence organisations, the financial liabilities for medical negligence by hospital doctors. This meant that the contribution within individual doctors' remuneration towards the cost of doctors' subscriptions was no longer needed since membership ceased to be a condition of employment. The Department indicated that authorities would wish to identify this expenditure and set it aside to help meet the cost of claims paid.

In addition, most regional health authorities have arrangements for assisting their district health authorities with the legal costs and damages of large settlements and in the departmental guidance on claims for medical negligence, issued on 12 December 1989—health circular (89)34, a copy of which is available in the Library—the Department recommended that regional health authorities should have such arrangements.

There was no reference to particular fields of medicine in either context.

Population, West Midlands

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list the population aged 18 years and over of each authority in the west midlands.

Mr. Dorrell: The mid-1989 estimates of population aged 18 and over for each district in the West Midlands metropolitan county are as follows:

	Thousands
Birmingham	746·8
Coventry	230·8
Dudley	238·8
Sandwell	226·6
Solihull	157·7
Walsall	201·9
Wolverhampton	190·6

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will list for each authority in the west midlands the latest information on the size of the electoral roll.

Mr. Dorrell: The numbers of local government electors on registers which came into use on 16 February 1990 in districts within the West Midlands metropolitan county were as follows:

District	Electors
Birmingham	736,420
Coventry	233,003
Dudley	242,844
Sandwell	229,498
Solihull	157,284
Walsall	200,236
Wolverhampton	185,206

Hospital Security

Sir Neil Macfarlane: To ask the Secretary of State for Health if he will conduct an urgent review of national health service hospital security arrangements.

Mr. Dorrell: No. Appropriate security arrangements for the protection of both patients and staff is the responsibility of and can best be determined by health authorities in the light of their knowledge of their premises and the degree of access necessary for patients and their visitors. I understand that the National Associatio Health Authorities and Trusts is planning to ho security conference next year to look at security matt the national health service. It is proposed that dele from each health authority are invited.

National Health Service Infected Blood

Ms. Harman: To ask the Secretary of State for H (1) how many individuals have lodged court cases clai damages for contracting HIV through infected nat health service blood or blood products; and, of those, many are haemophiliacs;

(2) how many people who have taken court actio plaintiffs claiming damages in respect of contracting through national health service infected blood or b products have died since they issued proceedings; an these, how many are haemophiliacs;

(3) how many of the court cases claiming damage contracting HIV through national health service infe blood or blood products have been lodged by indivi in their own right; how many have been lodged on b of minors; and, in each of these groups, how many haemophiliacs;

(4) what information he has on how many people have contracted HIV through national health se infected blood or blood products have not lodged c cases claiming damages; and, of those, how many haemophiliacs.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley [holding answer 12 Nove 1990]: We are not aware that any writs have been se on the Government by individuals infected with HIV f whole blood. Some writs have been served on he authorities, but we do not have details.

There are 962 plaintiffs pursuing allegations in res of infection with HIV through blood products. includes 775 claims in respect of haemophiliacs, of w 107 are in respect of minors. An estimated HIV-infected haemophiliacs have not lodged court c Ninety-one cases are being pursued in respect haemophiliacs who have died, but it is not known many of these have died since the start of the litiga

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Written Questions

Mr. Simon Hughes: To ask the Lord President of Council if he will produce a table to show in descen order the 30 Members who tabled the most wri questions last Session, indicating in each case how m were tabled.

Mr. MacGregor [holding answer 12 November 19 The information requested is as follows:

Member	Total number of written questions tabled
1. Mr. Austin Mitchell	820
2. Mr. Frank Dobson	705
3. Mr. Dafydd Elis Thomas	673
4. Mr. Paul Flynn	639
5. Mr. Dafydd Wigley	601
6. Mr. Graham Allen	581
7. Mr. Martin Redmond	580
8. Mr. Ron Davies	508

Member	Total number of written questions tabled
9. Mr. Keith Vaz	500
10. Mr. Alun Michael	472
11. Mr. Tony Banks	459
12. Mr. Simon Hughes	440
13. Mr. Tam Dalyell	437
14. Mr. Harry Cohen	435
15. Dr. David Clark	402
16. Mr. Barry Jones	390
17. Rt. Hon. Jack Ashley	363
18. Mr. Rhodri Morgan	363
19. Mrs. Teresa Gorman	316
20. Mr. Jim Cousins	315
21. Mr. Nicholas Bennett	308
22. Mr. Michael Meacher	294
23. Ms. Joan Walley	291
24. Mr. Matthew Taylor	290
25. Mr. William Ross	286
26. Mr. Malcolm Bruce	285
27. Mr. Tony Lloyd	281
28. Mr. Martin O'Neill	278
29. Mr. Gareth Wardell	275
30. Mr. David Alton	275

SCOTLAND

Dogs

Mrs. Ray Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will outline the anticipated timetable for district councils to carry out specific new requirements regarding the control of dogs; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Lang: We shall shortly be discussing with the Convention of Scottish Local Authorities the timetable for the introduction of the new dog control measures contained in the Environmental Protection Act 1990.

Political Donations

Mr. Menzies Campbell: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland what guidance he has issued to his junior Ministers in relation to the accepting of political donations in their capacities as Members of Parliament from companies or individuals whose business activities may be influenced by their ministerial responsibilities.

Mr. Rifkind: Donations made directly to party funds by companies or individuals are not a matter for Ministers.

Local Government Finance

Mr. Nellist: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland how many local authorities levy the standard charge for the poll tax at (a) zero, (b) one half, (c) one, (d) one and a half and (e) two times the personal charge for the area.

Mr. Lang: The information requested is for 1990-91 as follows:

Standard Community Charge Multiplier	Regional Councils	Islands Councils	District Councils
0	—	—	1
0·5	—	—	—
1	3	1	11
1·5	1	1	5
2	5	1	37

There are certain classes of premis multiplier is prescribed as zero through regional and islands councils have the p additional classes for which authorities different from their main multiplier.

"Efficient Planning"

Mr. Allan Stewart: To ask the Secr
Scotland what decisions have been mad in the Scottish Development Depart consultation paper "Efficient Planning"

Lord James Douglas-Hamilton: The carefully considered the responses whic the consultation paper "Efficient Pla decided to proceed with the following p which are included in the Planning and published on Friday 16 November and s be brought forward by Government an

(a) a power for local authorities to t planning applications;
(b) a power for the Secretary of planning appeal where the unreasonably;
(c) lifting the six-month time limit applicant who makes a false dec
(d) rationalising the secondary leg development control;
(e) introducing new powers to cont
(f) simplifying the law on publi
applications;
(g) a power for local authorities to conditions on landfill sites; and
(h) extending to minerals waste tips the review of minerals site compensation and after-care co

We have already made it clear that w the proposal to increase planning progressively until they cover 100 p authorities' development control costs.

A consultation paper was issued o outlining proposals to simplify the designating simplified planning zones. S extend permitted development rights in we have concluded that a further authorities to do this—the proposed orders—will not be necessary if we de our SPZ proposals.

In the light of the responses to the c the Government have decided not to following proposals:

(i) to allow the Secretary of State procedure to be used to decide
This would have removed the m longstanding right "to be heard"
(ii) to give special permission fo householders if the local planning decision on a planning applic weeks;
(iii) dual jurisdiction for the local Secretary of State following non-determination, and re-defi which development is said to com considering further the technic proposals;
(iv) charging for planning appeals.
saw this as a means of improving planning appeals system. W decided to give priority to othe achieve this end;
(v) heritage measures. We have deci
Bill is not the right vehicle for s

Food Poisoning

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Secretary of State for Scotland if he will list the number of cases notified to him from each health board in Scotland from 1980 until the latest date for which figures are available of (a) food poisoning in general, (b) salmonellosis, (c) salmon enteritidis, (d) salmonella enteritidis P4, (e) salmone (f) campylobacter and (g) listeriosis, respectively.

Mr. Michael Forsyth [holding answer 14 Novem 1990]: The information requested on food poisoning general and on campylobacter is shown in table 1. remaining information is available only at an all-Scotl level and is shown in table 2.

Table 1
Confirmed notifications of Food poisoning and Campylobacter

	Scotland	Argyll and Clyde	Ayrshire and Arran	Borders	Dumfries and Galloway	Fife	Forth Valley	Grampian	Greater Glasgow	Highland	Lanark-shire	Lothian	Orkney	Shetland	Tayside	We
1980 Food poisoning	2,299	105	201	23	108	70	63	154	296	17	93	[1]923	1	40	161
Campylobacter	390	52	[2]—	—	11	—	8	169	93	—	3	—	—	—	54
1981 Food poisoning	2,920	193	181	47	44	148	119	920	297	25	138	563	—	13	229
Campylobacter	1,459	50	[2]—	—	58	155	32	375	86	—	36	548	—	—	119
1982 Food poisoning	2,880	235	193	79	259	169	126	215	357	17	421	656	—	11	141
Campylobacter	1,645	62	[2]—	31	127	129	31	499	95	—	67	480	—	14	110
1983 Food poisoning	2,632	206	83	76	112	164	130	201	580	10	353	515	2	10	179
Campylobacter	1,632	89	[2]—	24	136	110	60	377	100	—	77	515	—	8	136
1984 Food poisoning	2,391	197	153	46	132	185	102	282	310	31	238	543	2	5	159
Campylobacter	1,910	64	[2]—	25	171	146	121	371	130	1	142	596	—	10	133
1985 Food poisoning	1,967	218	166	21	53	192	68	307	206	31	210	393	—	6	92
Campylobacter	2,189	113	[2]—	37	193	110	89	424	177	2	198	656	—	15	175
1986 Food poisoning	2,436	309	166	32	131	190	101	215	385	65	126	586	—	6	103
Campylobacter	2,230	129	[2]—	39	162	77	104	455	201	98	158	616	—	9	182
1987 Food poisoning	2,480	184	255	33	104	178	105	325	269	70	216	569	—	14	149
Campylobacter	2,566	133	[2]—	35	207	102	162	465	285	120	174	677	1	10	195
1988 Food poisoning	2,998	256	120	76	83	385	152	338	369	86	274	645	—	16	187
Campylobacter	2,736	140	[2]—	56	174	184	168	567	300	119	216	597	—	11	204
1989 Food poisoning	3,197	277	182	78	30	344	146	481	301	213	258	600	2	8	251
Campylobacter	2,722	178	[2]—	64	24	180	153	599	331	129	265	584	—	19	195

[1] Includes Campylobacter.
[2]— Not available.

Table 2
Cases of Salmonella sp., S. enteriditis, S. enteriditis pt4, and Listeriosis notified by laboratories in Scotland

	Salmonella sp. (Salmonellosis)	S. enteritidis	S. enteritidis pt4	Listeriosis
1980	1,577	113	28	10
1981	2,526	250	37	7
1982	2,621	279	42	8
1983	2,288	319	80	16
1984	2,221	433	183	9
1985	1,690	528	138	14
1986	2,015	619	282	10
1987	2,286	940	577	36
1988	2,580	1,345	945	36
1989	2,578	1,402	1,150	29

SOCIAL SECURITY

Community Charge

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what action he plans to take following the recommendation contained in the Social Services Select Committee's fifth report, that the Department of Social Security should monitor the effects of the community charge on disabled people.

Mr. Scott: I refer my hon. Friend to my reply to him on 14 November at c. 178-79.

Mr. Hannam: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what representations he has received concerning the effects of the community charge on disabled people.

Mr. Scott: Since 1 April 1990, 3,091 items correspondence have been received by the Departm about the community charge benefit scheme: it is not, I afraid, possible to identify the number relating particul to the effects of the community charge on disabled peo

Inflation

Mr. Beggs: To ask the Secretary of State for So Security when state benefits and pensions will be increa to take account of inflation; and what level of increase be expected.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: As my right hon. Friend Secretary of State announced in his statement to the Ho on 24 October, social security benefits will be uprated f 8 April 1991. Retirement pensions and other long-t benefits will be increased by 10·9 per cent., in line with the retail prices index, and income-related benefits by 8·1 per cent., reflecting the increase in the RPI excluding housing costs. Housing benefit and income support provide separately for these costs.

Families

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will provide a breakdown on the 27 per cent. extra real expenditure on families with children between 1979 and now.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The value of support for families and children provided through a combination of child tax allowances and social security benefits specifically for this group has increased by 29 per cent. in real terms between 1978-79 and 1989-90, from £7·3 billion to £9·4 billion in 1989-90 prices. Real-terms expenditure on family credit was nearly eight times as much as for family income supplement in 1978-79, while payments for maternity have increased by over 11 per cent. Expenditure on child benefit, plus the value of child tax allowances, has fallen by nearly 12 per cent., largely because the number of children has fallen and partly because child benefit was not uprated in 1988-89 and 1989-90. Expenditure on one-parent benefit has increase nearly fourfold, while real-terms spending on income support and housing benefit to lone-parent families has risen nearly two and a half times.

Child Benefit

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what is (a) the gross and (b) the net cost of raising child benefit by 10p in 1991-92 and 1992-93 for all children.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: It has been estimated that the extra costs in each year would be around (a) £63 million gross and (b) £47 million net.

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many families with children will be lifted off or brought into means-tested benefits as a result of the extra £1 in child benefit for the eldest child and the continued freeze for other children.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: It is impossible to give any meaningful estimate of people who have or will become dependent on income-related benefits as a direct consequence of the extra £1 in child benefit for the eldest child and the continued freeze for other children because the effects cannot be viewed in isolation. It is important to remember that eligible populations and their constituents for all income-related benefits change constantly as family incomes and circumstances change. Gross earnings have risen and our policies to reduce tax and national insurance contributions have succeeded in enabling families with children to keep more of their earnings.

Income Support

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what has been the percentage fall over the period since the end of April 1987 in the real value of the incomes of persons then receiving supplementary benefit and now receiving income support with transitional protection, assuming that they have no disregarded income.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: The information requested is not available.

One-parent Benefit

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how much will be saved from freezing one-parent benefit in 1991-92.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Not uprating one-parent benefit in 1991-92 saves nearly £19 million on the benefit itself but results in increased spending on family credit, housing benefit and community charge benefit.

Benefits System

Mr. Flynn: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security when he expects to publish reports on the research projects mentioned in his answer to the hon. Member for Fylde (Mr. Jack) on 14 November, Official Report, column 180.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: Research projects by or for the Department are undertaken in the expectation of publication, but the timing and format are not decided until the project is completed.

Mobility Allowance

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security what training medical boards have received on the effect of CM/205/88 on repeat claims of mobility allowance.

Mr. Scott: Medical board doctors have always been trained to take into account all the evidence, including the medical reports on which previous successful and unsuccessful claims have been based. Medical officers of the Department, who are required to advise adjudication officers deciding mobility allowance claims, were given further guidance in the light of the decision of the tribunal of commissioners.

Mr. Frank Field: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security whether adjudication officers at the mobility allowance unit have received guidance on the treatment of repeat claims in the light of CM/205/88.

Mr. Scott: Yes.

EMPLOYMENT

Outworkers

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment (1) what is the median rate of pay for homeworkers/outworkers; what are the highest and lowest levels and what occupations predominate at these levels;

(2) if he will provide details of the number of people engaged in homework or outwork in the last five years; their sex, age, income and number of dependent children.

Mr. Forth: There are no routine statistics on homeworkers and outworkers. However, some information is available in Department of Employment research paper No. 60 "Home-based Work in Britain", published in May 1987. Tables 6.4 to 6.8 give earnings data; tables 3.1 to 3.4 provide details of the occupational distribution; and tables 4.1, 4.2, 4.8 and 4.15 contain breakdowns of numbers. All the data relate to 1981. A copy of the paper has been placed in the Library.

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will seek to extend health and safety legislation to include homeworkers.

Mr. Forth: Homeworkers, whether employed or self-employed, are already afforded the same protection as other workers under the provisions of the Health and Safety at Work etc. Act 1974 and subsidiary legislation.

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will provide details of the companies which have used homeworkers or outworkers in the last five years.

Mr. Forth: The informati equested is not available.

Employment Rights (Women)

Ms. Richardson: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many letters he has had from individuals concerned with the employment rights of women in casualised labour in the last five years.

Mr. Forth: This information can be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Jobs, Lancashire

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment if he will list the highest and lowest waged jobs on offer at the latest date for which figures are available for each jobcentre in Lancashire.

Mr. Jackson: Questions on operational matters in the Employment Service executive agency are the responsibility of Mike Fogden, the agency's chief executive, to whom I have referred this question for reply.

Civil Defence

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many civil servants are currently employed (a) full time and (b) part time by his Department on civil defence; what the total costs of employing staff on civil defence duties were in 1989-90; what the total costs of employing staff on civil defence duties are expected to be in 1990-91; and whether he has any plans for these staff to be transferred to work on other duties.

Mr. Jackson: Work in the Department of Employment on civil defence is carried out within guidelines laid down by the Government. The work is done by staff, both in London and in regional offices, who also have other duties; it is estimated that the total effort devoted to emergency planning is equivalent to about four full-time staff. The work cost some £108,000 in the 1989-90 financial year; this figure is expected to rise to £109,000 in the 1990-91 financial year. I have no plans to change the duties of the staff currently employed on this work.

Industrial Tribunals

Mr. Tony Lloyd: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what instructions have been issued to the Central Office of Industrial Tribunals or to the regional offices concerning restrictions on the use of part-time chairmen; and what measures have been instituted to identify the effects on case hearings of any such instructions.

Mr. Forth: I refer the hon. Member to the reply which I gave to the hon. Member for Sedgefield (Mr. Blair) on 19 November.

Clothing and Textiles

Mr. Nicholas Winterton: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many jobs have been shed in the United Kingdom clothing and textile industries in each of the last 15 years for which figures are available.

Mr. Jackson: Changes in the number of employees in the textile and clothing industries are supplied in the table.

Employees in textile and clothing industries
Textiles and clothing SIC 43 and 45 (excluding 4510 footwear)
Great Britain (thousands)

June	Net yearly change
1975	−60·4
1976	−31·5
1977	7·7
1978	−24·6
1979	−18·0
1980	−77·1
1981	−92·0
1982	−30·6
1983	−24·7
1984	−0·8
1985	5·7
1986	4·7
1987	−11·1
1988	7·3
1989	−16·2
1990	−10·1

Enterprise Allowance Scheme

Mr. Grylls: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment how many new firms have been created under the enterprise allowance scheme up to the present time.

Mr. Forth: Up to the present time over 540,000 people have started businesses under the enterprise allowance scheme.

Efficiency Scrutiny

Mr. Hayward: To ask the Secretary of State for Employment what plans he has to undertake new efficiency scrutinies.

Mr. Jackson: The Department of Employment group is going through a period of significant reorganisation as a result of the relocation of work out of London, the establishment of the Employment Service as an executive agency, and the setting up of training and enterprise councils. I have therefore decided to set up an efficiency scrutiny to examine internal communications within the group.

Written Answers to Questions

Wednesday 21 November 1990

EDUCATION AND SCIENCE

Teachers' Pay

85. Mr. Skinner: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science what recent discussions he has had with trade union representatives regarding teachers' pay; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Eggar: My right hon. and learned Friend would expect to meet the six teacher unions early next year to discuss the recommendations of the Interim Advisory Committee on School Teachers' Pay and Conditions.

Books

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will set out the level of expenditure on books at 1978-79 prices per child by local education authority in (a) 1978-79, (b) 1984-85 and (c) 1989-90.

Mr. Fallon: Information for 1978-79 is not available by individual local education authority, and the latest year for which figures are available is 1988-89. Cash figures for expenditure per pupil by local education authority for 1984-85 and 1988-89 are shown in tables 1 and 2. Table 3 shows the average expenditure per pupil in England at 1978-79 prices for 1978-79, 1984-85 and 1988-89.

While some local authorities' expenditure returns to Government Departments show separate figures for books, these can be misleading because of differing practices in attributing spending as between books and equipment. The tables therefore show combined spending figures for books and equipment, with figures as returned for books only in brackets. Even on the combined totals, coverage from authority to authority is likely to differ.

Table 1

Expenditure per pupil[1] 1984-85 Cash (£)

Local authority	Nursery and primary schools		Secondary schools
	Books and equipment	(of which books)	Books and equipment	(of which books)
Barking	24·73	(6·79)	52·01	(11·92)
Barnet	28·71	(10·41)	51·02	(17·00)
Bexley	19·23	(6·01)	40·90	(13·02)
Brent	34·04	(8·53)	52·25	(13·35)
Bromley	30·05	(7·66)	50·88	(11·61)
Croydon	24·78	(6·84)	49·39	(14·09)
Ealing	24·16	(6·58)	43·96	(12·23)
Enfield	25·87	(7·25)	45·77	(11·13)
Haringey	35·56	(8·64)	57·61	(15·50)
Harrow	22·74	(5·58)	49·27	(12·26)
Havering	26·06	(0·00)	58·36	(0·00)
Hillingdon	23·93	(20·05)	45·27	(36·59)
Hounslow	27·23	(7·17)	41·66	(12·17)
Kingston-upon-Thames	29·11	(7·10)	60·56	(12·13)
Merton	21·57	(0·00)	33·37	(0·00)
Newham	22·79	(7·10)	41·90	(15·24)
Redbridge	24·38	(9·68)	48·57	(15·93)
Richmond-upon-Thames	21·96	(2·33)	55·74	(2·13)
Sutton	26·71	(12·19)	38·41	(10·02)
Waltham Forest	34·19	(8·06)	57·41	(13·21)
ILEA	47·47	(9·06)	90·89	(18·36)
Birmingham	13·76	(3·84)	27·47	(6·40)
Coventry	25·57	(2·14)	53·57	(2·37)
Dudley	21·15	(0·00)	35·65	(0·00)
Sandwell	18·63	(0·00)	42·15	(0·00)
Solihull	18·47	(4·72)	46·20	(9·54)
Walsall	25·28	(4·79)	37·27	(10·00)
Wolverhampton	26·48	(7·41)	43·35	(12·44)
Knowsley	19·37	(4·72)	34·02	(5·71)
Liverpool	25·53	(7·08)	47·51	(11·52)
St. Helens	14·93	(6·24)	22·52	(7·48)
Sefton	20·26	(6·14)	40·11	(11·35)
Wirral	25·18	(7·23)	49·64	(9·89)
Bolton	27·19	(8·60)	51·66	(9·42)
Bury	20·65	(20·47)	52·41	(52·41)
Manchester	23·79	(6·80)	56·48	(12·39)
Oldham	27·43	(3·31)	40·65	(0·51)
Rochdale	22·10	(5·84)	34·82	(6·46)
Salford	27·42	(6·03)	46·59	(9·74)
Stockport	23·66	(7·24)	47·65	(10·84)
Tameside	25·36	(10·18)	40·42	(12·30)
Trafford	22·63	(5·18)	32·41	(1·34)
Wigan	22·35	(6·42)	45·36	(12·13)
Barnsley	23·00	(8·19)	42·67	(7·65)
Doncaster	16·86	(5·06)	35·78	(9·37)
Rotherham	15·72	(5·35)	26·70	(6·22)

Local authority	Nursery and primary schools		Secondary schools
	Books and equipment	(of which books)	Books and equipment	(of which books)
Sheffield	36·01	(14·42)	36·55	(6·60)
Bradford	18·80	(0·80)	35·99	(1·34)
Calderdale	19·38	(6·30)	34·07	(8·05)
Kirklees	18·57	(7·54)	39·16	(14·03)
Leeds	8·56	(·16)	13·17	(·35)
Wakefield	21·72	(10·21)	30·10	(11·79)
Gateshead	26·14	(7·68)	46·72	(8·76)
Newcastle-upon-Tyne	19·26	(4·92)	38·64	(10·42)
North Tyneside	27·99	(10·03)	50·30	(13·82)
South Tyneside	20·87	(8·07)	54·13	(11·75)
Sunderland	18·81	(5·19)	41·88	(6·92)
Isles of Scilly	27·90	(5·46)	41·29	(10·07)
Avon	24·19	(6·55)	40·67	(8·32)
Bedfordshire	26·00	(10·40)	55·45	(19·11)
Berkshire	23·30	(10·21)	43·67	(16·73)
Buckinghamshire	30·99	(13·60)	50·99	(12·19)
Cambridgeshire	25·34	(9·65)	43·14	(13·22)
Cheshire	22·09	(5·18)	44·89	(6·84)
Cleveland	19·99	(5·22)	38·09	(8·02)
Cornwall	29·97	(9·45)	41·51	(11·63)
Cumbria	21·26	(5·73)	32·88	(4·05)
Derbyshire	28·03	(8·36)	48·37	(11·75)
Devon	13·57	(8·47)	21·57	(9·40)
Dorset	28·63	(9·84)	38·97	(11·79)
Durham	17·22	(7·14)	28·37	(9·45)
East Sussex	21·83	(7·40)	42·78	(12·45)
Essex	21·12	(7·08)	38·21	(8·15)
Gloucestershire	20·62	(9·11)	35·71	(9·24)
Hampshire	19·54	(6·83)	40·92	(10·36)
Hereford and Worcester	22·93	(9·98)	43·50	(12·13)
Hertfordshire	23·31	(9·88)	42·15	(11·74)
Humberside	24·08	(6·71)	40·80	(9·43)
Isle of Wight	26·07	(11·04)	52·57	(12·36)
Kent	20·68	(7·03)	38·74	(9·60)
Lancashire	22·86	(8·04)	37·79	(8·14)
Leicestershire	22·52	(5·92)	41·53	(8·05)
Lincolnshire	18·02	(5·65)	43·05	(9·08)
Norfolk	22·78	(6·54)	40·36	(10·30)
North Yorkshire	24·60	(11·47)	39·45	(11·66)
Northamptonshire	22·39	(6·13)	44·72	(11·58)
Northumberland	26·00	(9·59)	43·31	(14·31)
Nottinghamshire	29·80	(9·44)	44·96	(12·13)
Oxfordshire	21·77	(2·65)	38·28	(3·70)
Salop	15·80	(6·65)	33·80	(9·33)
Somerset	27·22	(5·59)	46·49	(11·93)
Staffordshire	19·56	(4·90)	36·53	(8·63)
Suffolk	25·17	(7·04)	43·29	(11·00)
Surrey	15·11	(4·75)	34·37	(7·60)
Warwickshire	19·24	(7·27)	47·97	(11·63)
West Sussex	23·26	(8·24)	41·89	(10·57)
Wiltshire	23·05	(10·53)	37·34	(11·39)

Table 2
Expenditure per pupil[1]—1988-89
England[2]

Cash (

Local authority	Nursery and primary schools		Secondary schools
	Books and equipment	(of which books)	Books and equipment	(of which books)
Barking	32·65	(11·50)	80·58	(22·72)
Barnet	35·17	(11·99)	68·96	(17·52)
Bexley	31·98	(7·38)	99·22	(1·92)
Brent	38·42	(9·46)	76·43	(15·27)
Bromley	33·80	(9·02)	67·33	(13·07)
Croydon	54·89	(11·10)	111·98	(22·49)
Ealing	33·86	(5·73)	91·61	(12·63)
Enfield	30·76	(9·16)	61·09	(15·95)
Haringey	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a
Harrow	39·77	(6·98)	75·72	(10·85)
Havering	30·02	0·00	91·34	0·00
Hillingdon	40·45	(11·99)	80·08	(22·30)
Hounslow	33·40	(9·61)	49·65	(19·84)
Kingston-upon-Thames	55·50	(12·92)	106·58	(18·63)
Merton	31·28	(25·44)	36·02	(26·95)

Local authority	Nursery and primary schools		Secondary schools
	Books and equipment	(of which books)	Books and equipment	(of which books)
Newham	26·35	(6·44)	65·87	(11·34)
Redbridge	38·84	(11·30)	81·31	(23·65)
Richmond-upon-Thames	29·95	(8·25)	62·88	(13·76)
Sutton	34·64	(13·39)	71·17	(17·01)
Waltham Forest	28·21	(4·91)	75·37	(10·55)
ILEA	60·56	(12·08)	89·89	(19·28)
Birmingham	22·74	(4·70)	51·42	(9·50)
Coventry	26·08	(2·01)	92·00	(2·95)
Dudley	35·72	(6·79)	76·36	(2·44)
Sandwell	31·50	(3·06)	73·42	(1·02)
Solihull	34·88	(4·96)	122·79	(11·28)
Walsall	35·12	(9·10)	46·29	(14·38)
Wolverhampton	24·54	(7·23)	56·08	(13·99)
Knowsley	22·47	(8·88)	61·05	(7·01)
Liverpool	32·61	(7·76)	66·56	(12·13)
St. Helens	14·98	(6·33)	30·36	(10·39)
Sefton	21·41	(7·11)	60·55	(11·12)
Wirral	42·39	(11·92)	130·04	(23·45)
Bolton	33·23	(9·32)	71·24	(21·01)
Bury	30·75	(8·65)	93·06	(15·21)
Manchester	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a
Oldham	30·45	(7·19)	75·02	(10·58)
Rochdale	35·27	(9·08)	59·17	(10·52)
Salford	32·70	(0·23)	73·65	(0·07)
Stockport	35·87	(10·15)	96·37	(12·13)
Tameside	27·91	(5·74)	43·96	(8·06)
Trafford	37·75	(12·54)	70·39	(11·37)
Wigan	17·87	(5·42)	60·39	(17·03)
Barnsley	22·89	(4·75)	43·23	(2·36)
Doncaster	27·08	(6·67)	55·45	(11·14)
Rotherham	28·87	(6·82)	57·92	(9·04)
Sheffield	12·11	(5·33)	23·46	(7·98)
Bradford	28·71	0·00	71·73	0·00
Calderdale	28·52	(8·99)	63·13	(13·77)
Kirklees	25·17	(7·90)	63·89	(20·93)
Leeds	15·30	(0·43)	28·26	(2·45)
Wakefield	n/a	n/a	n/a	n/a
Gateshead	29·26	(4·89)	75·22	(11·65)
Newcastle-upon-Tyne	30·36	(7·00)	74·85	(17·41)
North Tyneside	25·56	(8·30)	48·48	(12·26)
South Tyneside	27·22	(4·81)	95·85	(9·24)
Sunderland	23·19	(6·15)	76·03	(9·12)
Avon	17·62	(6·01)	48·75	(11·37)
Bedfordshire	28·28	(9·53)	86·88	(23·60)
Berkshire	33·07	(13·88)	75·33	(23·85)
Buckinghamshire	32·59	(15·51)	72·90	(17·13)
Cambridgeshire	42·32	(11·98)	79·84	(21·62)
Cheshire	25·80	(8·86)	56·49	(18·39)
Cleveland	11·84	(7·27)	34·10	(11·16)
Cornwall	37·15	(12·32)	63·84	(21·77)
Cumbria	36·69	(13·11)	58·74	(15·67)
Derbyshire	29·35	(8·50)	74·40	(14·87)
Devon	37·40	(12·12)	65·14	(20·11)
Dorset	38·56	(11·63)	80·62	(13·72)
Durham	28·51	(9·47)	67·70	(16·44)
East Sussex	32·56	(11·04)	77·26	(17·78)
Essex	36·19	(9·69)	81·08	(14·11)
Gloucestershire	29·42	(11·93)	59·02	(19·40)
Hampshire	35·55	(2·28)	78·86	(4·72)
Hereford and Worcester	28·44	(11·13)	57·92	(14·98)
Hertfordshire	40·59	(14·97)	76·11	(20·18)
Humberside	32·68	(8·96)	60·98	(13·00)
Isle of Wight	32·74	(11·92)	54·37	(11·61)
Kent	29·02	(9·00)	71·61	(14·15)
Lancashire	30·13	(9·59)	65·70	(13·22)
Leicestershire	31·59	(11·26)	81·42	(16·36)
Lincolnshire	16·22	(10·94)	29·03	(17·69)
Norfolk	29·63	(8·27)	56·04	(12·29)
North Yorkshire	31·24	(5·95)	68·37	(7·48)
Northamptonshire	33·41	(7·81)	74·41	(18·34)
Northumberland	33·32	(11·07)	72·62	(16·92)
Nottinghamshire	35·60	(11·74)	66·56	(18·25)
Oxfordshire	43·28	(8·01)	103·89	(17·59)
Shropshire	30·94	(10·74)	64·32	(18·54)
Somerset	37·22	(6·64)	90·56	(14·45)
Staffordshire	36·68	(9·92)	77·80	(13·44)

Local authority	Nursery and primary schools		Secondary schools
	Books and equipment	(of which books)	Books and equipment	(of which books)
Suffolk	29·28	(8·97)	54·73	(14·02)
Surrey	21·48	(5·45)	94·51	(11·93)
Warwickshire	25·68	(8·82)	98·23	(16·12)
West Sussex	34·85	(10·22)	73·25	(16·21)
Wiltshire	40·32	(26·49)	71·08	(32·56)

[1] The figures are based on local education authority expenditure and pupil number returns to the relevant Government Depa
[2] n/a denotes that an expenditure return has not been received from the local education authority, or that a separate figure for bo not been provided.

Table 3
E. Land Averages
Expenditure per pupil

Cash Year	Nursery and primary schools		Secondary schools
	Books and equipment £	(of which books) £	Books and equipment £	(of which books) £
1978-79	12·88	(4·24)	24·40	(7·17)
1984-85	23·60	(7·25)	42·53	(10·15)
1988-89	32·14	(8·95)	69·79	(14·25)

Real terms at 1978-79 prices Year	Nursery and primary schools		Secondary schools
	Books and equipment £	(of which books) £	Books and equipment £	(of which books) £
1978-79	12·88	(4·24)	24·40	(7·17)
1984-85	13·24	(4·07)	23·86	(5·69)
1988-89	14·61	(4·07)	31·73	(6·51)

School Budgets

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science whether he has any estimate of the financial value of contributions made to school budgets by parents.

Mr. Fallon: My right hon. and learned Friend is not aware of any reliable and up-to-date estimate.

Schools (Charging)

Mr. Fatchett: To ask the Secretary of State for Education and Science if he will make a statement on the progress of the review of the charging regulation under the Education Reform Act 1988.

Mr. Fallon: My right hon. and learned Friend is collecting evidence from a range of sources about the operation of the relevant legislation. The results of a sample survey of schools will be available in January 1991 to supplement information from other interested bodies.

TRANSPORT

Driving Tests

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport whether his Department proposes to introduce any changes for the disabled (a) in driving test requirements and (b) in qualifications and requirements for driving instructors; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Chope: I do not at present have any plans to introduce such changes. The Driving Standards Agency is, however, considering possible ways to ensure tha are no unnecessary obstacles to disabled people wh to become driving instructors.

Trains (Accidents)

Mr. Cohen: To ask the Secretary of State for Tra what information his Department has, and representations it has received, about deaths and i caused as a result of faulty train doors, in British R underground services.

Mr. Freeman: In the five-year period 1985-1989 is no evidence to show that faulty train doors on Rail and underground services were the cause of d major injury. During that time, fatalities and injuri occurred in accidents associated with train doors following reasons:

(a) passengers slipping as they enter or aligh stationary trains.
(b) passengers opening slam-type doors as the trai the station, causing injury to persons on the pl
(c) passengers falling out of trains after delibera accidentally opening a slam door while the tra motion.
(d) incorrect operation of sliding doors.

A number of hon. Members and members of the have made representations about accidents in t category. The railway inspectorate received a le October from a member of Liverpool city concerning recent accidents on the west coast ma involving passengers falling from trains. After accident on this line, BR examined all doors con and found them to be working properly.

[1] 1989 details are provisional.

Jubilee Line

Mr. Leighton: To ask the Secretary of Sta Transport what steps are being taken to safegua route of the extension of the Jubilee line to the roya in the London borough of Newham.

Mr. Freeman: The Bill for the Jubilee line ex provides for an underground step-plate junction s Canning Town to allow an extension of the Jubi through the royal docks to be built at a later stage. A of the land required for such an extension is ow either British Rail or the London Docklands develo corporation, no further action is necessary to saf the route.

Bus Services

Mr. Pike: To ask the Secretary of State for Tra if he will make a statement regarding monopo operation situations which have arisen as a re implementation of the Transport Act 1986.

Mr. Freeman: The Transport Act 1985 brought the bus industry fully within the scope of competition legislation, which is the responsibility of the Office of Fair Trading and the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry. The Monopolies and Mergers Commission has so far been requested to investigate six cases involving mergers in the bus industry.

Gyroplanes

Miss Hoey: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport how many accidents have occurred involving gyroplanes in the last five years; how many have been investigated by the United Kingdom air accidents investigation branch; what have been the main causes of such accidents; and what arrangements have been made to monitor these aircraft to ensure that reasonable safety standards are observed prior to the marketing of gyroplanes for use by the general public.

Mr. McLoughlin: The statutory responsibility for the safety regulation of United Kingdom civil aviation rests with the Civil Aviation Authority. I am advised by the authority that there have been 16 accidents in the last five years, six of which involved fatalities in which a total of six people have been killed. The six accidents involving fatalities have been the subject of field investigations by the Department of Transport's air accidents investigation branch. Of these six accidents, two have involved mechanical failure, two have been associated with weather conditions prevailing at the time of the flight, and two are attributable to pilot error.

Rail Services

Mr. Gerald Bowden: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport what plans London Transport has to improve rail access to south and east London.

Mr. Parkinson: A Bill to extend the Jubilee line through south London to docklands and Stratford is currently before the House. This will do much to improve access to areas of Southwark, Bermondsey, Greenwich, Tower Hamlets and Newham.

I recently announced the go-ahead for east-west crossrail, which will provide Stratford and points east with a direct rail link with west London and the west end as well as the City.

London Transport is extending the docklands light railway to Bank and Beckton.

I am pleased to report that I have authorised London Transport to deposit a Bill for the proposed extension of the docklands light railway to Lewisham. I have done this on the clear understanding that the project will only proceed if LT is successful in its efforts to arrange an acceptable privately financed scheme, and the powers are being taken in that behalf. This extension would provide a further important river crossing and allow the docklands regeneration benefits to spread south from the Isle of Dogs to areas of Greenwich and Lewisham.

London Transport is also spending very large sums modernising the Central line as well as continuing to invest heavily in safety and in the general upgrading of the existing underground system. London Transport's investment programme over the next three years will approach £3 billion, an increase of about 90 per cent. in real terms over the previous three years. With such a large programme already in hand and largely funded by Government grant, further extensions to south and east London could be afforded now only if they were privately funded or London Transport felt able to reorder its priorities.

As it is, although a substantial private sector contribution has been offered towards a station on the proposed east London line extensions, the project as a whole would still require substantial public funding. Given the public expenditure constraints within which it must operate, London Transport has concluded that it has other more pressing priorities at present and has therefore decided, with my agreement, not to seek leave to deposit the necessary Private Bill in this Session of Parliament. I hope nonetheless that London Transport will continue to discuss the project with interested parties in case a way can be found of taking the project forward at less cost to it. We are discussing with London Transport the case for safeguarding the route of the extensions through the planning system so as to ensure that they remain an option for the future.

Learner Drivers

Mr. Ian Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Transport if he will make a statement on progress with the production of an official syllabus for learner drivers and riders.

Mr. Chope: I am pleased to announce that the Driving Standards Agency has produced a book containing the syllabus and guide to car and motor cycle tests. The book, called "Your Driving Test", is published today and can be obtained from HMSO and major bookstores. The agency also plans to produce a companion volume about driving tests for large goods and passenger vehicles.

HOME DEPARTMENT

Prisons

Mr. Cox: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list the prisons in England and Wales in which restraints have been used on inmates during the last three years; and how many times restraints have been used at each prison during this period.

Mrs. Rumbold: The number of applications of restraints under rule 46 of the Prison Rules 1964, rule 49 of the Detention Centre Rules 1983, rule 49 of the Youth Custody Centre Rules 1983 and rule 49 of the Young Offender Institution Rules 1988 are given in the table.

Restraints[1] applied to violent or refractory inmates of prison service establishments in England and Wales: by establishment, 1987-89

Establishment and type	Number of applications
	1987	1988	1989
Local prisons/remand centres
Ashford	—	—	5
Bedford	4	3	2
Birmingham	—	10	3
Bristol	—	—	1
Brixton	—	—	6
Camp Hill	—	—	5
Canterbury	1	—	—
Cardiff	5	1	2
Chelmsford	—	1	1
Durham	—	1	—
Exeter	2	—	—
Hull	7	4	9
Leeds	1	1	—

Establishment and type	Number of applications 1987	1988	1989
Leicester	5	17	4
Lewes	—	1	4
Lincoln	—	5	4
Oxford	1	1	—
Pentonville	2	1	—
Reading	1	2	2
Risley	—	—	2
Rochester	—	—	2
Swansea	1	—	—
Wandsworth	5	10	7
Wormwood Scrubs	3	2	2
Training prisons
Acklington	—	—	2
Albany	2	—	20
Blundeston	4	—	—
Camp Hill	2	6	—
Chelmsford	1	—	—
Cookham Wood	—	—	1
Dartmoor	1	—	—
Frankland	6	7	3
Full Sutton	—	7	9
Garth	—	1	—
Havering	—	—	1
Lindholme	1	4	2
Long Lartin	4	3	—
Parkhurst	6	6	9
Preston	—	—	2
Shepton Mallet	—	3	—
Stafford	3	—	1
7Styal	1	—	—
Wakefield	2	—	—
Wayland	—	—	1
Young offender institutions/youth custody centres/detention centres
Aylesbury	—	1	5
Buckley Hall	—	1	—
Dover	7	—	5
Glen Parva	1	1	—
Guys Marsh	1	—	3
Hatfield	—	1	—
Hollesley Bay	1	—	—
Onley	1	2	—
Rochester	8	—	—
All establishments	90	103	125

[1] Loose canvas jacket, body belt, handcuffs and ankle straps. No leather wrist straps were used.

Firearms

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will call for a report from the chief constable of Northumbria on the number of incidents involving the use of firearms dealt with by Northumbria police in 1990 and the number of officers trained in the use of firearms in the force at the present time.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: I understand from the chief constable of Northumbria that between 1 January and 15 November 1990 firearms were issued to his officers in 176 operations against crime. On 15 November, 149 of his officers were trained and authorised to be issued with firearms.

Fresh Start

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list (a) the average sickness rates and (b) the average long-term sickness rates, namely over one year, for each prison in the United Kingdom for each of the two years before Fresh Start was implemented and the subsequent years.

Mrs. Rumbold: The number of lost days due t absence in prison establishments in England and the year ending March 1990 averaged about 1 officer. I will write to the hon. Member shortl breakdown by establishment. Information on short-term sickness rates and sickness rates in ea is not held centrally and could be obtained disproportionate cost.

Suicides (Police Cells)

Mr. Sheerman: To ask the Secretary of Sta Home Department how many self-inflicte suicides and attempted suicides took plac prisoners held in police cells in 1988, 1989 an date.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The number of deaths whic in police custody, together with brief deta circumstances surrounding each case, are conta annual reports of Her Majesty's chief ins constabulary and the Commissioner of Poli Metropolis. The number of cases in which the inquest has returned a verdict of suicide is as f

	Number
1988	5
1989	5
1990	[1]1

[1] A number of inquests have yet to be concluded.

Other self-inflicted deaths are not categori ately and no details of attempted suicides are centrally.

Immigration

Mr. Fishburn: To ask the Secretary of Sta Home Department what are the average and the delays suffered by non-EEC passengers at check-ins at Heathrow and Gatwick over th months; and what are the comparable figures passengers.

Mr. Peter Lloyd: The average and maximum Heathrow and Gatwick during the six-month April to 30 September 1990 were as follows:

	Non-EEC Minutes
Heathrow
Average	18
Maximum	175
Gatwick
Average	14
Maximum	90

Crime Statistics

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary o the Home Department what are the figures of in Dyfed, Wales, for each year since 1970; and make a statement.

Mr. John Patten: The available informa notifiable offences recorded by the polic Dyfed-Powys police area and is published an 1970-73 in "Supplementary Statistics Relating to Crime and Criminal Proceedings"; for 1974-89 in "Criminal Statistics, England and Wales"—table 2.4 for 1989 and corresponding tables in issues for earlier years, and for the 12 months to June 1990 in "Home Office Statistical Bulletin" 31/90. Copies of all these publications are available in the Library.

Prison Population

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what is his Department's projected prison population for 1993, 1995, 1997 and 1999; and if he will make a statement.

Mrs. Rumbold: The latest projections of the prison population were published in a Home Office statistical bulletin "Updated projections of long term trends in the prison population to 1998"—issue 33/90, dated 24 October 1990—a copy of which is in the Library.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what was the sentenced and remand population in England and Wales for the latest date available; and how many prisoners were being held in police cells on the same date.

Mrs. Rumbold: The latest available information is that on 30 September 1990, a total of 9,377 remand, 214 non-criminal and 34,888 sentenced prisoners were held in prison service establishments. A further 1,009 were held in police cells of whom the majority were remand prisoners.

Mr. Hinchliffe: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will list for each of the years between 1975 and 1990, the proportion of adults imprisoned per 100,000 of the population.

Mrs. Rumbold [holding answer 12 November 1990]: The information is given in the table.

Adult prisoners[1] in prison service establishments in England and Wales on 30 June as a proportion per 100,000 of the adult[2] population, 1975-1990

Year
1975	83·6
1976	87·6
1977	88·7
1978	87·4
1979	87·2
1980	89·5
1981	89·3
1982	88·4
1983	89·3
1984	89·4
1985	95·4
1986	95·5
1987	103·0
1988	103·6
1989	103·9
1990	[3]95·6

[1] Sentenced remand and non-custodial prisoners aged 21 and over including sentenced young offenders re-classified as adults.
[2] Aged 21 and over.
[3] Using projected mid-year national population.

Hong Kong

Mr. Riddick: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department what direction he has issued to the Governor of Hong Kong under section 1(3) of the British Nationality (Hong Kong) Act 1990, specifying the time scale and number of persons to be recommended for registration under section 1(1) of that Act during the first stage of the selection process.

Mr. Waddington: I have directed the Governor to make the following recommendations during the period beginning 1 December 1990 and ending 1 January 1994:

not more than 32,700 in the general occupational class, of which not more than 400 are to be in respect of applicants in approved occupations; not more than 6,200 in the disciplined services class; and not more than 3,850 in the sensitive service class.

However, I have made no direction for this period in relation to the entrepreneurs class and, accordingly, the Governor may make recommendations during that period in respect of all 500 places in that class.

Victim Support Services

Mr. Dunnachie: To ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if his Department will review its current restrictions upon the use of its grant funding to victim support in view of the possible closure of local offices and reduction of services; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. John Patten [holding answer 14 November 1990]: The Home Office grant-in-aid for local victim support schemes in England and Wales—£4·5 million this year—is administered by the funding panel of the national charity Victim Support under criteria which have been agreed with the Home Office and are reviewed annually. The 350 or so local schemes rely largely on voluntary help, but Home Office grant is available to pay for up to two co-ordinators in each scheme or to assist with running costs. There has been no reduction in Home Office grant which will, subject to parliamentary approval, be increased by 20 per cent. to £5·4 million next year. It is open to local schemes faced with loss or reduction of funding from other sources to apply to the funding panel for new or extra grant.

ATTORNEY-GENERAL

Judges

Mr. John D. Taylor: To ask the Attorney-General what powers the Lord Chancellor has to control public appearances in programmes of political content by judges.

The Attorney-General: The Lord Chancellor's formal powers over the conduct of judges in England and Wales are limited to the power to remove circuit judges for incapacity or misbehaviour. It is, however, a long-standing convention that judges do not become involved in matters of political controversy, and the Lord Chancellor, as head of the judiciary, would advise any judge who sought his opinion that it would not be appropriate to appear in a programme with a political content.

Distress for Rent Notices

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Attorney-General what proposals he has to expand and simplify the prescribed notices given to debtors under the Distress for Rent Rules of 1988.

The Attorney-General: The Law Commission is at present undertaking a study of the law of distress, and a final report is expected early in the new year.

The Lord Chancellor's Department will be carrying out a review of the Distress for Rent Rules 1988 once that report has been received.

Private Bailiffs

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Attorney-General what proposals he has to establish a register of certificated private bailiffs.

The Attorney-General: A register of bailiffs who hold a certificate granted by a county court judge authorising them to levy any distress for rent is maintained by the Lord Chancellor's Department at its London headquarters.

The register is maintained for administrative purposes and is not open to public inspection, but each county court maintains a list of bailiffs who hold a certificate as at 1 February each year. The list is exhibited in the public area at the court office.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Attorney-General what proposals he has for consulting community charge and advice agencies about charges made by private bailiffs.

The Attorney-General: The level of fees, charges and expenses which my be recovered from a tenant by certificated bailiff is set out in appendix 1 to the Distress for Rent Rules 1988 and is reviewed from time to time by the Lord Chancellor's Department, in consultation with other Government Departments and with the Certificated Bailiffs' Association. Charges by private bailiffs for enforcing liability orders—schedule 5 of the Community Charges (Administration and Enforcement) Regulations 1989—are the same. There are no plans at present to extend this consultation process.

Mr. Austin Mitchell: To ask the Attorney-General what proposals he has to establish a complaints procedure against private bailiffs.

The Attorney-General: Any person who wishes to complain about the conduct or fitness of a bailiff who holds a certificate granted by a county court judge under the Distress for Rent Rules 1988 may make his or her complaint in writing to the county court from which the certificate was issued.

No such procedure is in place in respect of private bailiffs who do not hold a certificate granted by a judge of a county court. Such bailiffs are not authorised to levy distress for rent, but may operate in other areas such as recovery of community charge, fines or taxes.

Bereavement Damages

Mr. Carrington: To ask the Attorney-General whether the Government propose to increase the level of bereavement damages under the Fatal Accidents Act 1976; and if he will make a statement.

The Attorney-General: Following a review announced last year, the Government have decided that the statutory level of bereavement damages which may be awarded by the courts in England and Wales in fatal accident cases should be raised from the figure of £3,500 fixed in 1982 to £7,500.

In accordance with the provisions of section 1A of the Fatal Accidents Act 1976, the Lord Chancellor will shortly be making the necessary order, which is subject to the negative resolution procedure, to implement the increase to £7,500 which will take effect in relation occurring on or after 1 April 1991. A separate or made at the same time, under article 3A of Accidents (Northern Ireland) Order 1977, to similar increase in the level of the award in Ireland.

The proposed new level of £7,500 will also a effect from 1 April 1991, to cases where a be award is made under the criminal injuries com scheme in England and Wales.

My right hon. Friend the Secretary of Northern Ireland intends to bring forward increasing the level of bereavement award to £7, the statutory criminal injuries compensation sch Province.

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Norwich Union

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Secretary of State and Industry if he has received any representati intervention order by LAUTRO to prevent Union from taking business with the Winchest and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Redwood: My right hon. Friend has re such representations. It is up to LAUTRO, and the Securities and Investments Board, to deci enforce the rules.

Thames Water

Mr. French: To ask the Secretary of State for Industry if he will meet the chairman of the stock to discuss the failure of Thames Water plc to stockholders the outstanding liability on Me water board 3 per cent. B stock; and if he wi statement.

Mr. Redwood: No. This is a matter for the co stockholders and the stock exchange.

Machine Tool Industry

Mr. Steinberg: To ask the Secretary of State and Industry if he will list the amount export machine tool industry for each year from 197

Mr. Sainsbury: The information is as follow

United Kingdom Exports of Metal Working Machin 1979-1989

Year	£ million
1979	291
1980	367
1981	355
1982	353
1983	283
1984	320
1985	372
1986	379
1987	426
1988	524
1989	526

[1] Activity Heading 3221 of the Standard Industrial Cl (Revised 1980).

TRADE AND INDUSTRY

Cot Deaths

Sir Dudley Smith: To ask the Secretary of State for Trade and Industry what progress is being made by his Departmental inquiry into cot deaths; when he expects to receive it; and if he will publish it.

Mrs. Virginia Bottomley: I have been asked to reply. The expert working group is expected to report to the Chief Medical Officer soon. It has always been the intention to publish its findings.

FOREIGN AND COMMONWEALTH AFFAIRS

Non-proliferation Regime

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what proposals for the development of an extended regional non-proliferation regime under the auspices of the United Nations Security Council have been circulated recently by the Soviet Union.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The Soviet Union has circulated various proposals at the UN Security Council. As far as we are aware, no proposal for a regional non-proliferation regime has been made.

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what plans he has to meet his Soviet counterpart or officials of the Soviet Foreign Affairs and Defence Ministries, to discuss the development of new or extended non-proliferation agreements.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: No plans at present.

Nuclear Arms Reductions

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what indications he has received from the Soviet Government that in the next round of the strategic nuclear arms reduction negotiations United Kingdom Polaris and-or Trident ballistic nuclear missile systems will necessarily be included on the agenda.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: The conditions for the United Kingdom considering how best to contribute to the arms control process are already well known.

United Nations Day

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs if Her Majesty's Government supported any events or facilitated the distribution of any literature to mark United Nations day on 24 October.

Mr. Lennox-Boyd: No.

Nuclear Weapons Tests

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Foreign and Commonwealth Affairs what decisions have been taken pursuant to rule 44(4) of the rules of procedure for the amendment conference for states party to the treaty banning nuclear weapon tests in the atmosphere in outer space and under water.

Mr. Douglas Hogg: We are not aware of any decisions taken by specialised agencies and intergovernmental organisations pursuant to rule 44(4) of the partial test ban treaty amendment conference.

WALES

Housing

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales how much money was authorised for district councils in Wales for the purchase of houses from the private sector for letting by local authorities, in 1989-90 and 1990-91; and what the level of authorisation will be for 1991-92.

Mr. Grist: A total of £1 million was made available in both 1989-90 and 1990-91 for district councils to purchase land and houses in areas with a high concentration of second homes. This was in addition to their ability to spend, within available resources, according to their own priorities. Decisions about resources for 1991-92 will be announced very soon.

National Rivers Authority

Mr. Wigley: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will arrange to discuss with the chairman of the National Rivers Authority questions relating to the right of trade unions in the industry in Wales to refer disputes to the Advisory, Conciliation and Arbitration Service.

Mr. Grist: No. This is a matter for the National Rivers Authority.

Cardiff Bay Barrage

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what discussions he has had with the chairman of the Cardiff Bay development corporation regarding the cost and length of time required for carrying out the additional work specified by his independent groundwater consultant Mr. Roy Stoner.

Sir Wyn Roberts: None. Much of the additional work recommended by Mr. Stoner is already being carried out by the corporation's consultants. The remainder will be undertaken as part of the further studies and should not, therefore, result in an extension to the 12-month period as laid down by the Committee which examined the Cardiff Bay Barrage Bill. Any extra costs involved will be met by the corporation.

Mr. Morgan: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales what reply he expects to make to the report of Mr. Roy Stoner, placed in the Library on 12 November, relating to the Cardiff bay barrage.

Sir Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend has thanked Mr. Stoner for his report and informed him that the issues raised in it will be taken up with Cardiff Bay development corporation and its consultants.

Nature Conservation

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will list those sites which (i) have been designated or (ii) meet the criteria for designation as (a) special protection areas under the European Community directive on the conservation of wild birds, or (b) Ramsar sites under the convention on wetlands of international importance.

Sir Wyn Roberts: The designation of SPA and Ramsar sites is the responsibility of my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Environment. Welsh sites are designated in consultation with me.

In Wales three SPAs, Skokholm and Skomer—part—Dee estuary and Grassholm, and two Ramsar sites, Dee estuary and Cors Fochno, have been designated.

I understand that the NCC has so far identified 11 sites, in Wales, which it considers meet the SPA criteria and 10 which meet the Ramsar conditions. These are:

Llyn Idwal (Gwynedd) Ramsar
Llyn Tegid (Gwynedd) Ramsar
Cors Caron (Dyfed) Ramsar
Corsydd Mon/Lleyn (Dyfed) Ramsar
Crumlin Bog (Gwent) Ramsar
Migneint (Gwynedd) Ramsar
Midland Meres Mires (Clwyd) Ramsar
Burry Inlet (Dyfed/West Glamorgan) Ramsar and SPA
Severn Estuary (part) (South Glamorgan/Gwent) Ramsar and SPA
Carmarthen Bay (Dyfed/West Glamorgan) Ramsar and SPA
Skokholm and Skomer (part) (Dyfed) SPA
Glannau Aberdaron/Ynys Enlli (Gwynedd) SPA
Ynys Feurig, Cemlyn Bay and the Skerries (Gwynedd) SPA
Glannau Ynys Gybi (Gwynedd) SPA
Traeth Lafan (Gwynedd) SPA
Pembrokeshire Cliffs (Dyfed) SPA
Elenydd Mallaen (Powys) SPA
Berwyn (Gwynedd) SPA

Agriculture

Mr. Geraint Howells: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales when he last met representatives from the Farmers Union of Wales to discuss opportunities for young people entering the agriculture industry in Wales; and if he will make a statement.

Sir Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend met representatives of the Farmers Union of Wales on 11 September to discuss a range of agricultural issues, which included the opportunities for young people entering the industry.

Music Teaching

Mr. Barry Jones: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales if he will make a statement on the implications for peripatetic music teaching of local management of schools.

Sir Wyn Roberts: We are not aware that music provision, including the peripatetic music service, has been adversely affected by the introduction of local management of schools. Parents will want to see music provision maintained in the schools their children attend, and so will governors. We confidently expect that the delegation of control to governors will lead to an enrichment in the education experience provided by schools.

Mr. Rod Richards

Mr. Michael: To ask the Secretary of State for Wales, further to his reply of 13 November, Official Report, column 106, if he will give specific details of the knowledge and experience of Mr. Rod Richards in respect of the public sector which will be relevant to his work as special adviser.

Sir Wyn Roberts: My right hon. Friend has nothing to add to the answer he gave the hon. Gentleman on 13 November.

HEALTH

Civil Defence

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Health how many civil servants are currently employed (a) full time and (b) part time by his Department on civil defence; what the total costs of employing staff on civil defence duties were in 1989-90; what they are employing staff on civil defence duties are estimated to be in 1990-91; and whether he has any plans for staff to be transferred to work on other duties.

Mr. Dorrell: The information requested is as follows:

Number of Staff and cost
Number of Staff employed full-time on 19 Nov 1990	[1]
Number of staff employed part-time on 19 Nov 1990	[1]
Total cost 1989-90	£1.2 million
Estimated total cost 1990-91	£1.2 million

[1] Approximate

My right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State announced on 16 October that he had initiated a review of the options for the future of civil defence in the light of east-west relations. Future expenditure in civil defence will depend on the outcome of that review.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Injury and Disablement

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will provide statistics indicating the number of injuries for which injury and disablement benefit was made for 1986, 1987, 1988 and 1989.

Mr. Scott: The table gives statistics of the relationship between industrial accidents and prescribed industrial diseases.

Disablement Pensions in Payment—I

Date	Industrial Accidents
30 September 1986	147,000
4 April 1987	148,000
2 April 1988	151,000
1 April 1989	150,000

Notes:
(i) Injury benefit was abolished in 1983.
(ii) The DSS industrial accident statistics cover injuries for which disablement benefit is paid in
(iii) There are some 59 prescribed occupation

Civil Defence

Mr. Bill Michie: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many civil servants are currently employed (a) full time and (b) part time by his Department on civil defence; what the total costs of employing staff on civil defence duties were in 1989-90; what they are employing staff on civil defence duties are estimated to be in 1990-91; and whether he has any plans for staff to be transferred to work on other duties.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: None of the staff in the Department is employed full time on civil

There are 10 members of staff in the Department's headquarters and regional offices whose duties include civil defence matters but, since these represent only a very small part of the duties of the staff involved, it is not possible to identify separately the costs involved.

Workplace Accidents

Ms. Primarolo: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will list the reported accidents involving lifting of patients taken from B176 forms received by his Department for each year from 1983 to 1989 showing distribution by age/sex, occupation, incidence rates based on population of England and place of accident.

Mr. Scott: The information requested is not available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Retirement Pension

Sir Ian Gilmour: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people put in claims for retirement pension during the six months to March 1989; how many were awarded the full basic rate retirement pension; and what are the reasons for the proportion not receiving full basic rate pension.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard: In the six months to March 1989 317,011 claims were made to state retirement pension and 244,940 awards of basic pension made. The difference between these figures is made up by those claims from individuals choosing to defer their pensions, those which led to the payment of graduated and additional pension only and cases where there was no entitlement to retirement pension.

Of the awards made, 194,600 were at the full rate of basic retirement pension. These pensions are based upon a person's, or their spouse's, contribution record; the main reason for an award being made at less than the full rate is an insufficient record, but it can also reflect a reduction due to receipt of another benefit.

Benefits

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security how many people are in receipt of attendance allowance, mobility allowance and invalid care allowance in (a) the Kirklees district and (b) England and Wales.

Mr. Scott: The numbers of people receiving each benefit in Kirklees district could be obtained only at disproportionate cost. The latest available information about people receiving these benefits in England and Wales is in the table:

	Number
Attendance Allowance (as at 31 March 1989)	[1]695,000
Mobility Allowance (as at 15 November 1990)	539,000
Invalid Care Allowance (Scotland, England and Wales)[2] (as at 31 October 1990)	132,000

[1] Statistical estimate.
[2] Separate figures for England and Wales are not available.

Mrs. Ann Taylor: To ask the Secretary of State for Social Security if he will provide details for the Kirklees metropolitan district of the number of people curren most recent figures, in receipt of each of the follow benefits: (a) attendance allowance, (b) mobi allowance and (c) invalid care allowance, and an estim of what level of take-up the above figures represen terms of entitlement to benefit for the Kirklees distric

Mr. Scott: This information is not available and co be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Harry Barnes: To ask the Secretary of State Social Security if he will list all forms of benefit that can obtained through his Department; when each form benefit was first introduced; and whether each form benefit was introduced as an entirely new benefit whether it superseded earlier benefit payments.

Mrs. Gillian Shephard [holding answer 15 Novem 1990]: The information requested is in the table. The da given are those of introduction of the benefit in its origi form and it should be noted that many have since b modified.

Benefit	Introduced	Superseded
Attendance Allowance	December 71	New
Child Benefit	April 77	Family Allowance
Christmas Bonus	December 72	New
Community Charge Benefit[1]	April 90	Rate Rebate (Engla and Wales) Community Char Rebate (Scotland)
Constant Attendance Allowance	July 48	New
Exceptionally Severe Disablement Allowance	July 48	New
Family Credit	April 88	Family Income Supplement
Guardians Allowance	July 48	Orphan's Pension
Housing Benefit—[1] Rent Rebates	November 82— April 83	Local Authorities h schemes and supplementary benefit provision
Rent Allowance	as above	as above
Income Support	April 88	Supplementary Ben
Industrial Death Benefit[2]	July 48	New
Industrial Disablement Benefit	July 48	New
Invalid Care Allowance	July 76	New
Invalidity Benefit	September 71	New
Maternity Allowance[3]	July 48	New
Mobility Allowance	January 76	New
One Parent Benefit[4]	April 77	Child Interim Benef
Pneumoconiosis, byssinosis and miscellaneous diseases benefit[5]	March 52	New
Reduced Earnings Allowance	October 86	Special Hardship Allowance
Remission of certain NHS charges and payment of travelling expenses to hospital for NHS treatment on income grounds[6]	April 88	Replaced a similar scheme but with changes in the bas of assessment and with centralised administration
Retirement Allowance	April 88	Reduced Earnings Allowance for tho of pension age wh retired
Retirement Pension—
Category A and B	July 48	New
Category C	July 70	New
Category D	July 71	New
Age addition	July 71	New
Graduated retirement benefit[7]	July 61	New

Benefit	Introduced	Superseded
Additional pension (SERPS), payable also with widow's benefits (except Widow's Payment)	April 79	New
Severe Disablement Allowance	November 84	Non Contributory Invalidity Pension (NCIP)
Sickness Benefit[3]	July 48	New Social Fund—
Funeral Payments	April 87	Supplementary Benefit Single Payment
Maternity Payments	April 87	as above
Community Care Grants	April 88	New
Budgeting Loans	April 88	Supplementary Benefit Single Payments
Crisis Loans	April 88	Supplementary Benefit Urgent payments
Cold Weather Payments	November 88	Exceptionally Severe Weather Payments
Travel Grants, Settlement or Resettlement Loans	September 90	New
Statutory Maternity Pay [8]	April 87	Maternity allowance for most employed women.
Statutory Sick Pay [8]	April 83	Sickness benefit for most employed people
Unemployment Benefit[9]	1911	New
Vaccine damage payments [10]	March 79	New
War Disablement Pension	February 17	New
War Widow's Pension	February 17	New
Widow's Pension	July 48	New
Widow's Payment	April 88	Widow's allowance
Widowed Mother's Allowance	July 48	New
Workmen's Compensation Supplement	July 51	New

Notes:

[1] Paid and administered by local authorities on behalf of the Department of Social Security (DSS).

[2] Not payable in respect of deaths on or after 11 April 1988.

[3] Superseded benefits payable under the various National Health Insurance Acts.

[4] Named Child Benefit Increase prior to 1 April 1981.

[5] Miscellaneous diseases first included in November 1954.

[6] Administered by DSS on behalf of the Department of Health.

[7] Payable only to people with accrued rights derived from payments to the graduated pension scheme from 1961 to 1975.

[8] Statutory Sick Pay and Statutory Maternity Allowance are administered and paid by employers. Sickness benefit and Maternity Allowance are still available for those who do not qualify.

[9] Paid and administered by the Department of Employment.

[10] Paid via the Department of Health until 1982 when responsibility passed to DSS.

AGRICULTURE, FISHERIES AND FOOD

Bovine Spongiform Encephalopathy

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister for Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what advice has been given to the Government of the Irish Republic about their handling of the outbreak of bovine spongiform encephalopathy in the Republic.

Mr. Maclean: We have kept the Government of the Irish Republic fully informed about the measures we have taken to deal with bovine spongiform encephalopathy in the United Kingdom and of the reasons for taking them.

Mr. Hind: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food when he expects the Government to respond to the Agriculture Committee's report on bovine spongiform encephalopathy.

Mr. Maclean: I and my right hon. Friends have today presented to Parliament the Government's response to the House of Commons Agriculture Committee's report on bovine spongiform encephalopathy. Copies of the response have been deposited in the Library of the House and are available from the Vote Office.

Seaside Rock

Mr. Atkinson: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what investigations have been made into the side-effects of the red-pink colouring E127, known as erythrosine, used in seaside rock; and if he will make a statement.

Mr. Maclean: E127, erythrosine, has been investigated by the Food Advisory Committee and the committee on toxicity as part of a review of the use of all colours currently permitted in food. The review showed that the normal consumption of seaside rock coloured with erythrosine does not present a toxicological hazard. However, I have accepted the Food Advisory Committee's advice that there is a need to reduce the level of colours generally in the diet and will be proposing new regulations that will include restrictions on the use of erythrosine as advised by the committee.

EC Special Committee on Agriculture

Dr. David Clark: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food if he will publish the agenda of each meeting of the special committee on agriculture of the European Community.

Mr. Gummer: It has been the practice of successive Governments not to publish details of the work of official committees reporting to the Council of Ministers.

Fisheries Council

Mr. David Porter: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what was the outcome of the Fisheries Council held in Brussels on 20 November.

Mr. Curry: I represented the United Kingdom at the Council of Fisheries Ministers in Brussels on 20 November with my noble Friend Lord Strathclyde, the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Scotland.

We secured the maintenance of the dual system for herring and price adjustments which should assist the continued orderly marketing of the Scottish herring catch. We kept other price changes within reasonable bounds.

Despite long discussion, the Council was unable to agree on new technical conservation measures. We emphasised the need for early decisions, but the Council concluded that further work was required. We shall continue to press hard for progress on this.

The Council also considered amendments to the fisheries structure regulation discussing the balance of the various measures proposed and remitted the proposal for further consideration at official level.

The Council also agreed that the Commission should press ahead with work to harmonise member states' laws in the Mediterranean and to develop improved research arrangements, as a first step in developing a common fisheries policy in the Mediterranean.

Tecnazene

Mr. Quin: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food what proportion of the 1989 United Kingdom potato crop was treated with tecnazene.

Mr. Maclean: No survey was conducted in 1989. The latest figures for use of tecnazene are: in England and Wales 35 per cent. of the 1988 crop; in Scotland 24 per cent. of the 1986 crop.

Birds

Mr. Ron Davies: To ask the Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food whether he has any scientific evidence that the bird species subject to the proposed alteration to the Wildlife and Countryside Act cause damage to growing crops, game birds or livestock feedingstuffs.

Mr. Maclean: This Department's central science laboratories have researched damage to agricultural crops caused by starlings, wood pigeons and Brent geese. This damage is significant: starlings can take 12 per cent. of barley for cattle and 20 per cent. of the cherry crop, wood pigeons eat oil seed rape worth £2 million, and Brent geese reduce yield of winter wheat locally by up to 10 per cent.

DEFENCE

United States Nuclear Laboratories

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if any officials of his Department have visited the United States nuclear laboratories at (a) Los Alamos, (b) Lawrence Livermore or (c) Sandia in the current year.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: In the current year Ministry of Defence officials have visited all three of these laboratories under the terms of the 1958 United States-United Kingdom agreement for co-operation on the uses of atomic energy for mutual defence purposes.

Military Nuclear Facilities

Mr. Cryer: To ask the Secretary of State for Defence if he has any plans to seek agreements with the Soviet Union to conclude a bilateral arrangement on environmental restoration and nuclear waste management at military nuclear facilities along the lines of the co-operation agreement between the Soviet Union and the United States of America signed on 18 September.

Mr. Archie Hamilton: We have no such plans.

NORTHERN IRELAND

Rural Development

Mr. McGrady: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland when the interdepartmental committee on rural development will complete its deliberations and report to him on its findings; and if he will make such findings and recommendations available for public debate and implementation.

Mr. Brooke: The interdepartmental committee on rural development is preparing to report to me before the end of the year. I do not intend to publish the report, although decisions flowing from it will be announced as appropriate.

Housing Executive

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total number of applications for (a) improvement grants and (b) repair grants refused by each grants office of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive in each year since 1985.

Dr. Mawhinney: The matter the hon. Gentleman raised is for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, but I understand from the chairman that information on the refusal of individual grant types is not readily available and could be obtained only at disproportionate cost.

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the total number and value of (a) improvement grants and (b) repair grants issued by each grants office of the Northern Ireland Housing Executive in each year since 1985.

Dr. Mawhinney: This is a matter for the Northern Ireland Housing Executive, whose chairman has advised me that the available information is as follows:

Repair Grants
Number and value (in brackets) £ million

Grants office	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88	1988-89	1989-90
Belfast	4,649 (£10·0)	4,301 (£8·7)	2,120 (£7·3)	2,768 (£4·8)	1,881 (£4·2)
Ballyclare	1,495 (£2·4)	1,023 (£1·7)	380 (£0·9)	595 (£1·1)	456 (£1·0)
Ballymena	598 (£1·3)	389 (£1·0)	182 (£0·6)	270 (£0·6)	131 (£0·4)
Coleraine	562 (£1·1)	444 (£0·9)	197 (£0·5)	259 (£0·5)	176 (£0·4)
Craigavon	1,063 (£1·9)	660 (£1·1)	338 (£0·7)	369 (£0·5)	265 (£0·5)
Fermanagh	340 (£0·7)	272 (£0·6)	148 (£0·4)	201 (£0·4)	200 (£0·4)
Lisburn	861 (£2·8)	733 (£1·4)	329 (£1·1)	438 (£0·9)	267 (£0·6)
Londonderry	598 (£1·2)	444 (£0·9)	208 (£0·6)	248 (£0·5)	211 (£0·6)
Newry	448 (£1·2)	326 (£0·8)	214 (£0·7)	215 (£0·5)	137 (£1·7)
Newtownards	2,072 (£2·2)	1,743 (£3·3)	708 (£2·0)	661 (£1·8)	493 (£1·6)
Omagh	388 (£1·1)	287 (£0·6)	177 (£0·5)	243 (£0·6)	222 (£0·6)

Improvement Grants
Number and value (in brackets) £ million

Grants office	1985-86	1986-87	1987-88	1988-89	1989-90
Belfast	1,166 (£7·8)	1,027 (£8·0)	778 (£7·9)	893 (£6·1)	690 (£5·7)
Ballyclare	210 (£1·4)	237 (£1·6)	202 (£1·3)	174 (£1·2)	141 (£1·0)
Ballymena	559 (£3·3)	486 (£3·1)	332 (£2·1)	263 (£1·9)	280 (£1·7)
Coleraine	387 (£2·6)	404 (£2·6)	293 (£2·0)	282 (£1·6)	234 (£1·7)
Craigavon	472 (£2·7)	338 (£2·7)	393 (£3·1)	201 (£2·4)	197 (£1·5)
Fermanagh	287 (£2·1)	296 (£2·0)	267 (£1·8)	201 (£1·4)	197 (£1·3)
Lisburn	342 (£2·3)	293 (£2·0)	295 (£1·2)	267 (£1·4)	188 (£1·5)
Londonderry	339 (£1·4)	410 (£3·0)	313 (£2·1)	242 (£1·6)	238 (£1·5)
Newry	369 (£3·0)	403 (£3·2)	420 (£2·4)	267 (£1·8)	225 (£2·2)
Newtownards	338 (£1·7)	366 (£2·2)	246 (£2·4)	266 (£1·6)	186 (£1·7)
Omagh	486 (£4·2)	558 (£4·2)	434 (£3·0)	411 (£2·6)	331 (£2·6)

Mr. Mallon: To ask the Secretary of State for Northern Ireland what was the average length of time for the execution of repairs under each repair category identified by the Northern Ireland Housing Executive.

